Against this judgment an appeal was presented to the House of Lords, which was argued in the year 1813, when, after a long hearing: The Lords, by their judgment, found, "as matter of fact, sufficiently established by proof, that the ground and buildings in question, were purchased and erected with intent [536] that the same should be used and enjoyed for the purpose of religious worship, by a number of persons agreeing at the time in their religious opinions and persuasions, and therefore intending to continue in communion with each other; and that the society of such persons acceded to a body, termed in the pleadings, 'The Associate Synod;' and find, that it does not expressly appear as matter of fact, for what purpose it was intended at the time such purchase and erections were made, or at the time such accession took place, that the ground and buildings should be used and enjoyed, in case the whole body of persons using and enjoying the same should change their religious principles and persuasions; or, if in consequence of the adherence of some such persons to their original religious principles and persuasions, and the non-adherence of others of them thereto, such persons should cease to agree in their original principles and persuasions, and should cease to continue in communion with each other, and should cease, either as to the whole body, or as to any part of the members composing the same, to adhere to the body, termed in the pleadings, 'The Associate Synod;'" and it is therefore ordered and adjudged, that, with these findings, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to review all the interlocutors complained of in the said appeal; and upon such review, to do therein what shall appear to them to be meet and just."

In prosecution of this judgment, the appellants presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session, praying them to apply the remit; and [537] after some steps of procedure, unnecessary to be here detailed, having appointed the appellants to give in a condescendence, stating the facts and circumstances they might consider necessary to be investigated, with a view to the application of the remit, a condescendence was accordingly lodged; and that being followed by answers, replies, and duplies, the Court, on advising the whole cause, pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lords having resumed consideration of this petition, with condescendence, answers, replies, duplies, and whole cause, find, that the pursuers, James Craigdallie and others, have failed to condescend upon any acts done, or opinions professed by the associate synod, or by the defenders, Jedidiah Aikman and others, from which this Court, as far as they are capable of understanding the subject, can infer, much less find, that the said defenders have deviated from the original principles and standards of the associate presbytery and synod. Farther find, that the pursuers have failed in rendering intelligible to the Court, on what ground it is that they aver, that there does at this moment exist any real difference between their principles and those of the defenders; for the Lords further find, that the act of forbearance, as it is termed, on which the pursuers found, as proving the apostacy of the defenders from the original principles of the secession, and the new formula, were never adopted by the defenders, but were either rejected or dismissed as inexpedient; and that the preamble to the formula, which was adopted by the associate synod in the [538] year 1797, is substantially and almost verbatim the same, as the explication which the pursuers proposed in their petition of the 13th April 1797, to be prefixed to the formula; and to which, if it would have satisfied their brethren, they declared that they were willing to agree; therefore, on the whole, find it to be unnecessary now to enter into any of the inquiries ordered by the House of Lords, under the supposition, that the defenders had departed from the original standards and principles of the association, and that the pursuers must be considered merely as so many individuals, who have thought proper voluntarily to separate themselves from the congregation to which they belonged, without any assignable cause, and without any fault on the part of the defenders, and, therefore, have no right to disturb the defenders in the possession of the place of worship originally built for the profession of principles from which the pursuers have not shown that the defenders have deviated; therefore, sustain the defences, and assoilzie; and in the counter-action of declarator, at the instance of the defenders Jedidiah Aikman and others, decern and declare in terms of the libel; but find no expenses due to either party."

The appellants, conceiving themselves to be aggrieved by this interlocutor, again appealed to the House of Lords.

The Lord Chancellor:—There is a cause which has been repeatedly before the House, and one of the most difficult and distressing which I ever met with; [539] I mean the cause of Craigdallie v. Aikman. This arose in a controversy, which seems to have very much engaged the feelings of the different parties. The question was, who were entitled to the use of a chapel, which had been built, partly by previous subscription, partly by money received at the doors of the chapel after it was built, and partly by money subscribed in several different ways? The history of the case may be stated without going at great length into the transactions. There having been a secession from the established church of Scotland, a question arose between these parties, who are seceders, whether this chapel, which had been erected for the use of one particular class of seceders from the established church, belonged to the one party or the other? And this suit was instituted for the purpose of having it determined, to whom the property in this chapel belonged, or rather who were to have the use of it; because the origin of the chapel, and the manner in which it was purchased, left it one of the most difficult things in the world to determine where the property rested.

When this matter was formerly before the House, we acted upon this principle, that if we could find out what were the religious principles of those who originally attended the chapel, we should hold the building appropriated to the use of persons who adhere to the same religious principles; and in that view, it became necessary to determine whether any, and if so, which of the persons, who were contending for the use of this place of worship, adhered to or had ceased to adhere to those which were originally the religious principles which led to the establishment of this place of worship, with a view to deter-[540]-mine what was to be done if the right principle was to appropriate the building to those who continued to hold those religious principles, and were in communion with those who did so. By the judgment of the House in 1813, it is found that the ground and buildings in question were purchased and erected, with intent that the same should be used and employed for the purposes of religious worship, by a number of persons agreeing at the time in their religious opinions and persuasions, and therefore intending to continue in communion with each other; and that the society of such persons acceded to a body, termed in the pleadings "the Associate Synod." That it does not expressly appear as matter of fact, for what purposes it was intended, at the time such purchase and erections were made, or at the time such accession took place, that the said ground and buildings should be used and enjoyed, in case the whole body of persons using and enjoying the same should change their religious principles and persuasions; or if, in consequence of the adherence of some of such persons to their original religious principles and persuasions, and the non-adherence of others of them thereto, such persons should cease to agree in their religious principles and persuasions, and should cease to continue in communion with each other, and should cease either as the whole body, or as to any part of the members composing the same, to adhere to the body termed in the pleadings, "the Associate Synod." By this judgment it was intended, that the congregation originally, if I may so represent them, were persons who adhered to the doctrines of what is known in Scotland by the name of the Associate Synod. This place for [541] religious worship being built by the contributions of a great many persons, adhering to the doctrines of the Associate Synod. If the whole body of those who now frequent the place, no longer adhered to the doctrines held by the Associate Synod, then it became a question for whom, at present, this building should be held in trust, which was purchased by money originally subscribed by those who held the opinion of that synod. The question then would be, whether any of the members now desiring to have the use of this place of religious worship, could be considered as entitled to the use of a building purchased by persons adhering to those religious opinions? And supposing that there is a division of religious opinions in the persons at present wishing to enjoy this building, the question then would be, which of them adhered to the opinions of those who had built the place of worship, and which of them differed from those opinions? Those who still adhered to those religious principles being more properly to be considered as the cestui que trusts of those who held this place of worship in trust, than those who have departed altogether from the religious principles of those who founded this place, if I may so express it.

I cannot read this judgment of the House without your perceiving, that the House felt infinite difficulty how to proceed with a case so very singularly circumstanced as this was; but, however, it was remitted to the Court of Session; and being remitted to the Court of Session, the appellants presented a petition to the First Division of the Court, praying their Lordships to review the interlocutors having [542] regard to the proceedings of this House; and in the mean time, to find that the petitioners, and those who adhered to them, should have exclusive possession of the meeting-house in question; or, at all events, to find that they were entitled to possession for the forenoon, and for the afternoon and evening of each Sunday, alternately; or to grant to the petitioners such other relief in the premises as the Court should think fit. The Court, however, found itself under the same difficulty as this House, in order to know what it should decree; and accordingly, they appointed the appellants to lodge a condescendence of such facts and circumstances as appeared to them right to be ascertained, in order to the application of the remit from the House of Lords.

The appellants accordingly gave in a condescendence, which was followed by different pleadings; and in those pleadings it was maintained, that a certain preamble, which has been very much heard of in the course of the cause, was in perfect harmony with the original, and the strictest principles of the association; and that, at all events, it was originally proposed by the appellants themselves, and was ultimately adopted merely in consequence of their zeal in its behalf.

The Court pronounced an interlocutor,* in which it describes the utter impossibility of seeing any thing like what was intelligible in the proceeding; and I do not know how this House is to relieve the [543] parties from the consequence. The Court of Session, in Scotland, were full as likely to know what were the principles and standards of the Associate Presbytery and Synod of Scotland, as any of your Lordships; and are as well, if not better than your Lordships, able to decide whether any acts done, or opinions professed by the defenders, Jedidiah Aikman and others, were opinions and facts which were a deviation, on the part of the defenders, from the principles and standards of the Associate Presbytery and Synod. If they were obliged to qualify their finding, as they do, intimating that they doubt whether they understood the subject at all under the words, "as far as they are capable of understanding the subject;" I hope I may be permitted, without offence to you, to say that there may be some doubt whether we understand the subject, not only because the Court of Session was much more likely to understand the matter than we are; but because I have had the mortification, I know not how many times over, to endeavour myself to understand what these principles were, and whether they have, or have not, deviated from them; and I have made the attempt to understand it, till I find it, at least, on my part to be quite hopeless.

The questions, therefore, in this case are, whether the interlocutors by which the defences are sustained, and these parties assoilzied, are right? And, to be sure, if they cannot show that the defenders, or any of them, had departed from the original standard and principles of their association, and if the Court is satisfied that the pursuers have not departed from these principles, but have thought proper, volun-[544]-tarily, to separate from the congregation to which they belonged, the inquiries directed by the judgment of the House would be altogether unnecessary; for the inquiries directed by that judgment aimed at having it ascertained, whether the defenders and pursuers, or either, and if so, which of them, had departed from the original principles of the congregation? and according to what the Court of Session now tell us, they cannot find out, nor has either party enabled them to find out, that either the one or the other had departed from the original principles of their association; and the consequence of that is, that those who have not attended the meeting, but who are yet insisting that they have interests in the property in which the meeting is held, are to be considered as persons voluntarily separating themselves from the congregation without cause: and all I can say upon the subject is, that after racking my mind again and again upon the subject, I really do not know what more to make of it.

On the other part of the interlocutor I entertain a doubt, namely, upon that part of it whereby, "in the counter-action of declarator, at the instance of the defenders Aikman and others, they decern and declare in terms of the libel;" in which terms, among other things prayed, are, that those defenders may forfeit all their interest in the property. Now I can conceive that, consistently with the declaration contained in this interlocutor, there being no difference of religious opinion among those persons, as far as the Court of Session could understand the subject, that it might be right to decern in the terms of the libel; namely, that those who are now engaged in [545] the worship, according to these religious opinions and religious principles, the same in the judgment of the Court of Session should not be disturbed in that religious worship; but I doubt extremely, whether, on the other hand, if the parties had interest, I mean interest in the lands and buildings, you can go further than to say, that they shall permit the religious worship to proceed as it has hitherto proceeded; and that they shall not make use of the interest they have in the land and buildings to prevent that. But it would be going a great way to say, that because they have for the present separated from the rest of the congregation, and although this very interlocutor finds there is no difference of opinion between them, that you should take out of them, if they have in them, any interest in the lands and buildings, etc. You may direct that land and those buildings to be enjoyed for the purposes to which they were originally devoted; but if they have any interest in the land and buildings, I doubt very much the propriety of a declaration, that they have forfeited that interest. That does not appear to me at this moment necessary to make good the effect of the interlocutor; but I will take it into further consideration till Friday.

The Lord Chancellor: In that case of Craigdallie and Aikman, there was one point which I reserved in some measure for further consideration; but in looking through the case again, my opinion is, that I shall act most properly in advising you to affirm that judgment generally.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION (FIRST DIVISION).

ALEXANDER M'DONALD,—Appellant; ALEXANDER ROSS and others,
Respondents [19th July, 1820].

[See Tidcombe v. Cholmley (1701), Colles, p. 166, and note thereto.]

Army Agents having distinct accounts with the Colonel and the Paymaster of a regiment, upon the assurance of the Paymaster that he was authorized by the Colonel, and on his account, to provide certain articles for the regiment, transfer to the debit of the Colonel a sum standing in their books, originally debited to the Paymaster; and having settled accounts, and received the balance due from the Paymaster, sue the Colonel for the balance claimed as due from him, including the sum upon the debit transferred. Pending this action the Paymaster, on the requisition of the Agents, furnishes them with a letter from the Colonel, as the authority for the charge against him. The Agents being fully satisfied as to the meaning and extent of this authority, in the course of their pleadings maintain, strenuously, the right of the Paymaster to act under it; and judgment, in the first instance, is given in their favour. After they had obtained this judgment, apprehending the possibility that it might be reversed, they retransfer the sum in dispute from the debit of the Colonel to the debit of the Paymaster, giving him notice of that fact, and of the proceedings in and state of the action against the Colonel. The former judgment, on representation, was reversed; and it was held, by the Court below, and the House of Lords on Appeal, that the Agents were entitled in an action of relief against the Paymaster, to recover the sum in dispute, and the costs of the action against the Colonel.

If an action is brought for the benefit and through the intervention of another, he is bound to bear the costs of the action.

[543] On the 14th of August 1794, Alexander McDonell of Glengary, being authorized by government to raise a regiment of Highland fencible infantry, appointed the Respondents Ross and Ogilvie agents for the regiment. The appellant was about the same time appointed paymaster, of which Glengary apprised the respondents Ross and Ogilvie by a letter, dated in August 1794, by which he also directed them "to honour all drafts which might be drawn by the appellant as paymaster, and to pay no attention to the drafts of any other person, nor to issue money to them." This letter was mislaid, and not produced in the cause.

The regiment was not completed and embodied till May 1795; and during the intermediate period the Appellant, as paymaster, drew bills upon Ross and Ogilvie, as agents, to a large amount, for the use of the regiment, without specifying the different heads of service to which these drafts were to be applied. After the regiment was embodied the appellant was continued as paymaster, and went on as before, drawing generally on account of the regiment, without specifying the different heads of service for which he drew; the drafts in the mean time stood at his debit in their books, he being entitled to a counter credit when the particular distributions should be rendered.

The money issued by government on account of a regiment, consists of, first, the levy money for recruits; secondly, the pay and subsistence to officers and men; thirdly, contingent money for incidental expenses, such as stationery, removing [549] baggage, etc.; and, lastly, money for furnishing regular clothing and accoutrements.

The levy money is issued to the agents, and is drawn for by the colonel, or any person whose drafts on that account he authorizes to be answered. In the letter of service the levy money to be allowed is specified, and a general letter of instructions accompanies it, directing a part to be retained from each recruit, for providing slop clothing and necessaries. This is done by the officer who enlists him. He generally does so, by obtaining the articles from the regimental store, and paying for it out of the retained bounty. With the original furnishing, or subsequently replacing of these necessaries, the colonel has no concern.

The pay and subsistence of the men is also issued to the agents, and drawn from them by the paymaster. The colonel has no power to draw for this money.

The contingent accounts, in like manner, are to be drawn for monthly by the paymaster; the commanding officer certifying that the account is correctly stated.

The money issued for the regular clothing and accoutrements is termed the off- reckonings. It amounts to more than is absolutely necessary for that purpose, and forms part of the emoluments of the colonel: it is the property of the colonel alone; and the paymaster-general will not pay any part of this money without an assignment of it from the colonel. When the assignment is in favour of the agents, as is usually the case, a separate [550] account is opened for it, termed the Clothing Account.

This fund is kept separate for the colonel; it is not paid into his personal account for pay and subsistence; and no person can draw upon it without express power from him to do so.

Army agents are bound to honour all drafts made by the paymaster in that capacity. These drafts are always in advance, and to account generally, without specifying the particular service to which the sums so drawn are to be applied. The drafts are placed to the debit of the paymaster until their accounts or distributions are transmitted, when the different articles are classed under their proper heads.

During the whole period of the appellant's continuing paymaster, the agents were in advance above the sums they received from government. Of these advances they complained to the paymaster, and requested him to send particular accounts of the application of the money. The paymaster, however, was not able to make out complete accounts of the different sums he had expended for the regiment; and matters continued in this state, the agents being constantly in advance for the regiment, till 1796, when the appellant resigned his situation as paymaster, and the colonel soon after resigned his commission. The agency of the regiment was transferred by the succeeding colonel from Ross and Ogilvie to McDonald, Bruce, and Co. on the 25th of December 1796. Immediately upon this change the appellant called upon the agents, to have his accounts adjusted, and exhibited to them the sub-[551]-joined Supplementary Distribution, or Account of Necessaries *, alleged to have been disbursed by him for the regiment during the year 1795, the balance amounting to £686 6s. 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in payment of which [552] he said he had applied the different sums drawn from the agents.

He required them to give him credit for this sum, and state it to the debit of the colonel, because it consisted of furnishings of that description, which the colonel was bound to furnish his regiment with from the fund called the off-reckonings, allotted by government for that purpose: and the appellant stated to them, that he had express orders from the colonel to pay all such accounts. The agents con-[553]-sequently allowed this sum as an article of credit to the appellant, and charged it against the colonel. But when a copy of the colonel's account was presented to his agent, an objection was made to the charge of £686 6s. 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. upon the ground that the articles of which it was composed were not necessary for the regiment, and had been bought without authority from the colonel.

N.B. If the allowance for watch coats from the 14th August to the 8th May is allowed by government, of course it will be put to the credit of this account.

[554] This objection the agents communicated by letter to the appellant, who, in his answer to them, stated, "that he had Glengary's order (a copy of which he would send them whenever he got his papers from Edinburgh) for whatever had been furnished, and requested them to make no alteration in their accounts."

In consequence of this communication with the appellant, the account in question was allowed to remain as it stood debited to the colonel, upon the presumption that the orders which the appellant had stated he held for furnishing these articles would be forthcoming, and would be obligatory upon the colonel. After placing this sum to the colonel's debit, the appellant made an arrangement with Ross and Ogilvie for the balance of his account; who, after again writing to the appellant to request that he would send them the order alluded to by him as a voucher for the charge against Glengary, raised an action against Glengary, for the payment of the balance of his account, including, inter alia, the amount of the necessaries already mentioned. In defence, Glengary stated, that this particular sum had been debited to him without proper authority, and that he was therefore not bound to pay it.

Upon this defence, Ross and Ogilvie again wrote to the appellant in these terms: "Your charge of £686 6s. 1½d. for necessaries furnished the Glengary Fencibles, being disputed by Mr. Alexander M'Donell of Glengary, we request you will have the goodness to transmit to Mr. Anderson, W.S. Edinburgh, the original instructions given you by Glengary, or any other document in your [555] possession, which may support any part of the same."

In consequence of this communication, the letter of instructions was produced by the appellant, and exhibited in the process against Glengary,—it is as follows:

"29th May 1795.

"Dear Sir: As I am about to leave this quarter for the North, in my absence it may save you further trouble to have these instructions to show, when you see it proper. You will be particular in your advancing money to officers, not exceed five guineas, as bounty, for each man brought and passed at the inspection, according to orders, in regard to appearance; and you will also, previous to the settling of their accounts, require to have the men paraded as furnished by each officer, and let those serjeants who were employed to recruit for me, as well as the Reverend Alexander M'Dowell, be there present, so as to establish their claims, and prevent future disputes. You will also be so good as to subsist the supernumerary serjeants of my appointment till vacancies occur, so as to relieve me of that burden. And I hereby beg of you to settle with the different men enlisted by me, or on my account by those so employed. As also, I authorize you to settle my private accounts, properly vouched, that may appear against me; as likewise those things ordered by my sister Miss M'Donell. You will also please to settle what appears proper to you in regard to the clothing and other appointments of the regiment. I have moreover to request of you to get all accounts for or against [556] me drawn up, whether between us, or between me and any other, in regard to my military transactions, or transactions whatever, subsequent to our first concerns; and by attending to all these things with all possible convenient dispatch, you will infinitely oblige. Dear sir, Yours, etc.
(signed) A. M'Donell."

Ross and Ogilvie considering this letter a sufficient authority to the appellant to furnish the necessaries in question, on the 8th of June 1802, proceeded with their action against Glengary.

In the course of the action against Glengary the respondents presented a petition, in which the following passage occurs:

"Glengary apprised Ross and Ogilvie of the paymaster's appointment, by a letter, dated August 1794 (which has unfortunately fallen aside), and directed them to honour all drafts which might be drawn by him the paymaster, and to pay no attention to the drafts of any other persons, or to issue money to them. The paymaster was not merely empowered to draw the pay and usual allowances of the regiment, but was also authorized, as has been admitted by the defender (M'Donell of Glengary) to uplift the levy money, the allowance for haversacks, and a variety of other allowances, with which, as paymaster, he had nothing to do. He was likewise empowered to draw the pay and allowances due to the colonel himself—a power which is seldom or never entrusted to the paymaster—and with these discharge the private accounts of Glengary. In short, this paymaster [557] acted as sole manager of the colonel, in all transactions relating to the regiment, whether falling within his own province or not; and during the experience of half a century, Ross and Ogilvie have never known an instance of such unlimited trust and confidence being placed in any person in a similar situation." In another part of their pleadings they express themselves as follows: "Glengary was desirous to shake himself loose, if possible, from his obligation to repay to the agents the money they had advanced the paymaster by his instruction, and upon his responsibility, and which had been applied to the use of the regiment. He did not pretend either that the money was not actually advanced by the agents, or that it had not been applied to the use of the regiment, but he insisted that the agents had no right to make the advances to the paymaster without his authority; his object was, to have the paymaster to deal with instead of Ross and Ogilvie; in which case he would have set against the advances the balance which he pretended to be due to him by the paymaster on his own private account. In this way he wished to roll over the agents upon the paymaster, when demanding payment of a sum admittedly advanced and applied to the use of the regiment, which was advanced solely on his responsibility, and for which he was at any rate liable, as colonel of the regiment. It was a matter of indifference to Ross and Ogilvie which of the two paid the advances they had made. Had they considered both equally liable, they would have preferred coming against the paymaster, who was [558] equally able to pay with the colonel, and whom they always found more willing to settle his accounts: but they considered the colonel as the party primarily liable to them, and they did not wish to lend themselves to a scheme which they conceived to be unjust, by refusing to give to the paymaster the credit to which he was entitled."

Lord Hermand, ordinary, pronounced judgment in their favour; but in consequence of some doubts which had arisen, in a letter, dated on the 6th of July 1806, and addressed to the appellant, Ross and Ogilvie apprised the appellant "that they had recharged to his account the sum of £686 6s. 1½d. for clothing disbursements, until allowed to them by the Court of Session."

On the 9th of July 1808, after reconsidering the case, Lord Hermand pronounced an interlocutor, sustaining the claim of Ross and Ogilvie. Against this interlocutor Glengary put in a representation; in which he asserted: 1st, That the furnishings comprising the account in question, neither were necessary for the regiment, nor were made by the appellant; and 2dly, That Ross and Ogilvie had not made any advance for payment of the necessaries, but had merely transferred the account in question from the debit of the appellant to Mr. M'Donell's debit, upon finding that the appellant was their debtor to the extent of £2000.

The Lord Ordinary thereupon appointed Ross and Ogilvie to explain "at what time, whether it was while they continued agents for the Glengary regiment, or after the agency was transferred to another house, that they placed the account of [559] £686 6s. 1½d. now pursued for, to the representer's debit. As also, whether they actually paid that account in any other way than by placing it to the credit of the paymaster."

In the answer to this representation, Ross and Ogilvie stated to the Lord Ordinary, that owing to the great embarrassment and confusion into which their bankruptcy had thrown their affairs, their agent had not been able to get sufficient information within the short space limited for giving in the answers, to enable them to reply pointedly to the interrogatories put by the Lord Ordinary. Ross and Ogilvie endeavoured to show that these new averments made by Glengary were not only altogether unfounded, but were contradicted by his former admissions in the cause. Upon advising the representation, with answers, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, by which he found, "That prior to the regulations 1798, as stated in other cases, which have occurred subsequent to the interlocutor represented against, paymasters were appointed by the colonel, or by the field officers and captains jointly, though in the circumstances of this case it is immaterial in which of these ways the paymaster of the Glengary regiment may have been appointed: Finds, that in so far as concerns the business of the regiment, no extraordinary powers were conferred on Lyndale, the original paymaster, by the letter of the 29th May 1795, relating chiefly to the settlement of accounts already contracted, nor any thing more than would have been implied from the nature of his office, and in particular that it did not empower him to draw upon the respon-[560]-dents for the expense of alleged furnishings out of the off- reckonings, a construction confirmed by the conduct of Lyndale himself, who cannot be presumed to have lain out of so large a sum as £686 6s. 1d. sterling, the amount of the account objected to, as well as by the conduct of the pursuers, who, while they continued agents for the regiment, did not state that account to the debit of the representer: Finds it stated by the representer, and not denied, that Lyndale was removed from the office of paymaster in June 1796, and that in July thereafter, the representer resigned the regiment; after which the new colonel transferred the agency from the pursuers to McDonald, Bruce, and Co. London: Finds it instructed by the books of the respondents, that the account in question was not paid on or before the 30th September 1796, seeing that account is not stated in the account rendered upon that day: Finds that by the deliverance on the representation, the respondents were directed to say explicitly at what time, whether it was while they continued agents for the Glengary regiment, or after the agency was transferred to another house, that they placed the account of £686 6s. 1d. now pursued for, to the respondents' debit; as also, whether they actually paid that account in any other way than by placing it to the credit of the paymaster: Finds that no direct answer has been made to these plain questions, which are evaded on the ground of the want of information from the respondents themselves, or their agents in London, whence it was to be inferred that no safe answer could be given: Finds [561] that the account £686 6s. 1d. was not placed to the representer's debit till after the respondents had been deprived of their agency, as well as that said account was not actually paid, but merely by an operation on the books transferred to the credit of the paymaster: Finds that the representer cannot be affected by such irregular transfer, alters the interlocutor represented against, sustains the defences so far as respects said account, and decerns, reserving to the respondents to state what balance, exclusive of said account, if any, be due to them."

Against this interlocutor the respondents Ross and Ogilvie prepared a representation, and at the same time raised an action of relief against the appellant, in which they concluded that the defender should be decreed to repeat and pay back to the pursuers the foresaid sum of £686 6s. 1½d. with interest thereof since the same was credited to him, and also that he should be ordained to make payment to the pursuers of "the expenses of the foresaid action presently depending against the said Alexander McDonnell of Glengary, and which hitherto have been wholly incurred in discussing objections to payment of the foresaid sum," and of the expenses of this action.

This action being brought into Court, various orders were made upon the defender to put in defences.

In the meantime Lord Hermand, in the action against Glengary, refused the representation for the respondents, and adhered to his former interlocutor.

The respondents prepared a petition against these [562] judgments of the Lord Ordinary, and at the same time they lodged a minute in the process against the appellant, in which, after mentioning the procedure in the process with Glengary, they state, "that, as Lord Hermand had adhered to his interlocutor before mentioned, upon advising a full representation and answers, a petition against his Lordship's judgment had been prepared and lodged yesterday, and will probably be under the consideration of the court to-morrow. A copy of that petition was herewith produced, that the defender in this action might see that the pursuers have done every thing in their power to make the claim against Glengary effectual, and might satisfy himself that the argument was properly stated; and, as it is unquestionable that, if the pursuers shall ultimately fail in recovering this sum from Glengary, the defender must make repetition to them of the foresaid account, credited to him on the faith that it was a proper charge against Glengary, he may hold himself in readiness to make repetition, or to take such steps to substantiate his charge against Glengary as he may think advisable." Lord Armadale, ordinary, allowed this minute to be seen.

The petition for the respondents in the other action having been appointed to be answered, answers were given in for Glengary accordingly. Upon this the respondents lodged another minute in the process against the appellant, stating, "That upon the 23d October last, the agent for the pursuers had sent to the agent for the defender a copy of the answers which had been given in for Glengary to the said petition; but that, in order to prevent [563] the possibility of the defender's pleading ignorance of the proceedings in the original action, and that he might be prepared to obviate any statements in these answers which he judged erroneous, the pursuers now produced in process a printed copy of the answers for Glengary, and intimated to the defender that the case stood in the short roll of the First Division for determination upon the 2d of December."

The Lords of the First Division, upon advising the petition for the respondents, with answers, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found the respondents liable in expenses; whereupon the respondents enrolled the action, against which the present is an appeal, to ask decree against the defender.

The appellant gave in defences to the following effect:

"First, The defender does not conceive that Messrs. Ross and Ogilvie have any claim against him for advances made on account of the regiment raised by Glengary, as they were made to him in the capacity of paymaster and agent for Glengary.

"Secondly, Messrs. Ross and Ogilvie, by having mislaid the letter of credit lodged with them by Glengary in August 1794, lost their recourse on Glengary: by this their neglect the defendant ought not to suffer.

"Thirdly, If Messrs. Ross and Ogilvie had disallowed the articles in the defender's account when it was claimed, he would have recovered the money from the regiment, which he cannot now do.

"Fourthly, This claim is prescribed."

[564] When the case was debated before the Lord Ordinary, he pronounced an interlocutor, by which, in respect of the contingency between this action and the original action, still in dependence before the First Division of the Court, he made avizandum with the cause to the Lords of that division; and gave directions that the case might be reported.

The case was accordingly reported, and the following judgment was pronounced:

"Upon report of the Lord President, and having advised the mutual informations of the parties, the Lords repel the defences, find the defender liable in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and decern, find expenses due, and allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

The appellant preferred a reclaiming petition against the interlocutor above recited; but it was refused without answers.

Against this interlocutor the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants, Mr. Charles Warren, Mr. Robert Grant.

For the Respondents, Mr. Scarlett, Mr. West (now Sir Edward West, Chief Justice of Bombay).

The Lord Chancellor:—This case involves two questions; the first is, Whether, under the circumstances of the case, Mr. M'Donald was liable to pay Messrs. Ross and Ogilvie the amount of money demanded by their summons? The next question is, Whether, supposing the Court of Session to have been right in awarding payment by him of that sum, [565] they ought to have charged him with the expenses of the antecedent proceeding, by which the now respondents sought to charge with that debt M'Donell of Glengary?

When it was argued at the bar, it appeared to me proper in this case, attending to all the circumstances of it, that we should have time to consider it. I had more doubt with respect to the point, whether this appellant ought to have been charged with the expenses of the antecedent proceeding, than on the question, whether he should be charged with the sum of six hundred and odd pounds: but on looking at it again and again, I offer it to you as my opinion, that the decision of the Court of Session is right on both points. In the first place, I think the appellant is chargeable in the account, under the circumstances here stated, at the suit of these respondents; and looking at the whole nature of the proceeding in the action that was brought against Glengary, as a principal, it appears to me that is fairly to be considered as an action for the benefit and behoof, and in a great measure through their intervention, the action of Mr. M'Donald himself, and that therefore he ought to pay the costs of that action. The consequence of that is, that on moving, according to the forms of this House, for a reversal of this judgment, for my own part I must say, Non-content, meaning thereby that the judgment should be affirmed, but without costs.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

By ORIGINAL APPEAL.

MARIA RYLANDS and RICHARD FRANKLIN GOUGH, Appellants; The Right honourable DAVID LATOUCHE, PETER LATOUCHE the elder, ROBERT LATOUCHE, and JOHN LATOUCHE, Esqrs.,—Respondents.

By REVIVOR AND AMENDMENT.

MARIA RYLANDS, RICHARD FRANKLIN GOUGH, and JOHN FRANKLIN, Appellants; PETER LATOUCHE, and ROBERT LATOUCHE, and GEORGE LATOUCHE, JOHN DAVID LATOUCHE, and PETER LATOUCHE the younger, Esqrs.,—Respondents [19th July 1820].

[Mews' Dig. i. 335: ix. 1500, 1831.]

A suit having been instituted by a devisor and revived by a party as devisee, whose supposed right is displaced by the discovery of a later will, the cause cannot be continued for the benefit of the effective devisee, by agreement between that devisee and the plaintiff in the suit, so as to enable the devisee under the second will (not being a party to the suit) to appeal against the decree; and an appeal cause cannot be heard before the Court of Appeal until he is made a party in the suit below.

In such a case, where the suit had been originally instituted by the devisor, and upon his death revived by the party claiming under the first will, scilicet, that the proper course to be adopted by the devisee under the second, is not (as in this case) to file a supplemental bill, praying to have the benefit of the proceedings in the revived suit, but to revive, de novo, the suit as abated on the death of the devisor.

[567] The case is different where a decree is defective only because incidental parties are not before the Court; as in the case of an assignment in trust for payment of debts, reserving the surplus if the assignee obtains a decree, and afterwards it appears that he had assigned his interest before the decree, his assignees may, by supplemental bill, have the benefit of that decree. (Scotch Binks v. Binks, note p. 593.)

A decree for redemption and general account, etc. having been made in the original and revived causes in favour of the supposed devisee, it cannot be restricted in the supplemental suit to an account to be taken as between the executors and mortgagees, etc. to the time of the death of the devisor, dismissing the bill as it regards the interest of the devisee: for the devisee is a necessary party to the account.

The devisee having taken the benefit of an insolvent act, and made the assignee a party to the suit, who, by his answer, disclaimed all knowledge of the assignment, and refused to undertake the trust for the creditors, he cannot be compelled to act, and the suit remains imperfect until another assignee is appointed and made a party.

A decree made in such a state of the cause is erroneous.

* In and before the year 1803, Thomas Gough, the father of the appellant Maria Rylands, was seised and possessed of lands which he held for lives under John Latouche as head landlord. At the same date John, David and Peter Latouche, carried on business as bankers, and being creditors of Gough upon a bill of exchange, brought an action against him, and obtained possession of the lands under a custodiam, which was granted to David Latouche. The custodiam proving unproductive, a mortgage [568] of the lands was executed by Thomas Gough to David Latouche, as trustee for the other partners, but without prejudice to the custodiam: and finally, after various transactions not material to the issue of this cause, the lands were sold by Gough to John Latouche, under alleged circumstances of fraud, duress, and oppression.

On the 8th of November 1803, Thomas Gough filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against David, John, and Peter Latouche, stating several transactions of debt, outlawry, mortgage, and sale, (as before in part set forth), impeaching the sale for fraud, and praying that the respondents might account for the rents and profits of the lands, and that he might be restored to the possession on the usual terms of redemption.

The defendants by their answer, insisted on the fairness of the transactions, and the validity of the sale.

Gough died pending the cause, in November 1804, leaving a will dated the 19th of August 1804, by which he devised property, including the lands in question, to John Hamilton and William Crawford, in trust for the appellant Maria, then a minor, and appointed Hamilton and Crawford his executors. Hamilton and Crawford proved the will, and with the appellant Maria, by her testamentary guardians, revived the suit, which afterwards by order, made on her attaining twenty-one, was carried on in her own name.

After the reviving of the suit, it was discovered that Gough had made another will, dated 30th of September 1804, by which he devised all his estates [569] to the appellant Richard Franklin Gough, charged with some legacies, and amongst others a legacy to the appellant Maria, and appointed the appellant Richard Franklin Gough residuary devisee and legatee.

The second will was established under a decree of the Court, obtained in a suit instituted by Richard Franklin Gough, who thereupon agreed with Maria Rylands and Hamilton and Crawford, that the suit which had been revived by them as above stated, should be continued in their names for the benefit of the appellant Richard Franklin Gough.

The cause was prosecuted accordingly, and the plaintiffs and defendants respectively having examined witnesses on the questions at issue, the cause was heard before Lord Chancellor Ponsonby on the pleadings and proofs: and on the 28th of June 1806, it was decreed, that under the circumstances of the case the deed of sale dated the 1st of August 1786, ought to be deemed fraudulent and void as against the plaintiffs in the cause: and accordingly, that the same should be brought in and cancelled, and that the plaintiffs should be entitled to a redemption of the mortgage of the 25th of October 1783, on payment of the balance (if any) which should appear to be due on the foot of the same: and that it should be referred to a master to take an account of the sums due to the defendants, David, John, and Peter Latouche, on the foot of the mortgage: and also, an account of all sums advanced by the defendants, or any of them, as well in the discharge of the debts of Thomas Gough, as also of the sums paid to him or for his use, and [570] by his desire, in his lifetime: and that the master should also take an account of what the defendants, or any of them, had received, or without their wilful default might have received, out of the mortgaged premises, from the 9th of July 1781, being the time when they entered into possession thereof under the custodiam: and that the rent reserved by any lease, which should appear to have been bonâ fide made by the defendants, should be charged from the date thereof, and that the master should set a fair rent on the other parts of the premises: and that in taking the accounts, the master should set off the sums with which the defendants should be chargeable, first in discharging the interest, and next the principal of their demands: and thereupon should strike a balance, and the costs and further directions were reserved until the return of the master's report.

The cause was afterwards re-heard before Lord Chancellor Ponsonby, on the petition of John Latouche: and on the 29th of April 1807, it was ordered that the former decree should be affirmed.

By the report on the 23d of December 1807, the master upon the whole of the accounts found that there was a balance of £6286 17s. 1d. due to the plaintiffs on the day of his report. Against this report several exceptions were taken by the defendants, on the ground that the master, in taking the accounts, had not received certain statements copied and signed by Gough as evidence against the plaintiffs.

On this ground most of the exceptions were allowed, and upon reference back to the master to review his report according to rules made on hearing the exceptions, he found by his amended report, [571] that after all credits and allowances there was a balance due to the defendants of £4755 ls. 9d. Against this amended report both plaintiffs and defendants filed exceptions, which were over-ruled by decree on further directions, on the 27th of June 1808, whereby it was ordered that the balance found due by the amended report should be paid with interest in three months, and thereupon possession of the lands, with the title deeds, be given to the plaintiffs, and in default of payment the bill to be dismissed. This sum, according to the decree, was paid by R. F. Gough.

Hamilton and Crawford died after the date of this decree, leaving the appellant Maria the only plaintiff on the record. John Latouche also died after the decree and before the appeal, leaving Robert Latouche his heir at law, and Robert and John Latouche his executors. In January 1812, Robert and John Latouche appealed against the decrees of June 1806, and April 1807, but withdrew their appeal in March 1812. Maria Rylands (together with R. F. Gough) appealed against the order of the 23d of March 1808, and the decree of the 27th of June 1808.

After the appeal was presented, the cause abated by the death of the respondent David Latouche, and was revived against the respondents George Latouche, John David Latouche, and Peter Latouche the younger, who were executors, and obtained probate of the will of David Latouche.

On the 20th of May 1818, the appeal was called on for hearing, and on the statement of the appellant's counsel, (no counsel appearing for the respondent,) [572] cuts,) the House were of opinion that the appellant, Richard Franklin Gough, ought to have been made a party to the suit in Ireland, which could not, by agreement, be carried on for his benefit, and on this ground adjourned the appeal sine die: directing by their order, that the appellants should be at liberty to take such proceedings in the Court of Chancery in Ireland as they might be advised, to make the proper persons parties to the cause there, and to bring all proper parties before the House.

After the decree had been made which established the last will of Thomas Gough, the appellants Richard Franklin Gough, and John Franklin, who had been appointed executors, obtained probate of that will from the Court of Prerogative in Ireland.

The appellant, Richard Franklin Gough, afterwards took the benefit of an Act passed in the fifty-third year of the reign of Geo. 3, "for the relief of Insolvent Debtors in Ireland."

On the 7th of November 1818, the appellant, Richard Franklin Gough, exhibited a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the respondents, and against Henrietta Gough the surviving executrix of the first will of Thomas Gough, (the three other executors, namely, John Hamilton, William Crawford and George Lloyd being dead,) and against John Franklin, his co-executor under the second will, and Maria Rylands, and against John Massy, who was chosen assignee of his estate and effects under the said insolvent act: praying among other things, that Richard Franklin Gough and John Franklin might have the benefit of the suit instituted by Thomas Gough, and revived by John [573] Hamilton, William Crawford, George Lloyd, Henrietta Gough and Maria Rylands, and of all proceedings, orders and decrees in the original and revived suit, so that Richard Franklin Gough might be entitled to appeal therefrom.

The respondents put in a demurrer to the bill, which, on argument, was over-ruled by the Master of the Rolls: but other causes of demurrer, which were assigned ore tenus, having been allowed, the appellant Richard Franklin Gough appealed from this decision to the Lord Chancellor, who reversed the order of the Master of the Rolls.

On the 6th of April 1819, the respondent Robert Latouche filed his answer to this bill, and thereby contended that the appellant Richard Franklin Gough ought not to have the benefit of the decrees made in the revived cause, and that any right, or beneficial interest, which the appellant Richard Franklin Gough had in the cause, and the subject-matter thereof, were legally vested in John Massy.

On the 8th of April 1819, the defendant John Latouche answered the bill.

On the 24th of April 1819, the other respondents, Peter Latouche the elder, George Latouche, John David Latouche, and Peter Latouche the younger, answered the bill: and they as well as John Latouche, by their answers, raised the same objections as the respondent Robert Latouche had done to the relief sought by the bill of Richard Franklin Gough.

The several other parties, defendants, also answered the bill, and the defendant John Massy by his answer stated, that he was appointed assignee of the appellant Richard Franklin Gough's estate and [574] effects, without his knowledge, consent, or concurrence; that he never accepted the trust, nor acted under it; that he did not intend to undertake, and was desirous to be released from the trust.

The cause was afterwards set down on the bill and answers, and was heard before the Lord Chancellor on the 4th and 5th days of May 1819; and on the 10th of May it was decreed, "That as between the plaintiff and the defendants Robert Latouche, John Latouche, Peter Latouche the elder, George Latouche, John David Latouche, and Peter Latouche the younger, the plaintiff as executor of Thomas Gough, be, and he accordingly is hereby decreed, entitled to the benefit of the proceedings in the pleadings mentioned, as prayed by his bill. And it is further ordered, that as between the said plaintiff and said defendants, the remainder of plaintiff's bill, claiming as devisee of said Thomas Gough, be, and the same is hereby dismissed with costs, to be taxed by the master in this cause, against the plaintiff, and as to the defendant John Massy, assignee of Richard Franklin Gough, an insolvent in the pleadings named," it is further ordered, "that the plaintiff's bill in this cause, and all and every the matters and things therein contained, be, and the same are hereby dismissed, with costs, to be taxed by the master against the plaintiff."

On the 24th June 1819, it was ordered by the House on the petition of the appellants, that they should be at liberty to amend their original appeal, by making the appellant John Franklin a party appellant, which was accordingly done.

[575] The respondent John Latouche, one of the executors of the will of John Latouche the elder, died after the decree, leaving the respondent, Robert Latouche, surviving executor.

Under these circumstances, the appeal was again brought to hearing before the House in the year 1820.

For the Appellants, Mr. Horne, Mr. Blake (since appointed Deputy Remembrancer of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland). For the Respondents, Mr. Hart, Mr. Wetherell (since appointed Solicitor-general).

Lord Redesdale: This is a decree giving the benefit of the former decree to the plaintiff in his character of executor, which was an immaterial part of that decree. Substantially, it related to the interest claimed by the plaintiff in that suit as devisee; and the bill is dismissed as to the devisee, in whose absence the account cannot be taken.

The Lord Chancellor: The decree in the original suit was made upon the bill, and in favour of Maria Rylands. If she is not entitled to that decree, how can another person in a supplemental suit, professing to carry on the former suit, have the benefit of such a decree?

Lord Redesdale: The fact that Gough was insolvent and discharged by act of parliament, could not have been known to Lord Ponsonby. The decree dismissing the bill as to the right of the devisee, extinguishes the whole right of the appellant, and yet is not made a substantive ground of appeal. [576] This proceeding, looking to its origin, is on the appeal of Maria Rylands. In the original appeal Richard Franklin Gough was made an appellant, although he had nothing to do with the cause. For the purpose of making him appellant, it was then supposed that Maria Rylands had no interest. The House ought, on the former hearing, to have dismissed the appeal, without prejudice to any suit to be instituted by Richard Franklin Gough.

To the parties as executors the Court could only give the benefit of the decree in favour of Thomas Gough, so far as the account of receipts and payments to the time of his death extended.

Subsequent to the death of Thomas Gough his devisee became the party entitled, and as Richard Franklin Gough proves to be the devisee, he cannot have the benefit of proceedings in a former suit to which the party in that suit was not entitled. Such a decree might pass by consent, but not otherwise. Perhaps the appeal might stand over, with liberty to re-hear the cause on the supplemental suit. But another supplemental bill will be necessary to bring an assignee of Richard Franklin Gough before the Court. Then it must be considered whether you can be entitled to the supposed interest of Maria Rylands. The proper course would have been to revive the proceedings as they stood on the death of Thomas Gough.

Mr. Blake: There have been cases where third persons have been allowed to take the benefit of a decree.

Lord Redesdale: There is a difference between [577] the cases of persons who are incidental parties, as legatees, creditors, &c. and sole subsisting independent parties. Suppose the case of a bill to execute a trust to sell an estate for payment of debts, and a person is made a party as the representative of a surviving trustee, who proves not to be so; in such a case, if the suit is perfect in other respects, the error might perhaps be corrected, and the benefit of the proceedings had by a supplemental suit. But here is a substantial defect of parties.

Lord Redesdale: The suit in this case was instituted by Thomas Gough, and on his death revived by Maria Rylands, who obtained a decree. It had in the mean time been discovered, that the will under which she claimed as devisee had been superseded by a subsequent will, which was established by a decree of the Court, obtained in a suit instituted by Richard Franklin Gough, the devisee, in the second will. Then followed an agreement, which it was not competent to the parties to make, that Richard Franklin Gough should have the benefit of the suit pending on behalf of Maria Rylands in the character of devisee. The decree was made in the cause, and the appeal brought before the House substantially as the appeal of Maria Rylands, who had, in fact, no interest in the suit. The cause stood over, by permission of the House, to correct that mistake. A bill was then filed by Richard Franklin Gough against the Latouches, and the assignee of his estate, to have the benefit of the former suit. The decree upon that bill gives him the benefit of the former suit as executor. That, [578] at the utmost, can only extend to the accounts to be taken up to the time of the death of Thomas Gough. Beyond that interest the claim upon the former suit is a mere nullity. As to all other matters the bill is dismissed; and according to the decree, the title can be sustained in the character of executor only, and not as devisee. In addition to this difficulty, and supposing the title as devisee sustainable, the assignment under the insolvent act took all estate and right out of Richard Franklin Gough, and vested it in the assignee. On the hearing of the supplemental suit the assignee declared, that he had never assented to undertake the trust or administration of the insolvent estate. The law does not compel an acceptance of such a trust, and in consequence of this refusal on record, the parties are left in the same situation as if there had been no assignee. In this predicament how can you proceed? If the respondents had appealed, the House might have determined the question so far as you are entitled as executor; but, in fact, the present subject-matter of appeal respects the interest of a devisee, and not an executor.

Mr. Horne: We may have the benefit of the account if we assent to confine it to the lifetime of Thomas Gough.

Lord Redesdale: The Court has decreed, that a certain balance is due upon the mortgage. The executor, therefore, has no interest.

Mr. Horne: We ask as personal representatives the benefit of the original decree.

[579] Mr. Blake: The sum reported due has been paid but we seek to recover it; that must be by payment to the personal representatives.

Lord Redesdale: The original bill prays that the deed conveying the whole estate may be declared void. The decree accordingly, in the revived suit instituted by Maria Rylands in the character of devisee, declares the deed to be fraudulent and void, and directs accounts of all monies due on the mortgage, &c. and all rents and profits, &c. as on the claim of a devisee. The master takes the account of the rents and profits to the date of the report. To the sum reported due on the first report Maria Rylands could not have title as executrix, but as devisee. You now seek to have the benefit of the decree in that suit, which includes the rents and profit from the death of Thomas Gough.

Mr. Horne: We give up so much of the decree. The appellants contend that the mortgage debt was overpaid during the life of Thomas Gough by receipt of rents, and they claim to be entitled to the surplus.

Lord Redesdale: Why did the Court dismiss the bill as to the right of the devisee?

Mr. Blake: It was supposed that the question as to the realty was concluded, and there remained only a question of account.

Lord Redesdale: Instead of filing a bill to have [580] the benefit of the proceedings you should have revived the suit of Thomas Gough.

Mr. Horne: The conduct of the parties has given validity to the decree.

Mr. Hart: No such fact is put in issue.

Lord Redesdale: The account stated by the master, from the death of Gough in 1804, amounts to £ Suppose the House were of opinion that the report is right, we are sustaining the transaction without proper parties. This is in substance a decree for redemption. I do not see how it is possible to cure the defects of the case. If the respondents had appealed so far as the decree gives the benefit of the former proceedings, and the appellants so far as the bill is dismissed in respect of the rights of the devisee, some course might have been adopted. But in the actual state of the cause, supposing the House were of opinion that it is possible or probable that the principal and interest of the mortgage were liquidated by receipt of rents and profits during the life of Gough?

Mr. Horne: You might send the cause back to take the accounts.

Lord Redesdale: We could do no such thing in the absence of the devisee, or those to whom his right is transferred.

Mr. Blake: The bill was originally filed by [581] Maria Rylands as devisee, and the personal representatives also were parties. The cause might, perhaps, be reheard on the supplemental bill.

Lord Redesdale: The devisee or his representative must be a party.

Mr. Blake: In *Binks v. Binks in Chancery, August 1814, a mortgagee filed a bill for a sale under a trust. Before the decree he conveyed his whole interest, and his assignees were permitted to have the benefit of the decree which he obtained.

The Lord Chancellor: You have never heard of such a case before or since. I never heard of such a practice.

Lord Redesdale: The case of Binks v. Binks is not an authority in point. There the party assigned for payment of debts, reserving the surplus, and the assignee had an interest and right to prosecute the suit. There the decree was defective only because incidental parties were not before the Court. Here the party prosecuting the suit had no interest according to the case made by the bill, and no right to the decree. It seems to me impossible to dispose of the case in its present circumstances; the question in substance being, whether Richard Franklin Gough is entitled to recover from the respondent a sum which he paid representing Maria Rylands as a devisee. The estate is only redeemable by the de-[582]-visee, or those who claim in his right, and how can the cause proceed without a nominal assignee, at least, to represent the creditors?

Lord Redesdale: This case was first before the House in 1818. We were then embarrassed by the state of it.† According to the state of the pleadings at that time, Maria Rylands appeared to have the whole beneficial interest, but in fact had only a legacy under the second will, which the parties agreed to keep out of view in that suit, and to continue the proceedings for the benefit of Richard Franklin Gough. The decree was for accounts and redemption in favour of Maria Rylands, as devisee, and the other plaintiffs as executors under the first will of Thomas Gough. On the ground of this private agreement Richard Franklin Gough made himself a party to the original appeal, stating the second will and the agreement. Under these circumstances the House, finding it impossible to proceed on such an agreement, retained the appeal, giving liberty to the parties to supply the defects of their case by such proceedings as they might be advised to institute. A suit was thereupon commenced by Richard Franklin Gough. The cause was heard on the 10th of May 1819, and the decree declares the plaintiff to be entitled as executor of Thomas Gough inaccurately, for he was not sole executor. It declares, that as such he is entitled to [583] the benefit of the former decree, that is, of all the proceedings: as to the rest

* See the note at the end of the case, where an abstract of the facts of this case is given from the Registrar's book.

† Here the noble lord stated the facts from the pleadings as they were set forth in the appeal cases, according to which it appeared that Richard Franklin Gough, who had made himself a party to the original appeal, had no interest in the property of the prayer, the bill is dismissed. The decree, therefore, appears to be in favour of one of two subsisting executors; and the claim of the plaintiff in that suit as devisee is dismissed, both as against Messrs. Latouche and Massey the assignee. This is a singular mode of proceeding. Supposing Richard Franklin Gough entitled in this suit as one of two executors, something was necessary to be done as to the co-executor; and it seems that the parties are conscious of this defect, as they have made him a party to the appeal. The whole proceeding has been so strangely managed that it becomes difficult to know what course ought to be pursued. In the court below it has been declared that Richard Franklin Gough is entitled to the benefit of the proceedings in the former suit. But the question material for consideration is, whether we have before the House proper parties to maintain the interests mentioned in the appeal? What is the nature of the suit? A bill to have the benefit of former proceedings, not to carry on the unexecuted part of a decree, but to continue the whole for the purpose of reversing a part. The facts require attention; * and the difference in characters and relations of the defendants. David Latouche was mortgagee and custodee; John Latouche was head landlord and purchaser of the lands. The [584] original decree declared the purchase void as against Maria Rylands and her trustees, under the first will, who were also executors. The decree undoubtedly operated upon them in their characters of personal representatives, but in substance was founded on their rights as devisees, under the first will of Thomas Gough. It could stand upon no other right. As executors they might be required to discharge the debt on the mortgage security. But the decree declared the plaintiffs in that suit to be entitled to a redemption of the lands, on payment of the balance (if any) due on the mortgage. To that relief, and to have the purchase declared fraudulent and void, they could only be entitled as devisees in trust. As to that part of the decree, John Latouche, as purchaser, was the only defendant interested. David Latouche was mortgagee and custodee, and the account directed was general; comprehending all these parties without distinction, although standing in such different rights and characters. This confusion might be a matter of indifference to the defendants, who being connected, might adjust the accounts between themselves; but for the sake of regularity in the administration of justice, it is to be regretted that decrees in Ireland are so imperfectly drawn up. The effect of the decree was to make the estate redeemable, according to the result of the account. The suit was instituted in respect of real estate, which was first mortgaged and afterwards sold. It was to be reconveyed, on payment of what should appear to be due on balance of all the accounts. On taking the accounts, which of necessity comprised rents accrued since the death of Gough [585] in 1801, a balance was found due to the plaintiffs. Exceptions to this report were filed, on the ground that the account was improperly taken, and these exceptions were in part allowed. Upon the second report the balance was in favour of the defendants; and it is observable, that in the schedule to this second report the master charges the defendants with rents received since the death of Thomas Gough. After the decree, founded upon the second report, was pronounced, Richard Franklin Gough paid what was found due upon the accounts, and took a reconveyance of the estate. After this payment and reconveyance the appeal is presented against the orders by which the exceptions are allowed in favour of the Respondents, and the object of the Appellants is to have these orders reversed, and the former report re-established. The proceedings are so irregular that it is difficult to know how to deal with the case. The original decree cannot be carried into execution for the benefit of the plaintiffs in the supplemental suit, for it was void as a proceeding, by parties having no interest. Upon the subject of costs it may be fit to consider that the respondents have been improperly put to expense, in consequence of the appellants having concealed the fact that a later will existed. The appeal in its present state cannot be heard for the purpose of deciding whether the account is properly taken, what is the balance, and to which party due. Those are inquiries which cannot be made without considering the title, and in the absence of the devisee; yet the bill being instituted by Richard

* Here the noble lord read the facts from the case, as shortly stated in the beginning of the Report. Many of the facts stated in the bill to make a case of oppression, which formed the ground of the original suit, are omitted in the report, as being irrelevant to the points before the House.

Franklin Gough in that character, it is declared that he has no title as [586] devisee to the benefit of the proceedings, but only as executor. It has been dismissed, and that is not made the ground of appeal. As executor the appellant cannot be entitled to the benefit of the proceedings. It is difficult to frame any order in such a case. It would have been better if the former appeal had been at once dismissed. It was retained as an indulgence to the parties, to give an opportunity of making their case perfect. They have not done so: and the House can give no judgment on the merits of the case: but an order may be pronounced in terms which point out to the parties the errors in their proceedings, that they may now endeavour to correct them. It might be to the following effect * :

"The matter of the revived and amended petition of appeal, wherein Maria Rylands, Richard Franklin Gough and John Franklin, are Appellants, and Peter Latouche, Robert Latouche, George Latouche, John David Latouche and Peter Latouche, junior, are Respondents, having come on to be heard before this House, and it appearing to the House, from the petition of appeal and the cases delivered on the part of the Appellants, and the proceedings of the Court of Chancery in Ireland delivered to the House, that the original petition of appeal had been presented by Maria Rylands, widow, and Richard Franklin Gough, only complaining of an order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, bearing date the 23d of [587] March 1808, and a decree of the said Court, bearing date the 27th of June 1808, made in a cause in which the said Maria Rylands, John Hamilton and William Crawford, were plaintiffs, and the Right Honourable David Latouche and others were defendants, and that Richard Franklin Gough, who was named in the case delivered on the part of the Appellants as a joint appellant with the said Maria Rylands, was no party to the said cause in which such order and decree so appealed from were pronounced: and it also appearing to the House that the proceedings in the said cause were founded on an original bill filed by Thomas Gough, deceased, against the said David Latouche, John Latouche, and others, impeaching a sale and conveyance made by the said Thomas Gough to the said John Latouche, and a mortgage made by him to the said David Latouche of divers lands in the county of the city of Limerick, which the said Thomas Gough held by lease for lives, with a covenant for perpetual renewal of such lease, and that the said Thomas Gough having died before the said cause had been brought to a hearing, the said Maria Rylands claiming to be beneficial devisee of the said lands under the will of the said Thomas Gough, and the said John Hamilton and William Crawford claiming to be executors of such will, and the only executors who had proved the same in the Ecclesiastical Court, and George Lloyd and Henrietta Gough, two other executors named in the said will, had filed a bill of revivor and supplement, founded on the said bill filed by the said Thomas Gough, and had, claiming in [588] those rights on the 28th of June 1806, obtained a decree of the said Court of Chancery, setting aside the conveyance of the said leasehold estate, and ordering divers accounts to be taken between the parties to such suit, and that the said order of the 23d of March 1808, and the said decree of the 27th of June 1808, had been made in such cause, in which the said Richard Franklin Gough had been a party, but having been struck out by amendment, was no party at the hearing: and it appearing by a bill filed by the said Richard Franklin Gough against the said Maria Rylands and others, that the will of the said Thomas Gough, under which the said Maria Rylands, John Hamilton and William Crawford, claimed, had been revoked by a subsequent will, by which the real and personal property of the said Thomas Gough had been devised to the said Richard Franklin Gough: and the said Richard Franklin Gough and John Franklin (who has now made himself a party to the said petition of appeal by amendment, together with the said Maria Rylands and Richard Franklin Gough) had been appointed executors of such will, and had proved the same, and that therefore neither the said Maria Rylands nor the said John Hamilton or William Crawford, as devisees and executors of the said Thomas Gough, or the said George Lloyd and Henrietta Gough, had any right to revive the suit so instituted by the said Thomas Gough as his devisees, but that

* This order was proposed for the consideration of the House, but it was not moved, and does not appear in the journals. The cause has since abated by the death of one of the parties, and has not been again before the House.

such right was (as now appears) vested in the said Richard Franklin Gough, and that the said Richard Franklin Gough and John Franklin are [589] the executors and personal representatives of the said Thomas Gough; and the matter of the said petition of appeal presented by the said Maria Rylands and Richard Franklin Gough having been called on to be heard before the House on the 20th of May 1818, and it appearing to the House that under the circumstances then disclosed the House could not properly proceed to hear the matter of the said appeal, and having therefore adjourned the consideration thereof, and on the 10th day of June 1818, ordered that the parties should be at liberty to take such proceedings in the Court of Chancery in Ireland as they might be advised, in order to make proper parties to the cause, and bring all proper parties before the House; and it appearing to the House that the said Richard Franklin Gough afterwards filed a bill in the said Court of Chancery in Ireland against the Respondents and against the said Maria Rylands and John Franklin, and against John Massey, chosen assignee of the estate and effects of the said Richard Franklin Gough, who had been discharged from prison under an act of the 53d year of his late Majesty's reign, for relief of insolvent debtors, praying that he might have the benefit of the suit instituted by the said Thomas Gough, and revived by the said Maria Rylands and others, and of all proceedings, orders, and decrees in the said original and revived suit, so that the said Richard Franklin Gough might be entitled to appeal therefrom; and it appearing that such cause was heard in the said Court on the 10th day of May 1819, when it was decreed, that as between the plaintiff [590] Richard Franklin Gough, and the defendants Robert Latouche, and others, Respondents in the revived and amended appeal, the said Richard Franklin Gough as executor of the said Thomas Gough was, and he was thereby declared to be, entitled to the benefit of the proceedings in the pleadings mentioned, as prayed by this bill; and that as between the plaintiff and the said defendants the remainder of the said bill claiming as devisee of the said Thomas Gough should be dismissed; and as to the defendant John Massey, assignee of the said Richard Franklin Gough, the said bill should also be dismissed, and the said Maria Rylands and Richard Franklin Gough, who had presented such original petition of appeal, thereupon obtained the order of the House as of course, that they should be at liberty to amend their original appeal, and make the appellant John Franklin a party thereto; and the matter of the said appeal coming on to be heard before the House on the 5th day of this instant, July, it appearing to their Lordships, that under the circumstances of the case the House could not proceed to pronounce any decision on the said appeal, inasmuch as already by the said decree of the 10th of May 1819, which has not been appealed from by any of the parties, it was declared, that as between the said Richard Franklin Gough and the defendants, the Respondents and John Latouche deceased, the said Richard Franklin Gough, as executor of the said Thomas Gough, was entitled to the benefit of the proceedings mentioned in the pleadings in the suit instituted by him as [591] prayed by this bill; but such decree had declared no right of the said John Franklin as his co-executor, and by such decree the said bill of the said Richard Franklin Gough had been dismissed, as between the said Richard Franklin Gough claiming as devisee of the said Thomas Gough, and the said Respondents and the said John Latouche deceased; and the said bill had also, by the said decree, been dismissed against the said John Massey, so that there is no person before the House in whom the property of the said Richard Franklin Gough is vested, in consequence of his discharge under the said act for relief of insolvent debtors; and inasmuch as the said decree of the 28th of June 1806, was and could only have been obtained by the said Maria Rylands, John Hamilton and William Crawford, as devisees as well as executors of the said Thomas Gough, and the same and the subsequent order of the 23d of March 1808, and the subsequent decree of the 27th of June 1808, were founded on the supposed rights of the said Maria Rylands, John Hamilton and William Crawford, as devisees as well as executors of the said Thomas Gough, the House cannot proceed to determine the merits of the appeal against the said order of the 23d of March 1808, and the said decree of the 27th of June 1808, without having before them the said Richard Franklin Gough in the character of devisee in the will of the said Thomas Gough, and also without having before them such person as may be entitled to be assignee of the estate of the said Richard Franklin Gough, under the said act for relief of insolvent debtors, [592] especially as it appears on the face of the proceedings before the House, that the said decree of the 28th of June 1806, on which the said order and decree appealed from were founded, was obtained by persons who had no right to the estate in question; and in consequence of a private agreement between them and the said Richard Franklin Gough, to which the defendants in the said cause do not appear to have been parties or privies, and which agreement does not appear to have been disclosed to the Court at the time of such decree, or during the subsequent proceedings, and therefore may be deemed to have been a fraud on the said Court, and on the other parties to the said suit, and it therefore may be objected at the hearing of the said appeal, that the said decree of the 28th of June 1806, and the subsequent proceedings thereon, were absolutely void, or were void so far as the same respected the said leasehold estate, it is therefore ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the hearing of the said appeal do stand over, with liberty for the several parties interested to take such proceedings as they may be advised in the said Court of Chancery, respecting the said suit instituted by the said Thomas Gough, and the suit instituted by the said Maria Rylands, John Hamilton, and William Crawford, and the said suit instituted by the said Richard Franklin Gough, and to bring before this House parties competent to litigate the questions which may arise thereupon between the Appellants and the Respondents, and the right of the Appellants to prosecute the said appeal; and [593] it is further ordered, that the Appellants do pay to the Respondents fifty pounds for their costs for attending the hearing of this appeal in the present session."

Reg. Lib. A. 1813, fo. 1718, b. BINKS v. BINKS.

[Mews' Dig. i. 336.]

In 1809 Thomas Binks, as creditor, etc. filed a bill in Chancery against Lord Rokeby, Fred. Turner, and Phil. M'Farlane, stating an indenture of assignment and mortgage, dated in 1806, by which certain hereditaments, the property of Lord Rokeby, were vested in the defendants Turner and M'Farlane, as trustees for a term of years, to secure the payment of debts owing by Lord Rokeby to defendant Thomas Binks, etc. and upon trust in default of payment, to sell, etc. and assign or pay over the residue, etc. to Lord Rokeby. The bill further stated, that payment was not made according to the trust, and prayed an account of the debt and interest, and immediate payment, or in default, that the estate might be sold for payment, according to the trust.

The cause was heard at the Rolls in July 1811, and by the decree it was ordered, that the defendant Lord Rokeby should pay, etc.; or in default of payment, that an account should be taken of what was due to Thomas Binks, etc., and that so much of the estate should be sold as would be sufficient to pay, etc.; the surplus, if any, to be paid to the defendants Turner and M'Farlane, to be applied upon the trusts of the indenture of 1806. By the report, dated the 8th of August 1812, the Master found the sum due to Thomas Binks, the estate was sold pursuant to the decree and the report of purchase was confirmed by an order, dated on the 15th of January 1813. At this stage of the cause it was discovered that Thomas Binks, being indebted to various persons by mortgage, specialty, and simple contract, had in March 1810, before the date of the decree, assigned all his interest in the estate and debt, comprised in and secured by the deed of 1806, to Richard Binks, Antony Steel, and William Walter, in trust to recover the debt secured by that deed, and to apply the money [594] so recovered in payment of the debts of Thomas Binks, enumerated in a schedule annexed to the deed of 1810. In this state of things Richard Binks, Antony Steel, and William Walter, filed a supplemental bill, stating the facts before mentioned; and further, that the solicitor who conducted the cause for Thomas Binks did not know of the deed of assignment of 1810, when the decree was pronounced in the original cause, nor until after the estate had been purchased by, etc.; that the decree, therefore, had been obtained by mistake, and the purchaser refused to complete his purchase unless R. B. A. S. and W. W. were made parties to the cause, and consented to the payment of the purchase-moneys into the Bank, in trust, etc.; that the plaintiffs were willing to confirm the proceedings in the former cause, and join in the conveyance; and the plaintiffs submitted that they ought to, and prayed that they might, have the same benefit of the suit instituted by Thomas Binks, and the decree pronounced, and other proceedings had in that cause, as if they had been parties to the cause originally. The defendants Thomas Binks and Anne his wife, by their answer, admitted the facts, and submitted, etc. The defendant Lord Rokeby, by his answer, submitted, that inasmuch as the decree was founded in mistake, and erroneous, it ought not to be carried into execution, and the plaintiffs ought not to have the benefit, etc.; and insisted upon the objection as if he had demurred to the bill. The defendants Turner and M'Farlane admitted the facts, and submitted, etc.

The supplemental cause was heard before the Vice-Chancellor on the 17th of August 1814, when it was "Ordered and decreed, that the former decree and order should be carried on and prosecuted between the present parties, in the manner as the same were directed as to the then parties," and that the Master should tax the costs, etc.

PHILIP WESTERN WOOD,—Appellant: JOSHUA ROWE,—Respondent [1820].

[Mews' Dig. iii. 2040: v. 445: xiii. 1781. Considered in Askew v. Mollington 1851, 9 Hare 65, at pp. 69, 70: and see Pryer v. Gribble 1875, L.R. 10 Ch., 531, at p. 539. See now Judicature Act 1873, s. 21 (5). In re Gaudet Frères S.S.Co. 1879, 12 Ch. D. 882: Hart v. Hart 1881, 18 Ch. D. 670.]

A BILL being filed against two parties praying accounts and relief against both: after one of the defendants had put in an answer, an agreement is made between the plaintiff and the two defendants by their agent, who is also interested as a party to the agreement, containing various provisions as to the transactions of mortgage and partnership in mines, which were the subject of the bill, besides other matters of agreement; and providing that "all proceedings in law and equity shall cease between the plaintiff and the two defendants." This agreement, that all proceedings, etc. shall cease, etc. cannot be pleaded in bar to the whole suit by the defendant who has not answered.

Such a plea may operate to displace the equitable relief sought by the bill, so far as it regards the party who pleads, but as a bar to the whole suit it cannot be pleaded.

Such a plea is, in effect, a plea of one part of the agreement in bar of the whole suit, which is inadmissible.

The object of a plea to a bill in equity is to reduce the subject matter of litigation to a single point, and to avoid the expense which would be incurred by entering into all the subject matter of the dispute, which is not effected by a plea of an agreement, making provisions as to the subjects of the suit in a way which the decree in the cause could not effect.

Courts of equity cannot decree the performance of one part of an agreement, leaving the other parts unperformed.

If an agreement be made subsequent to the filing of a bill between the parties to the suit and other parties, for the purpose of putting an end to the proceedings in the suit, and other purposes, it cannot be pleaded in bar to the bill by one of the parties. If it could be so pleaded, it must contain averments: that the conditions of the agreement have been performed, or [596] those circumstances could not be performed; and that the other parties not joining in the plea are ready to perform the agreement; and events by which the agreement is affected ought also to be noticed in the averments. But ex h. that in such a case the court not having the power to compel the performance of the agreement on the plea, a bill must be filed for the purpose, including all the parties, and all the subjects of the agreement.

It lies upon the party seeking the performance to take the steps necessary to enforce it, and not upon the other party bound by the agreement, being plaintiff in the original suit, to intercept the effect of the agreement by filing a supplemental bill.

An executory agreement is a cause of action, and cannot be pleaded in bar to another cause of action.

Such an agreement is totally different from a release under seal, but considered as in the nature of a release, it could only be applied to such part of the relief sought by the bill as relates to the questions at issue between the plaintiff and the party who proposes to have the benefit of the agreement by way of plea. It could not be pleaded in bar to the whole relief; for the cause must, at all events, proceed as to the relief sought against the other parties.

Such a plea, containing no averments, that all the parties to the agreement are ready to perform it, is not only insufficient for want of proper averments, but could not be made a good plea by any amendment; because it is not a proper subject of plea, but a mere right of action, and cannot be a bar to another suit instituted by the party against whom the right of action is claimed, especially where a long time has elapsed between the date of the agreement and the pleading of it.

Semb. That affidavits (filed upon interlocutory proceedings) are to be considered as matters of record, and that the facts disclosed by affidavits so filed may be viewed by the court in deciding upon the validity of a plea.—Quære.

The Respondent Joshua Rowe, in 1816, filed a bill in Chancery against the Appellant Mat[597]-thew Wood, and Sir A. O. Molesworth, stating transactions between the Respondent and Matthew Wood, and deeds and instruments whereby an interest in mines, called Great and Little Crinnis, Campdown and Appletree, vested in the Respondent for terms of years, and a judgment in the court of Common Pleas entered up against the Respondent for the sum of £20,000 were assigned to Matthew Wood, by way of security for the payment to him of monies due and to become due to him from the Respondent; and stating also, contracts entered into by Matthew Wood for the purchase of 20-64th shares, and by the Appellant of 4-64th shares in the mines; and further stating an indenture bearing date the 16th of December 1814, made between the Respondent of the one part and Matthew Wood of the other part, reciting an agreement between the parties thereto as to the taking and adjusting of the accounts relative to the mines, by which indenture the 20-64th shares in the mines were assigned by the respondent to Matthew Wood; and further stating an indenture of the same date, made between the Respondent of the one part and the Appellant of the other part, to the same purport and effect, mutatis mutandis, as the first mentioned indenture, whereby the 4-64th shares in the mines were assigned by the Respondent to the Appellant.

The bill further stated that Matthew Wood executed a power of attorney to Benjamin Wood, authorizing him to take possession of the mines, as the agent and for the benefit of Matthew Wood; and that in pursuance of the power, Benjamin Wood, in March 1815, entered into possession of [598] the mines, as the agent of Matthew Wood, and had ever since been and then was in possession, and had ever since worked, and then worked the mines. The bill further stated, that the respondent from time to time, after the month of November 1812, transmitted to Matthew Wood blank bills of exchange, upon stamps, sufficient to warrant the drawing of £50,000 at least, that the same were all signed by the Respondent, either in the character of acceptor or drawer; that Matthew Wood had (as the Respondent believed) filled up the blank bills, and negotiated or disposed of several of them, in some way, for his own use; and that since the month of March 1815, when Benjamin Wood took possession of the mines, Matthew Wood had carried on the business under the firm of the Crinnis Mine Company, and had issued bills of exchange in the name of the Crinnis Mine Company.

The bill further stated, that Matthew Wood had caused the complainant's effects to be seized in execution for the sum of £8948 11s. 4d. and that such execution was taken out on the judgment for £20,000. The bill charged, that in a certain account made out by Matthew Wood, of the dealings between him and the Respondent, there were divers errors and improper charges, and in particular that the Respondent was therein debited with the sum of £9170, though in fact the same was money paid by Matthew Wood for purchases on his own account; and further charged, that Sir A. O. Molesworth, the then sheriff of the county of Cornwall, intended forthwith to proceed to a sale of the Respondent's effects seized in execution.

[599] The bill prayed that an account might be taken of the several dealings and transactions in the bill mentioned; and that the balance due thereon from Matthew Wood to the Respondent might be ascertained and paid, he being ready to pay what, if any thing, might be found due from him upon taking the account; and that either the Appellant and Matthew Wood might be declared to be partners with the Respondent in the mines, and that an account might be taken of all the profits of the mines received by the Appellant and Matthew Wood, or either of them, etc. and that the Respondent might have credit in taking the account for his share of the profits, and for what was due and unpaid for the Appellant's and Matthew Wood's shares in the mines, and for the blank bills of exchange, and that proper directions might be given for the payment of the bills drawn in the name of the Crinnis Mine Company, or such of them as were outstanding; or in case the court should be of opinion that the Appellant and Matthew Wood were not partners with the Respondent in the mines, then that a like account might be taken of the profits thereof received by, or by the order, or for the use of the Appellant and Matthew Wood, or either of them; and that the Respondent might have credit given to him in taking the account for all those profits and for the blank bills of exchange, and for all the bills issued by Matthew Wood, in the name of the Crinnis Mine Company, or might be indemnified against the bills; and that the Appellant and Matthew Wood might, upon being paid what, (if any thing,) was due to them, deliver up possession of the mines, and the [600] stock therein, to the Respondent; and that the Appellant and Matthew Wood respectively might in the mean time be restrained by injunction from issuing or negotiating any bills or notes in the name of the Crinnis Mine Company, or any of the blank bills of exchange, and from using the name of the Crinnis Mine Company in any manner; and that Matthew Wood might also be restrained by injunction from proceeding in the execution, and from all other proceedings at law under the judgment; and that Sir A. O. Molesworth might, in like manner, be restrained from selling the Respondent's effects, or from otherwise proceeding in the execution.*

[601] The Appellant put in upon oath the following plea:—

"This defendant, etc. saith, That since the said bill of complaint was exhibited,

* The bill was unusually long, but contained no other allegations material to be stated for the purpose of making the plea and the judgment upon the appeal intelligible. On account of the observations made by the Lord Chancellor in moving the judgment (Post, 606, et seq.) a short statement of the proceedings which occurred between the filing of the bill and the plea is here introduced by way of note.

On the 19th of July 1816, the statements of the bill being supported by affidavits, an injunction to restrain proceedings under the execution was applied for, ex parte, and granted.

A joint and several answer had been prepared for the Appellant and M. Wood. In the month of November 1817, M. Wood alone swore to the answer, with an understanding (as stated by affidavit) that P. W. Wood should not be required to answer until certain proceedings then pending in an ejectment, which related to the mines, should be determined.

On the 29th of January 1818, the sheriff applied for a receiver of the effects, which had been levied under the execution. An order was accordingly made with the consent of all parties, and the appointment was afterwards completed with the usual recognizances.

No further step was taken in the cause until the month of July 1819, when the plaintiff issued an attachment returnable immediately against P. W. Wood for want of an answer. Notice of a motion having been given to set aside this attachment, affidavits of what had taken place in the intermediate time were filed by both parties.

An affidavit was filed by the Respondent, as explanatory of the case, and a joint and several affidavit by the Appellant and two other persons, in which the agreement the said com-[602]-plainant and M. Wood, and this defendant being mutually desirous of determining all proceedings under the said bill, Benjamin Wood, as agent for the said M. Wood and of this defendant, as also in and on his own individual capacity and behalf, and the said complainant did for that purpose, amongst others, on or about the 27th day of May 1818, make and enter into and duly sign an agreement in writing, which was and is in the words and figures following (that is to say:) We, the undersigned, hereby mutually agree to the following effect: viz. 'That Wheal Regent forms a part of Campdown Set, and is therefore included in the sale to M. and P. Wood, and also in the mortgage securities to M. Wood, but as she has made no profit up to this time, the accounts respecting the same shall not be taken one way or the other, but from this date.' 'The mine accounts during the possession of J. Rowe, and also during the possession of M. Wood, to be settled as per deed dated on or about December 1814, between the undersigned, if possible, if not, by two indifferent persons, one to be named by each of the undersigned. All the ship-timber now undisposed of to be taken at a valuation of [603] two indifferent persons, and if they do not agree, then to call in a third, and the same to be charged to the mine account.' 'M. Wood to give J. Rowe 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 years, by equal instalments, for the payment of the balance due upon making up the accounts, which is agreed to be done without delay, between M. Wood, P. Wood and J. Rowe; but whatever J. Rowe may deliver in stores to the mine, including the before-mentioned ship-timber, as well as his proportion of the profits, to go towards the next instalment coming due, but M. Wood to be paid as much sooner as the profits may amount to.' 'J. Rowe agrees to the charge of £1000 per year to the mines for B. Wood's services.' 'M. Wood to remain in full possession of the mortgage property as he is at present, but J. Rowe to have the control of the working part of the mine; B. Wood to receive and pay every thing, and to purchase and manage all the stores.' 'The injunction to be immediately dissolved, and the execution withdrawn, and all proceedings in law and equity to cease between J. Rowe and M. and P. Wood,' (thereby meaning the complainant and M. Wood, and this defendant.) 'When J. Rowe has paid the balance of the account due to M. Wood, on making up all accounts between him and M. and P. Wood, the was set forth: it then proceeded to state, that in pursuance and furtherance of the agreement, the Respondent and Benjamin Wood, acting on behalf of M. Wood and the Appellant, had investigated accounts; and that on the 6th of March 1819, a farther agreement was made between the parties, in which the account between the Respondent and M. Wood and the Appellant was set forth according to the result of the investigation. At the end of this statement of account appears the following reservation:—"The above account is correct, subject to the following respective claims and charges: the same to be agreed on between the undersigned, if possible, if not, to be referred in two months from this date." Then follow several claims for credit, etc. among which is a claim on the part of M. Wood and the Appellant to be credited for the profits on 24 64th shares, in Wheal Regent, from the 27th of May 1818. The memorandum concludes thus:—

It is agreed between the undersigned, that particulars of all accounts of every description shall be forthwith furnished mutually for the settlement of the above claims and charges.

It is agreed to refer the valuation of the ship-timber to, etc.

It is also agreed to refer the claim for stock, and rent of Dartmoor brewery, on, etc. to, etc., they to call in a third person if they do not agree.

(Signed) Josh. Rowe,

B. Wood, for Matthew Wood.

The Crinnis Mine, 6th March 1819.

The Respondent claimed credit for the balance of purchase-money on the shares sold to M. Wood and the appellant, and for profit on the residue of the shares.

On the 31st of July 1819, the Lord Chancellor, upon the ground that the attachment had issued without a full communication with the defendants as to the steps intended to be taken in the cause, ordered it to be set aside, without costs, and without prejudice to any future proceedings.—See 1 J. and W. p. 322.

securities to be re-assigned.' 'Should any difference arise hereafter between J. Rowe and M. and P. Wood, the same to be left to two indifferent persons, one chosen by each party, and if they cannot agree, a third to be called in.' 'Should any deeds be required to carry the above [604] arrangement into effect, the same to be prepared by Mr. Joseph Edwards, as adviser between the parties.'

"J. Rowe to assign to B. Wood all his property and debts, for the benefit of his common creditors, they agreeing not to proceed against him in law or equity for 5 years, from the 1st of June next.' 'All payments and receipts to be made by B. Wood, and what purchases may be required for carrying on any of the works of the said J. Rowe, to be made by the said B. Wood; but the management of the said works to remain under the control of the said J. Rowe, B. Wood making such dividends within the 5 years as he may be enabled to from the monies in his hands.' 'J. Rowe not to draw for more than £1000 per year from his estate, for his maintenance.' 'B. Wood to charge 5 per cent. on all the monies he receives for his trouble, and also to charge what other actual expenses he may pay or incur; but the 5 per cent. to include all other commissions.' Dated this 27th day of May 1818. 'B. Wood, for self, M. and P. Wood—J. Rowe.'

"And this defendant doth aver, That the said B. Wood, at and before the time of the signature of the said agreement by him and the said complainant, was duly authorized and empowered to enter into and sign such agreement, as the agent for and on behalf of this defendant and the said Matthew Wood.

"And this defendant doth also aver, that by the proceedings in equity, which it is by the agreement stipulated should cease between the [605] complainant and M. Wood and this defendant, were meant and intended the proceedings in this present suit; and that at the time when the agreement was entered into and signed, there was not, nor were there any other suit or proceedings in equity, between the complainant and M. Wood and this defendant, or either of them, than this present suit and the proceedings therein.

"And this defendant doth also aver, that the agreement hath not been waived or determined, but is now subsisting and in full force; and this defendant doth therefore plead the matters aforesaid, in bar to the said complainant's bill of complaint, and the relief and discovery thereby sought; and he humbly hopes to be hence dismissed with his reasonable costs in this behalf sustained."

The plea was argued before the Vice Chancellor, on the 10th of November 1819, and allowed.

The respondent thereupon presented his petition of appeal against the order allowing the plea to the Lord Chancellor.

The appeal was heard in April 1820, when the Lord Chancellor reversed the order of the Vice Chancellor, and overruled the plea.

Against this order of the Lord Chancellor the appeal to parliament was presented.

For the Appellants: Mr. Heald, Mr. Sugden, and Mr. Sidebottom.

For the Respondent: The Attorney General, and Mr. Horne.

[606] The Lord Chancellor (after some prefatory observations, and stating the effect of the pleadings and proceedings):

There are two ways in which this question must be considered. In the first place, I am not quite prepared to say that the affidavits filed in the cause might not be judicially noticed by the Court, nor do I say they could, nor do I mean to state that they had not a considerable influence on my mind.* The first question is, whether they ought or ought not to be looked at as a matter of record, to enable us to determine upon the validity of this plea? Considering the affidavits as matter of record, suppose that on Monday the attachment had been disposed of, and on Tuesday this plea had come before me, if I could not have judicially taken notice of the affidavits, I should have had entirely to forget them, which would have been a difficult operation. A-matters of record they might be looked to. Considering the nature of this agreement, and looking at the averments, the Court was authorized to say argumentatively, and supposing such facts had taken place which the affidavits say did take place, and if the facts had taken place before the agreement, could those facts form a part of this plea; and if necessary to form a part of the plea, how could it be supported not noticing those facts? In these circumstances I think it would have been perfectly correct to look at the affidavits in a [607] judicial point of view. When the case came before me I was puzzled to know how to deal with it. I observed that it was the first time within my experience that such an executory contract had been pleaded. It was asked, did you ever hear of a Court allowing such a plea? and the answer was, did you ever hear of such a plea being overruled? On which my observation was, that I never heard of any such plea being allowed, or, on the other hand, of any such plea being overruled. I have considered with great attention the observations made on the subject of supplemental bills, according to the view which the Court below (the Vice Chancellor) took of the case: Where it was said this agreement applies to the whole suit, for by one of the terms of the agreement the Court is bound to dismiss the bill, and if any thing has been done to deprive the defendant of the benefit of that plea, it must be made available by a supplemental bill.

* One of the facts averred by affidavit was, that the Respondent had been fraudulently induced by the Appellant and M. Wood to sign the agreement. This was denied by the affidavits of the opposite parties. The same fact was alleged by the petition of appeal from the judgment of the V. C. to the Lord Chancellor.

The important view of the case, taken by one of your lordships (Lord Redesdale), that it is a plea of one where the suit is against several, and where the interests of several are affected, did not wholly escape me. This view of the case presented itself to my mind: Supposing this agreement has not been acted upon in such a way that Rowe could compel the performance of it against Matthew Wood, then Philip Western Wood pleads this plea; and supposing land should have fallen in value, would there have been any thing to hinder Matthew Wood from saying, I am not bound to remain the purchaser of these shares in this mine; I will not join in the plea; I have no desire to enforce the agreement against Rowe; I will not be the purchaser of these shares in the character [608] which the agreement would fix upon me. The grounds upon which I proceeded were these: In the first place this being an executory contract merely under the signature of the party, (I say nothing of a release under seal), I could not bring my mind to think that such an executory contract in a court of equity could be a bar to the whole of this suit: in the next place, if I had been bound to give my opinion upon it, I should have thought, from the contents of this agreement, all taken together, that a court of equity would have found it so difficult to execute that it would not have been executed. Whatever might be the law on the one side or on the other, looking at the date of this agreement, and the time when the plea was pleaded, I was of opinion that the plea was defective in matter altogether; and that it was defective in averment. It was asked by the counsel for the Appellant, Suppose it had been pleaded immediately after it was signed, would it not have been a good plea? Why, to be sure, pleading it then, the performance of the conditions of the agreement could not have been averred. At that moment it must have been averred, that under those circumstances, (which averment this plea wants,) they could not have been performed.

I forbear to enter into many other considerations connected with this plea. I do not press into the aid of the disallowance of this plea any of those facts which appeared in the subsequent affidavits. It appeared upon those affidavits, that all the matters of the bill, even important matters, were not covered by the two agreements. Under the first agreement, Rowe could not have the relief which he prays. By the agreement with Matthew Wood, he may take [609] into account not only the purchase money which Matthew is to pay for his shares, but also the consideration which Philip Wood is to pay. Under the first agreement that equity could not be enforced. That provision, although it is subsequent to the first agreement, I do not look at as a circumstance affecting its validity; but nobody can deny, on the other hand, that such an agreement, if it is not acted upon, but is merely a contract to be fulfilled, would require that there should be some averment to account why it has not been fulfilled, if it was not meant finally to act upon it.

Lord Redesdale (after stating the pleadings and proceedings):

With respect to the agreement, which is the foundation of the plea, it is, between Joshua Rowe, Benjamin Wood, Matthew Wood and Philip Western Wood, one entire agreement, which is to have its effect, if at all, according to the obligations which the several parties undertake by that agreement. "We the undersigned, hereby mutually agree to the following effect: that Wheal Regent forms a part of Campdown Set, and is therefore included in the sale to Matthew and Philip Wood, and also in the mortgage securities to Matthew Wood; but as she has made no profit up to this time, the accounts respecting the same shall not be taken one way or the other from this date: "this is a part of the agreement which concerns Philip and Matthew Wood.

"The mine accounts, during the possession of Joshua Rowe, and also during the possession of Matthew Wood, to be settled as per deed dated on [610] or about December 1814, between the undersigned, if possible, if not, by two indifferent persons, one to be named by each of the undersigned: "that is the deed on which, as I apprehend, it was contended at the bar, as was alleged by Rowe in his bill, that the Woods are to be considered as partners: one part of the prayer of the bill is, that if they are to be considered as partners, then that the account may be taken in one way; but if they are not to be considered as partners, then that the account may be taken in another.

It is material, in any way of construing this deed, to observe, that the agreement does not at all determine what is the effect of it; whether they are to be considered as partners or not; if the disputed account is not settled by that deed, which it is to do if possible, it is to be adjusted by two independent persons, "one to be named by each of the undersigned." Now, though Benjamin Wood is one of the undersigned, Philip and Matthew Wood are the persons intended.

"All the ship-timber now undisposed of to be taken at a valuation of two indifferent persons, and if they do not agree, then to call in a third, and the same to be charged to the mine-account. "Matthew Wood to give Joshua Rowe, one, two, three, four, and five years, by equal instalments, for the payment of the balance due upon making up the account, which is agreed to be done, without delay, between the said Matthew Wood, Philip Wood and Joshua Rowe." This provision is of extreme importance with respect to the effect of the agreement, and whether it can or cannot be made a matter of plea, as pleaded to this bill, because this being [611] a separate stipulation on the part of Matthew Wood, is a part of the consideration of the whole agreement, and if that stipulation on the part of Matthew Wood is not performed, the consideration of the agreement itself cannot be fulfilled.

"But whatever Joshua Rowe may deliver in stores to the mines, including the before-mentioned ship-timber, as well as his proportion of the profits, to go towards the next instalment coming due, but Matthew Wood to be paid as much sooner as the profits may amount to: " (this provision also relates to Matthew Wood) " Joshua Rowe agrees to the charge of £1000 per year out of the mines for Benjamin Wood's services: " (here is a provision for Benjamin's services) " Matthew Wood to remain in the full possession of the mortgage property, as he is at present, but Joshua Rowe to have the conduct of the working part of the mine: " That is a stipulation between Joshua Rowe and Matthew Wood—a stipulation which, with respect to Mr. Philip Western Wood, has no effect, except as he was to submit that the possession should be in Matthew Wood, and the management of the mine should be to a certain extent in Rowe, that is as to the working part. " Benjamin Wood to receive and pay every thing, and to purchase and manage all the stores: " That is a stipulation in which Matthew Wood is concerned, as well as Philip, and in which Benjamin Wood is also concerned.

Then comes this stipulation, which is the ground of the plea: "The injunction to be immediately dissolved, and the execution withdrawn, and all [612] proceedings in law and equity to cease between Joshua Rowe, and Matthew and Philip Wood." Upon this part of the agreement I shall only briefly observe, in the first place, that the execution could only be withdrawn by Matthew Wood, for Philip Wood had no execution or proceedings at law. They were proceedings on the part of Matthew Wood; and it is a little material also to observe, that there is an averment that there were no other proceedings in equity, except the suit instituted by Rowe; but there is nothing said respecting the proceedings at law.

"When Joshua Rowe has paid the balance of the accounts due to Matthew Wood, on making up all accounts between him and Matthew and Philip Wood, the securities to be re-assigned. Should any difference arise hereafter between Joshua Rowe and Matthew and Philip Wood, the same to be left to two indifferent persons, one chosen by each party, and if they cannot agree, a third to be called in: " That is indefinitely prospective, extending to any thing which might arise in dispute, and to any period of time during which those mines should be in operation.

"Should any deeds be required to carry the above arrangement into effect, the same to be prepared by Mr. Joseph Edwards, as adviser between the parties; Joshua Rowe to assign to Benjamin Wood all his property and debts for the benefit of his common creditors, they agreeing not to proceed against him in law or equity, for five years from the 1st of June next:" That, I presume, is a stipulation which Matthew Wood and Philip Wood provided, with a view to putting the whole property of Rowe, [613] who was concerned with them as to these mines, into such a situation that his creditors might be repaid in the course of time, so as to prevent any embarrassment arising to the mines from any debts due by Rowe.

"All payments and receipts to be made by Benjamin Wood, and what purchases may be required for carrying on any of the works of the said Joshua Rowe, to be made by Benjamin Wood, but the management of the works to remain under the conduct of Joshua Rowe, Benjamin Wood making such dividends within the five years as he may be enabled to from the monies in his hands:" That is an engagement with all the three parties who contract here—all concerned in one way or other, and for the performance of which all were interested.

"Joshua Rowe not to draw for more than £1000 per year from his estate for his maintenance; Benjamin Wood to charge five per cent. on all the monies he receives for his trouble, and also to charge what other actual expenses he may pay or incur; but the five per cent. to include all other commissions:" That is a stipulation for the benefit of Benjamin Wood, and a stipulation also in which Matthew Wood and Philip Wood, and Rowe, were interested.

This instrument, which is dated on the 27th of May 1818, is signed by Benjamin Wood for himself, and Matthew and Philip Wood, and by Joshua Rowe. The plea, stating the agreement verbatim, avers, that Benjamin Wood was duly authorized and empowered to enter into and sign such agree-[614]-ment as agent for and on behalf of the defendant, and Matthew Wood; and it is also averred, that by the proceedings in equity, which it is by the agreement stipulated should cease between the complainant, and Matthew Wood, and the defendant, were meant and intended the proceedings in the present suit; and that, at the time when the agreement was entered into and signed, there were not any other suits or proceedings in equity between the said complainant and Matthew Wood, and the defendant, or either of them, than this present suit and the proceedings therein. Then it avers also, that the agreement has not been waived or determined, but is now subsisting and in full force; and the defendant pleads the matters aforesaid in bar to the bill of complaint, and the relief and discovery thereby sought.

This plea is in effect a plea of one part of the agreement; that part which provides that all proceedings in equity should cease between Joshua Rowe, and Matthew and Philip Wood, in bar of the whole bill. It is therefore a plea, the object of which is to prevent any further proceedings in the particular suit; yet that was a suit which was not merely against Philip Wood, but a suit in which Matthew Wood was also a party. In deciding upon this plea and the effect of it, I must consider first what is the object of a plea to a bill in equity. The object of a plea to a bill in equity I take to be this, to reduce the subject of litigation to a single point, and to avoid that expense which would be incurred by entering into all the subject-matter of the dispute. This plea does not effect that purpose; for this, which is made the sub-[615]-ject of plea, is an agreement which embraces several subjects of the suit, and provides for them in a different way from what they could be provided for under a decree in the cause which had been instituted. If, therefore, the court is to proceed upon this plea as a mode by which it is to do justice between the parties, how is it to act? Is it to stay all proceedings against Philip Wood? that will not execute the agreement; it will execute that one part of the agreement which provides that the proceedings instituted in equity shall cease, but it will not execute the other part of the agreement; and I apprehend it is impossible to hold, that any person can have a right to demand that one part of an agreement shall be executed, leaving the other part unexecuted; which consideration alone demonstrates that this agreement could not be a good plea to this suit.

But what is the nature of this plea? Without entering into the question, whether the averments are or are not sufficient, except that it is manifest from what has been stated, that the averments are not sufficient, because they do not inform the court that Benjamin Wood and Matthew Wood are ready to carry into execution this agreement, without which the agreement cannot be performed. If such a decree cannot be made, the plea does not enable the court to do justice between the parties, and therefore I conceive it cannot be a bar to this suit as it is pleaded. Independently of this objection, can it be contended that an agreement which binds three persons can be offered by one of those persons in bar of a suit which involves other persons? The court upon the hearing of the plea would have that party before it on [616] part of the case, and other parties at the hearing upon another part of the case. It would be impossible for a court to act upon the agreement under these circumstances, unless it had also the means at the same time to compel the other two parties to perform that agreement, which it cannot do unless a bill is filed for the purpose.

It has been said this is a dilemma which Rowe, the Respondent in the bill, has brought upon himself by executing this agreement; I say it is a dilemma which the Appellant also has brought upon himself by executing this agreement; both of them have brought themselves equally into that situation. When the Respondent does not insist upon the execution of the agreement, and the Appellant does insist upon it, it lies upon the Appellant to take the steps necessary to have the agreement performed, and not upon the Respondent. That I conceive is also an answer to the plea, and shuts it out from being allowed as a good plea to this bill.

But there is another objection which appears to me important, and which of itself is an answer to this plea, and that is, that it is an executory agreement; it is a ground of action, and I never yet heard that one cause of action could be pleaded in bar against another cause of action. Whether P. Wood has or has not a right to carry this agreement into execution must depend upon a variety of circumstances which cannot be in the contemplation of the court upon the hearing of this plea. In the first place the court would not have all the parties before it, and in the next place it would not have the point in issue as between Rowe and Philip Wood and [617] Matthew Wood, and consequently it would be impossible for the court to act upon it in any way whatever.

It is said, why is this difficulty to be thrown upon Philip Wood since he is ready to perform the agreement? if so, he must file a bill in equity to compel the performance of it; the agreement gives him no other remedy. It gives him a right to file a bill for a specific performance, but no other right whatever: it is only that species of right which it confers, how then can that as a plea be a bar to the bill? It has been compared to a release; I apprehend it is a totally different thing. Taking it as in the nature of a release, it is only an agreement (as pleaded) for a release of all demands between Philip Wood and Rowe, and that could not be pleaded in bar to the whole relief. It might be pleaded in bar as to any account sought to be taken by this bill, so as to make Philip Wood responsible to Rowe, but it would not be a bar to the whole suit. The suit must proceed with respect to Matthew Wood; and as far as he might have a demand against Philip Wood, though derived from Rowe, the court must decree against all the parties: and the only effect of that decree would be, with regard to the result of the account, if any thing should appear to be due from Philip Wood to Rowe, Rowe could not have any remedy upon that if it should be so decreed. Therefore, if it had been a release, it could not be pleaded in bar; if it had been a release of all demands whatever, it could not be a bar to this bill, because it could not affect the rights between Rowe and Matthew Wood, and the rights of Matthew Wood as against Philip Wood.

[618] Under these circumstances, it appears to me that this is a case, not only in which this plea with the averments is not a good plea, because the averments are not sufficient; but that no amendment could make it a good plea, because it is not a proper subject of plea: it is a mere right of action which Philip Wood insists he has against the respondent Rowe, and that right of action can only be made available by that mode of proceeding by which a right of action can be made available, that is, by producing it in the proper course of suit. It cannot be a bar to another suit which has been instituted by the party against whom Philip Wood insists he has this right of action. Upon these grounds the order disallowing this plea ought to be affirmed.

The Attorney-General: We trust your Lordships will allow the Respondent his costs of this appeal.

The Lord Chancellor: We cannot allow the costs, because there have been opposite judgments.

The order for over-ruling the plea affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

JAMES DUKE OF ROXBURGHE.—Appellant; JOHN WAUCHOPE, Writer to the Signet, sole accepting Trustee and Executor of the deceased JOHN DUKE OF ROXBURGHE; and the Reverend Archdeacon CHARLES BAILLIE HAMILTON, second Son of the late Honourable GEORGE BAILLIE of Mellerstain; Sir WILLIAM SCOTT of Ancrum, Baronet, Son and Heir of the late Sir JOHN SCOTT of Ancrum, Baronet; and Sir HENRY HAY MACDOUGAL of Mackerston, Baronet, the Residuary Legatees appointed by the said Duke,—Respondents [25th May 1820].

[See Strathmore v. Strathmore's Trustees, 1831, 5 Wils. and Shaw, 170.]

LANDS, etc. being limited to heirs of entail by simple destination, a deed was executed in liege poustie in favour of the heirs general of the disponent after his death without issue, with a power to revoke or alter that disposition on death-bed; and a declaration, that so far as it shall remain unrevoked, and not altered by a writing under the hand of the disponent, it shall have the effect of a delivered evident, though, etc. By another deed, executed thirteen years after the first, all the lands, etc. together with the personal estate of the disponent, are vested in trustees in trust, to be sold, and the produce to be applied in payment of debts owing at his death, and legacies, etc. granted or to be granted, etc. (The objects of trust being different from those provided in the former deed) and the trustees are directed to convey, etc. the residue of the whole fund in favour of such persons, etc. as the disponent had directed or should direct by any writing executed, or to be executed, etc. On death-bed the disponent executes a deed of appointment, directing the trustees to convert the whole estate into money; and after giving cer-[620]-tain legacies he bequeaths the residue to his heirs M. and E. for life, with remainder to other persons therein named; held, that this was not a revocation of the first deed so as to give to the heirs of entail a title to challenge the last deed ex capite lecti; although the disponees for life, under the second deed, being the heirs general of the disponent, had reduced the death-bed deed on that ground, and thereby, under the doctrine of approbate and reprobate, had forfeited the life-interest given to them by the second deed.

Where lands by an instrument in the nature of a will are disposed in trust to sell and pay certain legacies, and as to the residue for such persons as the disponent shall by writing appoint; and afterwards by deed made on death-bed he disposes of the residue, the law of death-bed applies to the case, and the disposition is reducible on that ground, so far as it relates to lands.

Lands (entailed by simple destination) being given by testamentary disposition to the sisters and heirs of the disponent, under obligation as to part of those lands, that they should be conveyed by his sisters to the heirs of tailzie, entitled by strict statutory entail to the principal mansion, etc. where the lands subject to the obligation are situated, on condition that a certain sum shall be paid by a certain day by those heirs to the sisters; by a subsequent testamentary disposition, consisting of two deeds, the latter being made on death-bed, the lands of the disponent, including those in question, are vested in trustees upon trust to sell and pay the interest of the produce to the sisters of the disponent for life, etc. who, as general heirs of the disponent, reduced the latter instrument so far as it regarded lands destined to heirs of line, as made on death-bed; held, that the heirs of entail have no title or interest to reduce the same instrument on the same ground as to the entailed lands; nor to call for a conveyance on payment of the sum specified in the condition; 1. because their interest is excluded by the liege-poustie deed, and is not restored, transferred to, or vested in them, because the disponees in that deed have forfeited or rejected their right under it; 2. because they must claim as disponees or legatees under that deed, and in such character they are barred from challenging the death-bed deed; 3. because in the events which [621] had happened they could not fulfil the conditions on which alone the benefit of the disposition could be claimed; 4. because they are not entitled to avail themselves of the right of redemption according to the condition, and under the obligation imposed on the disponees in the first deed, inasmuch as that obligation does not extend to the trustees who take under the death-bed deed.

John Duke of Roxburghe, in 1790, executed a deed by which he disposed to himself, and the heirs whomsoever of his body, whom failing, to Lady Essex Ker, and Lady Mary Ker, his sisters-german, etc. and the heirs whomsoever of their bodies, etc. and failing both his said sisters and the heirs of their bodies, then to his heir of tailzie, having right for the time to his earldom and estate of Roxburghe, etc. whom failing, to his own heirs and assignees whomsoever, all his unfettered estates, comprising lands destined to heirs of line, and lands descendible to heirs of tailzie, by simple destination, etc. except certain lands in the parish of Kelso, as to which it was provided and declared in manner following, "that the said Lady Essex and Lady Mary Ker, and their foresaids, shall be obliged to dispose and convey to the heirs of entail, having right for the time to my said tailzied lands and estate of Roxburghe, and to the heirs of tailzie and provision, succeeding to them in my said tailzied estate, in terms of the rights and investitures thereof; but also with and under the conditions, provisions, restrictions, limitations, and clauses irritant and resolute, contained in the said rights thereof; all and whatever lands and heritages within the [622] parish of Kelso, presently belonging, or which may belong to me at my death, and not subject and liable to the limitations and restrictions in the entail of the Roxburghe estates; but with this provision always, that such heir of entail shall, at either of the two first terms of Martinmas, which shall be next after my death, make payment to my said sisters, and their foresaids, of the sum of £3000 sterling, or such other sum as I shall appoint; and shall also discharge them of all claims whatsoever, which they may have against my representatives, for the price of teinds sold by me, the exchange of lands, or on any other cause or pretence whatsoever; declaring, that if my unentailed lands and estate in the parish of Kelso, shall not be redeemed in manner foresaid, by my heir of entail, at either of the two first terms of Martinmas, next after my death, the same shall, from thenceforth, remain with and belong to my said sisters and their foresaids, heritably and irredeemably in all time coming."

All former dispositions and settlements of his said lands, estate, and effects, are then expressly revoked, and the deed concludes with the following clause: "And as I reserve full power and liberty to myself, at any time in my life, and even on death-bed, to revoke or alter these presents, in whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, hereby disposed, or any part thereof, so I dispense with the delivery of these presents, and declare that the same, in so far as not revoked or altered by a writing under my hand, shall have [623] the effect of a delivered evident, though found in my own repositories, or in the custody of any other undelivered at the time of my death."

On the 5th of November 1803, Duke John executed a new settlement in the form of a trust disposition and nomination of executors. By this deed, he vested the whole of his unfettered lands, together with all his personality, in the Respondent, Mr. Wauchope, and other trustees, upon trust, to sell the whole or any part of his real estate, etc. at their discretion, and apply the produce in payment of debts, legacies, etc. given or to be given, etc. The final trust is thus expressed: "The whole residue, remainder, and surplus of my said estate and effects, shall be conveyed and made over, or applied and employed by my said trustees or trustee acting for the time, to and in favour of such person or persons, or for such uses and purposes as I have directed, or shall direct, by any deed, missive, memorandum, or other writing, executed, or to be executed by me for that effect, at any time of my life, and even upon death-bed."

Of the same date, he executed a memorandum relative to the said trust deed and settlement, whereby he desired it to be understood by his trustees, in case he should he prevented from executing such a deed of appointment as he had alluded to, that it was his wish and intention that the disposition and settlement of 1790 should stand good as far as regarded his sisters the Ladies Ker.

On the 19th of March 1804, Duke John, when upon death-bed, executed a deed of appointment or instructions to his trustees. By this deed he directs them to sell his real and personal estates, and to [624] apply the produce in payment of certain legacies: and after investing the residue, to pay the interest to his sisters the Ladies Essex and Mary Ker, and the survivor; and after the death of the survivor, he directed that the residue should be paid, in certain specified proportions, to the Respondent the Reverend Charles Baillie Hamilton, Sir John Scott, the father of the Respondent, Sir William Scott, and to the other Respondent, Sir Henry Hay Macdougall.

The arrangements made by this deed, as well as by the trust disposition, were in many respects materially different from those of the settlement which had been made in 1790, but neither of them contained any express revocation of that settlement.

Duke John dying without issue, the disposition as to the unentailed lands was reduced by judgment of the Court of Session at the instance of the Ladies Ker, in their character of heirs of line to the disposer.

Duke John was succeeded in the entail by Duke William, who did not challenge these settlements.

Duke William was succeeded by the Appellant, James Duke of Roxburghe, who brought an action of reduction and declarator to set aside these settlements. The summons recites the title of the pursuer as heir of entail, and the before-mentioned deeds, and concludes, 1st, that it ought to be found and declared that "John Duke of Roxburghe did, by the execution of the deed of the 19th of March 1804, effectually revoke and recal the foresaid deed or instrument executed by him in liege poustie, on the 14th day of October 1790, as well as the foresaid writing or memorandum of [625] date the 5th of November 1803, purporting to be a direction to the trustees named in the trust-deed of the same date, in so far as said deed or instrument of 14th October 1790, and memorandum of 5th November 1803, or either of them, was or were prejudicial, or intended to be prejudicial, to the heirs of the entailed estate of Roxburghe, or to their claims to any lands or rights destined to them by prior rights and investitures thereof, and to the pursuer in particular." 2d, That the deed, of the 19th of March 1804, be set aside, "because the said deed, instrument or writing, was by the said Duke made and signed at a time when he was upon death-bed, labouring under the disease of which he died a few hours after, and when, by the common and statute law of this realm, he was incapable of making any deed to the prejudice of the pursuer, as heir of the investitures of the said lands." 3d, That at least, and in every event, and although it should not be found and declared, and although decret should not be pronounced in manner above mentioned, yet the said death-bed deed of the 19th of March 1804 ought and should be cassed, reduced, annulled, decerned, and declared in manner, and for the causes and reasons foresaid, to be and to have been void and null, so far as concerns the lands situated in the parish of Kelso, which belonged to the said John Duke of Roxburghe, whether destined to his heirs of entail or not, and to which, in virtue of the said liege poustie deed of 1790, the pursuer and other heirs of entail had a right, and were entitled to succeed, upon payment of £3000, and fulfilling [626] the other conditions of the deed in manner particularly before mentioned."

In this action, the Ladies Essex and M. Ker, the Respondent Wauchope, the only trustee who accepted and acted in the trusts of the deeds of 1803 and 1804, and the Respondents the residuary legatees were called as defenders. No appearance was made for the Ladies E. and M. Ker: but the Respondents having put in defences, and the case having been discussed before Lord Alloway, Ordinary, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—

"The Lord Ordinary having considered the mutual memorials for the parties, and the whole process, finds, that John Duke of Roxburghe, when in liege poustie, conveyed his whole unentailed subjects of every description to Lady Essex and Lady Mary Ker, his sisters, and their heirs in fee-simple; but with a destination, upon the failure of his sisters and their heirs, to his heirs of entail, and with a power to revoke and alter that deed, even on death-bed; finds, that the heirs of entail, in so far as they were the heirs of investiture of any parts of these lands, were completely excluded by that liege-poultie deed, in favour of his sisters; finds, that Duke John afterwards executed in 1803 a conveyance of his whole heritable subjects, not limited by the entails, to John Wauchope and James Dundas, as trustees for the purposes therein mentioned; finds, that upon the 19th March 1804, John Duke of Roxburghe, when upon death-bed, executed a deed of instructions, directing the trustees to distribute [627] his whole heritable and moveable property, by paying certain legacies, and dividing the residue of his fortune among certain residuary legatees; finds, that the right of challenging upon the head of death-bed, is only competent to the next heir of investiture having an interest, and who, in virtue of the death-bed deed being set aside, would succeed to the lands and heritages therein contained; finds, that if the death-bed deed in question were set aside, the deed 1790, which is not expressly revoked by the death-bed deed, must exclude the succession of the heirs of entail; and that the pursuer, James Duke of Roxburghe has no interest, as the heir of investiture, to insist upon the reduction of the death-bed deed 1804; and therefore assoilzies the defenders from the general conclusions of the reduction: And with regard to the particular conclusions, as to that part of the lands situated in the parish of Kelso, the investiture of which formerly stood to the heirs of entail, but which were again conveyed by the deed 1790 to the Duke's sisters, and which deed contains an obligation upon his sisters to convey these lands to the heir of entail, for the time being, upon his discharging them of all claims whatsoever against them, as the Duke's representatives, and making payment to them of £3000 sterling, at either of the two first terms of Martinmas, next after his death; finds, that the right to these subjects was actually conveyed to his sisters; and that therefore the right and interest of the pursuer as heir of investiture, to challenge the death-bed deed in 1804, was expressly excluded by the deed [628] in favour of Ladies Mary and Essex Ker in 1790; finds also, that the pursuer has no right to challenge the deed in question ex capite lecti, as to these lands, and assoilzies the defenders, and decerns."

A representation was given in by the Appellant against this judgment: upon advising which with answers, the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lord Ordinary having considered this representation, and the answers thereto, together with the whole process, refuses the representation, and adheres to the interlocutor complained of, in so far as relates to the general findings; but with regard to the alternative conclusion, as to the lands in the parish of Kelso, appoints the cause to be enrolled, and parties to be heard further upon this point; and particularly desires that the interlocutors in the process, which formerly depended before Lord Balgray, be produced in process; and that the pursuer shall also particularly condescend upon these lands in the parish of Kelso, as to which the investitures formerly stood to heirs of entail."

The Appellant represented against this judgment. The Lord Ordinary appointed the representation to be answered, and ordained a condescendence to be lodged on the special point, respecting the lands in the parish of Kelso. Thereafter, on advising these papers, the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lord Ordinary having considered this representation, and the whole process, after having heard parties, refuses the representation, and adheres to the interlocutors complained of;" and of the same date he pronounced this other interlocutor, as to the lands lying in the parish of Kelso: "The Lord Ordinary having again resumed consideration of this process, with regard to the lands lying in the parish of Kelso, in respect that the former investiture of these lands, in so far as it stood in favour of the heir of entail, was altered by the deed 1790, executed by John Duke of Roxburghe, in liege poultie; and that the representor cannot claim any benefit from that deed without being subjected to all the conditions contained in it, as a dispositive or legatee, in which character he was barred from challenging the death-bed deed in question; and as he cannot now fulfil the conditions on which alone he could claim the benefit of that deed, refuses this representation, and adheres to the interlocutors complained of."

The Appellant petitioned the Court of the first division against these interlocutors, but the Lords "adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it finds that the pursuer is barred by the deed of 1790 from challenging the death-bed deed of 1804, and that he has no right to challenge that deed ex capite lecti, as to any lands to which he would have had right as heir alioqui successurus; and further find, that the pursuer, the Duke of Roxburghe, is not entitled to avail himself of the right of redemption of the Kelso lands contained in the deed of 1790, inasmuch as the obligation therein contained is not imposed on the defenders by the death-bed deed, under which they take these lands."

[630] Another petition was presented to the same division, but the Court adhered to the interlocutor.

From these several interlocutors the Appeal to Parliament was presented.

For the Appellants, Mr. C. Warren and Mr. Wetherell:

The first question is, whether an implied revocation is sufficient to destroy a deed executed in lege pouta? By principle of law a subsequent deed, which is inconsistent with a prior deed, effects a revocation; so in the same instrument the last provision, and in different instruments the last in date, is operative and destroys the former. The deed of 1804 is explanatory and directory, and taken with that of 1803 they give the subject-matter to new disponees, and thereby declare that the dispositions of the deed of 1790 are altered. In the English law, which stands on the same principle, where the donee of a power alters the uses before limited, it is a revocation in law. So where a testator makes a later will inconsistent with an earlier will, it is an implied revocation (Powell on Devises, vol. 2, p. 132). According to these principles the deed of 1790 is revoked by the deed on death-bed, which is void for every other purpose but that of revocation. So by the law of England, and in principle, a subsequent will or instrument which is void for informality, or ineffectual on account of the incapacity of the devisee or donee, effects an implied revocation; as a devise to A. and afterwards to the poor of the parish, or to a corporation, or a papist; the second devise is void, and the first revoked.

[631] It is said to be inconsistent to suppose the deed invalid as made on death-bed, and yet to use it as a valid deed for the purpose of revocation; but it is used as showing the intention to revoke, and is efficient for no other purpose. Thus where a devise was made to B. and afterwards the deviser by deed poll granted the lands to his wife, that grant was held void. But although nothing passed by the deed, it was held to be a revocation (Beard v. Beard, 3 Atk. p. 72). So it is in the case of a feoffment without livery, and a bargain and sale not enrolled.*

An implied revocation is as powerful in law as an express revocation. By the law of Rome and of England as to personalty, a will is revoked by a second will inconsistent with it. The law stands on the principle of presumed intention, and is equally applicable to land. The authorities on this point, from the civil law, which is the fountain of the law of Scotland, are decisive.†

The failure or non-existence of the heir named in the last testament does not annul it as a will, and restore the former will.‡ If, indeed, no heir is [632] named (L. 11, ff. h. t.), or an impossible heir (L. 16, ff. h. t.), or the latter will is void in law upon the face of it (L. 16, sec. 1, ff. De vulg. et pup. subst.), it has not the effect of revocation, because it is no will; but whenever it may have an operation which is disappointed, the effect is not merely to give a preferable right to the devisee under the second will, in failure of which the right of the devisee under the first will revives, but to destroy that right altogether.

So Voet (Vol. 2, p. 288, lib. 28, tit. 3, s. 5) states the law to be, that although there must be a possibility of inheritance under the second will to make it effectual as a revocation, it is not necessary that the inheritance should vest. The former testament will be equally revoked, although the latter will is rejected by the heir named in it, or because he dies before the testator, or the condition of the gift fails (Inst. quib. mod. infirm. test. 16, ff. h. t.). From which it follows, that a testament once revoked by a second testament remains void, although the later will is afterwards rescinded by law; and this is equally true where the second will is revoked by a subsequent event, as by the birth of a posthumous child.*

These instances are precisely similar to the case of revocation by the event of death within the time limited by law. The deed is valid when made, but [633] becomes invalid by a subsequent event. A disposition of heritage, intended to be in operation during the life of the disposer, and revocable until his death, is in the nature of a will, and regulated by the same principle of law.

It is supposed that the rules of the civil law are inapplicable, because the case relates to death-bed; but the true point in question has nothing to do with the law of death-bed, which is peculiar to Scotland; but to the effect of a later deed or will as to revoking a former deed or will, and this question of revocation is not peculiar to the law of Scotland, but is a point of general law and of the civil law, as the foundation of the law of Scotland.

By that law a second testament annuls the first, and makes it ineffectual (Ersk. Inst. B. 3, tit. 9, s. 5). It is a revocation, and not a conditional substitution. So with respect to a legacy given to a different person by a posterior will (Stair, Inst. B. 3, tit. 8, s. 3), the right cannot revive in the first legatee by the event of the death of the second. Bankton (B. 3, tit. 8, s. 53) on the subject of implied revocations, says, "voluntary alienation of the thing bequeathed, or willingly uplifting a bond, and not employing, will infer revocation. But it is otherwise if the alienation was necessary, or the debtor forced the payment, and the money was re-employed on a moveable security. In this the testator will be presumed only to have been exercising lawful acts of administration, but not to have intended to prejudice or recall the legacy. A transfer of the legacy from one to another, etc. will infer a virtual re-[634]vocation." So Erskine (B. 3, t. 9, s. 6) says as to legacies, special and general, "they may be revoked by posterior derogatory deeds, or general dispositions."

The deed in question contained an express power of revocation, but mortis causa deeds are revocable in their nature; and whether they relate to real or moveable property, in this respect is immaterial; for the question turns upon the intention of the testator or disposer, to be inferred from his acts.

But the case is supposed to be concluded by authority, and the Respondents admitting that it may be difficult, on principle and by reason, to support the law as they represent it to be, contend that it is settled by decision, and not now disputable. To support this position they cite the cases of Irring v. Irring (Nov. 1738, Kilk. Voce Death-bed, p. 115); Finlay v. Birkenhead (Fac. Coll. July 29, 1779); Alexander Telfer †; and Ronan v. Alexander (22d Nov. 1775, D. P.)

But the cases are not applicable to the question; for in the first it was barely decided, that a death-bed-deed renewing a previous disposition in favour of the same donee, as the previous lige poutre deed did not operate as a revocation. No question was raised, as in this case, whether an implied was not equal to an express revocation; and whether such revocation was not effected by a subsequent deed altering the disposition of a preceding deed. In Finlay v. Birkenhead the revocation was express, and therefore not applicable to a question of implied revocation. The case of Alexander Telfer is not reported, but [635] according to the account given by the Respondents, it was similar to the case of Irring; the death-bed deed being a renewal of the disposition in favour of the same party, as in the liege poustie deed, it was held not to be a revocation either express or implied.

Pars. v, sec. 32. But in this doctrine the civil law appears to differ from the law of England where the latter will has not expressly recalled the former. See Goodright v. Glaister, 1 Burr. 2512 Peck, 240, 44. As. 4 pl. 36. M. 44, Ed. 3, 33, Doug. 40. Burtenshaw v. Gilbert, Cowp. 49.

As to Rowan v. Alexander, it is a single case, decided upon a difference of opinion: it is contrary to principle, and has not been followed in practice. The Respondents suppose it has been confirmed in the case of Coutts (Craufurd v. Coutts), D. P. 1799: see the note at the end of this case, but the fact is otherwise. It was a case of express revocation, and Lord Loughborough in moving judgment, alluding to the case of Rowan v. Alexander, said, he did not agree with the Court of Session in the distinction made by them in that case between express and implied revocation. According to the opinion of Lord Loughborough, expressed in the case of Coutts, a second disposition, inconsistent with the first, operates per se as a revocation. Being of this opinion, he could not have thought Rowan v. Alexander a correct decision. In the same case of Coutts, Lord Eldon said "he concurred with Lord Rosslyn that it would have been impossible for him on appeal, to have acceded to the judgment of the Court of Session, in the reversion of the decision of the Lord Ordinary in Rowan v. Alexander." The authority of the case is impeached by these judicial observations; it has been followed by no similar judgment, and is not supported by the practice of the courts or of conveyancers. When the case of Craufurd v. Coutts again came before the House in [636] 1806, the decision in Rowan v. Alexander was again disapproved by Lord Eldon: but he said, if titles rested upon the authority of the case, it ought not to be disturbed. So that the date of the decision (1775) seems the only difficulty impeding reversal and the only ground for supporting it.

If the words "I revoke," had been used by the disposer, the revocation is admitted, although the deed is reduced on the head of death-bed. But is there any peculiar virtue in these words, surpassing the effect of an act of revocation done in pursuance of a preconceived intention? A power to revoke being previously reserved, a new disposition is made, giving the lands to new disponees. How a revocation can be more effectually made it is difficult to conceive. The act itself is conclusive to show the intention of the disposer: and in addition to this, the memorandum signed after the execution of the first deed of trust shows that the deed of 1790 was considered by the Duke as revoked. For on no other supposition could it be necessary to provide, as he does, by the memorandum, that the deed of 1790 should remain effective, if he should make no appointment under the powers of the trust-deed.

In that memorandum the power is expressly recited, the future exercise of the power is contemplated, and upon the supposition that the general deed of trust operates as a revocation, a provision is made to counteract that effect. The deed in liege poustie is therefore by implication revoked, and does not interfere with the right and title of the Appellant to reduce the deed made on death-bed, which, though void in law, may be used to show the intent [637] to revoke. These propositions are borne out by authority (Moore v. Moore, Phill. Rep. 412: and cases there cited).

2. The deed in question cannot interfere with the right of the Appellant, because it became ineffectual by the rejection of the disponees in that deed. The right of the heir to reduce a deed on death-bed cannot be taken away by a deed in liege poustie, unless a valid right is thereby constituted in some third person, and made effective by acceptance. A deed merely disinheriting the heir, or made in blank to be filled up in lecto, is inoperative. The former case is self-evident: the latter is decided by the case of Pennycook (Fount. Jan. 18. 1687. See Brudenell v. Boughton, 2 Atk. 270): although it appeared in evidence that the testator, being in liege poustie, had declared that he intended to fill the blank with the name which was inserted in lecto. So, in a case where the name of the donee had been inserted in liege poustie, but in a blank left at the time the domicile was afterwards added on death-bed, the disposition was held incomplete and ineffectual to exclude the heir from challenging the deed on death-bed (Buchanan, 1683. Harcarse, Lectus Egritudinis, p. 182). So deeds executed in liege poustie in favour of the heir, with a power reserved to revoke and redispone on death-bed, do not exclude the title of the heir to reduce: because no effective right is established in a third person, and the power reserved is a fraud upon the law: it is the assertion of a faculty and judgment to dispose on death-bed, which the law denies. If such reser-[638]-vations were permitted the law would be futile, for every heir might contrive his own law, to enable him to dispose on death-bed (Hepburn v. Hepburn, 25 Feb. 1663, Stair. Davidson v. Davidson, 17 Nov. 1687, Fountainhall). It can make no difference whether the cause of this inefficiency is original or supervenient. A disposition is equally ineffectual whether to an actual Jew, or a person who becomes a Jew; to a person actually attainted, or who becomes attainted, before the death of the donor. So a gift to an alien, or any person incapable of taking the estate, is void; and it is immaterial whether the gift with a power of revocation be to a person originally incapable, or afterwards becoming so; or to a person capable, but having such right in opposition to the deed; or where the gift is subject to such conditions, that a rejection of the gift is the sure consequence. A liege poustie disposition, subject to legal objection, does not destroy the interest of the heir to reduce the deed on death-bed. In what respect can the case of legal objection, which prevents the existence of an interest to bar the title to the heir, be distinguished from the rejection of an interest by which it is equally annulled?

3. If the deed of 1790 is not revoked, the appellant may reduce the death-bed deed for the purpose of claiming the lands of Kelso. It is objected that by the former deed he is barred from challenging the latter. That might be so, if the disposition were made to a stranger; but the ancestor cannot, by this contrivance, take away the right of an heir alioqui successurus, to challenge the deed on death-bed.

The Ladies Ker, to whom the lands of Kelso [639] were given, as trustees, with a beneficial condition, have rejected the gift, and their rejection is recorded by the judgment. The lands, therefore, devolve to the persons for whose benefit they were given, free from the condition, and as if the disposition to the Ladies Ker had never existed; or supposing that, under these circumstances, the lands are not disposed of, the Appellant claims them as heir of tailzie. It is said he cannot appropriate and reprobate, but as heir of tailzie he seeks only to reprobate. If it is to be considered as a gift to the heir, on the rejection by the conditional disponees, taking under the liege poustie deed as heir, or by paramount title, he may reduce the deed on death-bed. Considering that deed as a conveyance to the Ladies Ker, it is to them as trustees for the Appellant, as heir of entail. So it is put by the Respondents themselves, in their pleadings in the court below. In their condescendence they broadly argue, that it is in substance a disposition in favour of the heirs of entail; and so it was held by the two successive judgments of the Lord Ordinary (Balgray), who pronounces the deed of 1790 to be a settlement in favour of the heirs of entail. Whether the conditions of the conveyance are to be fulfilled, and in favour of whom, are different questions, which may be discussed afterwards in a different proceeding.

The objections as to the Kelso lands, that the condition is not imposed on the disponees in the death-bed deed, and that it contains no disposition in favour of the heirs, must be admitted as facts; but the question of law returns, whether the heir is not entitled to reduce the death-bed deed? A gift [640] by liege poustie to an heir, or a trustee for the heir, or to him through the medium of a stranger, upon any condition, does not destroy his right to challenge a death-bed deed. If a gift to any other person, on condition to convey to the heir, with a power of revocation, defeats the right of the heir, the law of death-bed is futile, as being open to the plainest evasion. As to the objection, that the conditions imposed in the conveyance exclude him, and particularly, that the estate is to be conveyed subject to the terms of the entail of Roxburghe: what is to prevent his fulfilling the conditions, if necessary, and taking the estate as heir quasi beneficial disponee? A right in the heir to redeem lands, or a right to lands subject to a burden, may be less in quantity or degree, but in quality is the same as an absolute right, and equally protected in favour of the heir by the law of death-bed. The death-bed deed is equally to his prejudice, whether he is to take as heir or disponee, and whether it be directly, or through the intervention of the Ladies Ker, or the Respondents, as their substitutes. In the case of a wadset the redeemable right is vested in the wadsetter; but the ancestor cannot dispose the lands on death-bed to the prejudice of the heir; nor is he excluded from redemption, because he cannot be served as heir, but must take by reconveyance.

It is objected, that as to the Kelso lands, the Appellant in his summons founded on his right, under the disposition of 1790; but he founded mainly on his right as heir of investiture, a right which appears on the face of that deed, and in the fact were as contended, the rules of Scotch [641] pleading do not exclude a party founding up in a deed in his summons, from abandoning that ground in court, and claiming as heir. The disposition of lands subject to redemption, it is contended, makes the heir a disponent, and that the right of redemption is personal to the heir, which right he cannot exercise without acknowledging the validity of the deed under which he takes. But the disposition only qualifies the right of the heir, still leaving to him that character: the right of redemption is real in the heir, as by the exercise of that right he is reinstated in his inheritance. The objection, that the condition was to be performed after the Duke's decease, within a time which is past, and that it cannot now be performed, is too technical and too inequitable to be maintained. The question has been under litigation ever since the Duke's death, and no payment could be made till the death-bed deed was reduced.

For the Respondents:—The Attorney-General and Mr. Clerk (since raised to the Bench of the Court of Session, under the title of Lord Eldin).

The lands which are the subject of controversy were settled by simple destination, without fetters, upon the heirs of entail of the Roxburghe family. These lands were given by the deed of 1790, a deed inter vivos to the Ladies Ker, upon conditions: one of which is, the power reserved to revoke and alter. That power existed without reservation: but the clause dispensing with delivery is considered necessary where the author intends to keep the deed in [642] his repository; and, according to the general opinion, a deed is ineffectual without such clause, if not delivered. The deed of 1790 remained in force and unaltered until the execution of the deed of 1803, whereby a new disposition is made of the estate, so far as it is thereby vested in trustees. The beneficial interest might not ultimately have been affected by that deed. It is by the deed of 1804, operating upon the trusts of the deed of 1803, that the estate is destined to the Respondents, the beneficial devisees. The question arising out of this state of facts is one purely of Scotch law.

Arguments drawn by analogy from the law of England are dangerous to be applied in deciding on questions of the law of Scotland. By the law of Scotland, a person possessed of an hereditary right, without fetters, has power to dispose in liege poustie: he may reserve a power of revocation on death-bed. It is admitted that by the same law a person cannot on death-bed dispose of heritable property to the prejudice of his heir.

The Duke of Roxburghe had complete dominion over the property in question, of which he made a disposition by the deed of 1790. If this had been the only instrument executed by him, it is not disputed by the Appellant that it would have been a good disposition. By that deed he reserved a power to revoke on death-bed: by the deed of 1803 he gives the whole residue of his estate and effects, consisting of realty and personalty, in trust for such persons and uses as he had directed or should direct by any deed thereafter to be executed.

It has been argued at the bar that this deed alone [643] operated as a revocation of the deed of 1790. It was not so argued in the court below: but that the deeds of 1803 and 1804 together so operated. If no death-bed disposition had been made, it is clear that the Ladies Ker would have been entitled under the residuary clause in the first of those deeds. For the deed of 1803 expressly refers to that of 1790: and it seems to be admitted in the proceedings below by the Appellant, that the deed of 1790 remained in operation, so far as it was not altered by that of 1803, until the execution of the deed of 1804. And such appears to be the right construction from a passage in the speech of the Lord Chancellor, in the case of * Ker v. Wauchope. It was lawful to revoke by a liege poustie deed, although not by a death-bed deed. The language of the deed of 1804 becomes important in considering whether it is or is not a revocation of the deed of 1803. The deed of 1804 is a deed of appointment or instruction to his trustees already named in the deed of 1803. By the deed of 1804 he gives to those trustees the power to sell the real and personal estates already vested in them by the former deed, and to apply the produce in payment of legacies, and upon the other trusts specified in that deed. So far is this from an intention to revoke the deed of 1803, that it is founded upon it, and the authority is derived from it. It is on this ground that the two deeds together are said to be a revocation of the deed of 1790.

To reduce a death-bed disposition, it must be to the prejudice of the heir, and no one else can question it. The law of death-bed was made in favour of the heir (Regiam Majest. Stair. Erskine's Princ. of the Law of Scotland).

If there has been a liege poustie disposition to a stranger, the heir at law cannot question the death-bed disposition: although on death-bed a disposition in favour of the heir may so far be made as to revoke a liege poustie disposition made against him (see Craufurd v. Coutts. Post).

A party may by a liege poustie deed reserve a power to alter on death-bed. The arguments on the other side would show, that a death-bed disposition operates as a revocation of the liege poustie deed. Rowan v. Alexander is not the only, nor even the first case on the subject. It was both preceded and followed by others decided on the same principles. In Ker v. Ker (Stair, p. 174. 199. Dict. of Decis. 3250), a deed made partly in favour of a grandchild, the son of the second son of the disponent, was delivered by him sub silentio to a stranger. The disponent afterwards, on death-bed, required the depositary to redeliver the deed, and having obtained possession of it, delivered it to a notary, to whom he also gave two blank papers, with his signature, desiring him to fill up the one with a disposition to his second son, the other, with a disposition to the only daughter of his eldest son, who was dead. Upon these facts it was held, that the first delivery was conditional, and that the recalling was effectual, although made on death-bed: seeing thereby the heir had no prejudice, since, if the death-bed deed were reduced, the former liege [645] poustie deed was set up. The disponent in the first deed could not challenge it, because that deed was made revocable * on death-bed, which is lawful as against all persons but the heir.

In Craufurd v. Coutts there was an interval during which the right of the heir at law revested in him. But where there is a virtual revocation there is no such revestment (Ker v. Ker, 9. s.). In McKean v. Russell, where a creditor having taken a bond payable to himself, if living, and after his decease to persons therein named as substitutes, with a power reserved to him at any time of his life to receive and discharge the same, without consent of the substitutes, exercised the power on death-bed by disposing the bond to persons not being either the substitutes or his heirs at law; this disposition being questioned, in an action of reduction upon the head of death-bed, it was argued for the heir, that the death-bed deed annulled the substitution, and revested his right; and although by the same act the subject was disposed to strangers, the alienation was ineffectual as against him, being done on death-bed. But these reasons of reduction were repelled by the court (Dict. of Decis. Death-bed, p. 3277).

As to Rowan v. Alexander, it is said the property was but small, and the question not much discussed in the court below. The case was fully argued both there and in this house. The liege poustie deed in that case was most materially altered [646] by the death-bed disposition. It is in almost every circumstance similar to the present case.

It is admitted that by a death-bed disposition the liege poustie deed may be burdened; what is that but a revocation pro tanto? Rowan v. Alexander was decided in 1775. Many estates are held upon the law as settled by that case.

It was followed by the case of Donaldson.† On [647] advising the petition in

* By implication under the circumstances of the delivery.

† Donaldson v. McKenzie, 20th July 1776. The case is not reported. The following is a short outline of the facts, pleadings and judgment:—John Donaldson, book seller in London, adjudged certain subjects in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh as belonging to Alexander Thompson. In that process, Mrs. McKenzie of Rebe, the daughter of James Thompson, by a second marriage, appeared, and insisted that the subjects sought to be adjudged belonged to her; and to prove this to be the case, she produced, 1st, A mutual disposition (1768) between her father and mother, departing to themselves, and to Mrs. McKenzie and her heirs, their whole heritable and moveable estate. 2dly, A holograph deed, dated 13th Sept. 1769, by which James Thompson conveyed to her the subjects in question. 3dly, A trust disposition to James Thompson, with consent of his spouse, conveying his whole estate to her.

Donaldson's case, it was refused without answer, on the ground that the death-bed disposition was not to the prejudice of the heir.

The case of Craufurd v. Coutts was decided on the ground that an express revocation vested the right in the heir, and then the death-bed deed was to the prejudice of the heir. The Lord Chancellor in that case held (see note at the end of the Case), that at the time of the death-bed disposition there was no effectual liege poustie deed in existence.

[648] In the court below, Lord Gillies, in the discussion of the present case, said, as to the case of Rowan v. Alexander, "That even if wrong it ought to be upheld;" and he conceived "that there was a great difference between implied and express revocation." The term, "implied revocation," cannot properly be applied to this case: according to the law of England it always proceeds upon the supposition, that the grantor has power to grant. There is no case in which it has been held that a deed executed by a person having no power can be a revocation. By the law of Scotland, upon a deed inter vivos, such as the liege poustie deed in this case, a power being reserved to alter on death-bed, it could only be altered by express exercise of the power; and the execution of a subsequent deed, which is destroyed by legal challenge, was never in that law held to be such an exercise of the power. That implied revocations have the same effect in law as express revocations, is a doctrine contradicted by authorities in the law of Scotland, showing that parties whose interest it was to contend for that doctrine, and who must have succeeded if it had been well founded, never thought of resorting to it as an argument in support of their claims.* The distinction between express and implied revocations is established by the cases of Rowan v. Alexander and Craufurd v. Coutts.† On that point the Judges of [649] the Court of Session, who delivered their opinions in this case, were unanimous.

There is no such head in the dictionary as implied revocation, and the term itself is foreign to the law of Scotland. The cases of presumed revocation are totally different: as where a legacy is given, and the subject of the gift is afterwards disposed of for certain purposes therein expressed. This trust disposition was executed in lecto, and Mr. Donaldson insisted that the trust deed should be reduced upon that ground, in as far as it was prejudicial to Alexander Thompson, the heir of his father. As to the holograph deed, Mrs. McKenzie could not prove its date: and of course it was held to have been executed in lecto. And lastly, with regard to the mutual disposition of 1768, Mr. Donaldson insisted that it was revoked by the trust disposition.

Lord Monboddo, Ordinary, repelled this plea of Mr. Donaldson, who reclaimed to the court: putting his cause upon the following points:—"That both in law and in equity he is entitled, as creditor to the heir apparent, to insist, 1mo, That the mutual disposition and settlement founded on is effectually revoked by the trust disposition: and 2do, That he is entitled to reduce the said trust disposition ex capite lecti, without giving effect to the former deed: or in other words, to use the trust disposition to cut down the former settlement, and thereafter to reduce the same disposition as executed on death-bed."

In support of the last of these propositions, Mr. Donaldson founded, at great length, upon the case of Cunningham v. Whiteford Falconer, 10th June 1718, insisting that it was a well-founded decision: but, on moving his petition, the court was of opinion that the case of Cunningham was erroneously decided. Lord President Dundas and Lord Corrington said, that they knew the history of that cause very well: that before it came to be heard at the bar of the House of Lords, the parties understood that Lord Hardwicke, then Chancellor, thought that the interlocutor of the Court of Session was ill-founded: in consequence of which understanding the matter was compromised by payment of a large sum of money. When counsel were called to the bar the cause was not argued: but it was stated that the matter was made up, and that both parties concurred in wishing the decree to be affirmed. Upon which Lord Hardwicke observed from the woolsack, that the Respondent had done wisely in not risking a judgment, and thus the interlocutor was affirmed.

otherwise; or where a specific legacy is followed by a general disposition of all the funds, including that legacy: there it is rather a question of preferable disposition than of implied or even presumed revocation. If by law the disposer has the power on death-bed to substitute a new object of his bounty in the place of the liege poustie disponent, how is that end to be effected? According to the argument of the Appellant, on the doctrine of implied revocation, the attempt to make a new disposition operates to displace the right of all the disponents, and gives the benefit to a party excluded by the author. Such a doctrine, if admitted, could only have the effect to prevent any disposition after a deed in liege poustie.

It is to be observed, that the deed of 1790 conveyed no right to the disponent at the time of its execution. It was an undelivered deed, kept in the repositories of the author, and containing an express reservation of power to revoke. The effect of such a deed is suspended, both as to the heir and the disponent, until the death of the author. In a testamentary instrument, the event of death operates as a delivery. If it be revoked, the right of the heir revives, or rather remains unaffected. But how is the power of revocation to be exercised? Erskine (B. 3. tit. 8. s. 98) [650] says, "Where it is actually revoked the heir may pursue reduction of any subsequent deed made on death-bed to his prejudice." By actual revocation can he mean implied, or any thing less than express revocation? The deed to be reduced must be subsequent to the revocation, according to the doctrine expressed in that passage, which excludes the notion of a revocation in favour of the heir by a deed which is intended to operate in favour of another object of the author's bounty. That in such case there should be an implied revocation is a contradiction in terms.

If the analogy of English law is to prevail, the question is decided by the case of Goodright v. Glazier (Burr. p. 2542), which is law, notwithstanding the case of Moore v. Moore (qua supra). A second will being cancelled sets up the first.

As to the cases from Rolle's Abridgment, they are on the ground that an alteration in the estate has taken place, which alters the seisin: so that, technically, the party has not the same estate. That rule of law depends on the words of the statute of wills.

The case in Cowper * was decided on the ground of express revocation, by one of the modes prescribed, and having operation according to the [651] words of the statute of frauds. If the second will is to be reduced on the ground of incapacity in the testator, it cannot be looked at for any purpose whatever, and then the first instrument remains in operation. It comes under the principle of decision in Goodright v. Glazier.

In the cases of Pennycook v. Thomson, Hepburn v. Hepburn, and Davidson v. Davidson, there was no previous deed in liege poustie to exclude the heir. In the first the deed was signed blank, and filled up on death-bed with the name of the disponent.

If the gift were to a person incapable of taking, the case might be different: and if, even to a dying person, according to the extreme case put by the Appellant, a question might arise, whether such deed were not null and void, as fraudulent and fictitious? Cases of fraud are decided upon the peculiar ground of fraud.

If there have been no cases on implied revocation since the decision in Rowan and Alexander, it must be on the ground that the law is considered as settled. Here is no express revocation as in Craufurd v. Coutts, but on the contrary, a reference to the previous deed, which is evidence that the interest of the heir is cut off: and if revoked in any sense, can only be to the effect of transferring the estate and right to the new disponent. If implications are to prevail, there is, with other implications, an implied assignation to the liege poustie deed, to make the gift to the new disponent effectual.

It has been argued that the Ladies Ker having repudiated the deed of 1790, the title of the heir at [652] law vests: but there must be something to repudiate. They had not an absolute, but only a qualified and conditional right, subject to the power to alter on death-bed, which power was exercised by the testator; and neither they nor the Appellant as disponees can question the death-bed disposition. They could only repudiate for themselves, not for other parties interested: as to them it is res inter alios acta. According to the state of law supposed in this argument, the death-bed disponee and the liege-pouster disponee may, by collusion, exclude the heir; or the heir, and the liege-pouster disponee may, by a similar operation, exclude the death-bed disponee; and the effect of the author's bounty will depend upon the contrivance of the parties: but no such attempt has ever been heard of in the law. There is no ground for this doctrine of repudiation. The estate does not vest during the life of the disposer, and it requires no acceptance at his death, but vests immediately upon that event. In the Bargany case the party repudiated by an instrument duly executed. There must be, together with the repudiation, an investment of the right in another: which in heritable rights, can only be effected according to the known forms of law. The deed executed on death-bed constituted a right preferable to the right contemplated by the deed of 1790: that deed became accessory to the deed on death-bed, by the will and intention of the author, and the heir has no interest in the disposition. According to English law, if an estate is given to A., with a condition to pay a sum of money to B., A. may repudiate, but he cannot disappoint the legatee.

* Burtenshaw v. Gilbert, p. 49.—In this case there were two parts of the first will, one of which being in the possession of the testator was cancelled, the other, being a duplicate, in the possession of a depository of the testator, was found uncanceled in the room where the testator died. The opinion of the court was, that both parts were cancelled by the cancellation of one.

[653] By the deed of 1790, the Kelso lands are given to the Ladies Ker to convey to the heirs of entail, on payment of a certain sum on a given day. This confers no right upon the heir in his representative character. It is a privilege affecting the lands, whether entailed or unentailed. As heir of entail he could have no claim to unentailed lands: and, with respect to lands entailed by simple destination, he was excluded by the deed on death-bed. It is argued, that by the operation of that deed he is remitted to the right under the deed of 1790. But in what character is he to maintain that right? not as heir, but as disponee. The legacy of a right to purchase the lands was displaced by a subsequent disposition. By the deed of 1790, the heirs of entail were put out of the investiture of the lands. Suppose the disposition had been in favour of heirs of line, could the heirs of entail have raised a claim? To support such claim the heir must be a person who is deprived of the estate by the death-bed disposition. But in this case he was deprived by the previous deed of 1790. The claim must be supported on the ground that by the will they have a right as heirs of entail: but it is no right to the lands; it is a mere personal obligation on the Ladies Ker, the disponees. The offer was to be made within the time limited by the deed, which has not been done, and it is now too late.

The Lord Chancellor (in the course and at the conclusion of the argument):

Testamentary deeds executed in liege-pouster [654] usually contain a power to revoke. It is argued that a revocation of the deed revokes the power, which is part of it. But unless the power is expressly revoked, no court can impute to the author of a deed the absurdity, that he means to revoke a power which he professes to exercise.

On the points as to the repudiation and the Kelso estates, the judges of the Court of Session having differed, it is necessary that those questions should be accurately considered. As to the question of implied revocation; if we are to act on the maxim of stare decisis, the judgment cannot be disturbed. The deed in liege-pouster reserves a power of revocation; by making another disposition under the authority of the power, it must be supposed that the disposer intended to do something effectual; and it cannot be implied that by the exercise of the power he meant to revoke it.

25 May 1820.—The Lord Chancellor: Having looked carefully into this case, I can see no sufficient reason for saying that this judgment should be altered. It appears to me, upon the best consideration I can give to the case, that upon all the points controverted at the bar the Respondent is right.

Judgment affirmed.

[655] WILLIAM MOODIE, an infant, the representative of Mrs. ELIZABETH CRAUFURD, otherwise HOWIESON, Widow, deceased, by the Reverend JAMES MOODIE, his father, and WILLIAM BEVERIDGE, Trustee of the said Mrs. E. CRAUFURD,—Appellants: THOMAS COUTTS, Esquire, Banker in London, —Respondent [11th July 1799, and 6th August 1803, and 14th March 1806].

By REVIVOR,

[Considered in Gordon v. Clyne 1839, 6 Cl. and F. 552, 560.]

COLONEL CRAUFURD, being possessed of the estates of Craufurdland and Monkland, in the county of Ayr, and of certain superiorities in the county of Renfrew, all of which he held in fee simple in the year 1771, executed a disposition of the estates of Craufurdland and Monkland in the following terms: "In favour of myself in liferent, and to the heirs male lawfully to be begotten of my body; whom failing, to Sir Hugh Craufurd of Jordanhill, baronet, and the heirs male lawfully begotten, or to be begotten of his body; which failing, to the heirs male lawfully begotten of the now deceased William Craufurd, merchant in Glasgow, my cousin; which failing, to the heirs male lawfully begotten of the also deceased John Craufurd, late surgeon in Glasgow, his brother; whom all failing, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whatsoever in fee, heritably, and irredeemably, all and whole, etc.

"Providing and declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that notwithstanding the right of fee and property of the lands above disposed is hereby conceived and taken in favour of the heirs male of my own body; whom failing, to the heirs male of the several other persons before mentioned, substituted to them, and that heritably and irredeemably; yet, nevertheless I do hereby reserve to myself full power and liberty at any time of my life, et etiam in articulo mortis, to alter, innovate, annul, and make void these presents, either in whole or in part, and to infringe upon, or totally change the foresaid series of heirs, and course [656] and order of succession above devised; as also to wadset, contract debts, and grant heritable bonds or other securities upon the lands and others above disposed, as I shall think proper, and burden and affect the same to what extent I may see necessary; and sicklike to sell, alienate, and dispose the haill foresaid lands or any part thereof, and in general to do every deed and exercise every act of property that any unlimited liar by law can do; and that without the advice or consent of the heirs male of my own body, if any there shall hereafter be, or of the other heirs male substituted to them in the order above mentioned, to be asked or obtained for that purpose; as also notwithstanding any charter or infeftment that may have followed hereupon."

This deed, which was executed by Colonel Craufurd in liege pousitie, was not delivered to the disponees, or any person for them, but remained in the repositories of the disposer.

On the 13th of February 1793, Colonel Craufurd executed a deed by which he conveyed the estate of Craufurdland to the Respondent: "For the love, favour, and affection I have and bear to Thomas Coutts, Esq. banker in London, and to the end that all disputes and differences which might arise upon my death touching the succession to my estate and means, may be obviated and prevented," etc. After conveying the lands and estates of Craufurdland, and after providing for the payment of Colonel Craufurd's debts, funeral expenses, and legacies, the deed declares that the Respondent and his heirs, succeeding in the estate of Craufurdland, shall assume and bear the surname and arms of Craufurd of Craufurdland.

The deed also contains a clause in the following words: "And I hereby revoke and recall all former dispositions, assignations, or other deeds of a testamentary nature formerly made and granted by me, to whatever person or persons preceeding the date hereof; and particularly a deed granted by me in the year 1771, settling my estate upon Sir Hugh Craufurd of Jordanhill, baronet, and his heirs; and I declare the same to be void and null, so far as these deeds are conceived in favour of the persons to whom they are granted, but to be valid and sufficient to the extent of the powers [657] therein reserved to me to revoke, alter, or innovate the same, to the effect only of making these presents effectual in favour of the said Thomas Coutts and his forefathers."

This deed also conveys to the Respondent the superiorities in the county of Renfrew, which were not conveyed to Sir Hugh Craufurd by the former disposition in the year 1771.

Colonel Craufurd died on the 19th February 1793.

Of the same date with the disposition of the lands of Craufurdland in the Respondent's favour, Colonel Craufurd executed a separate deed, by which, without communication with the Respondent, he conveyed to him the lands of Monkland, in consideration of a sum (not paid) of £5000 sterling, as the price thereof. As soon as Colonel Craufurd had executed these deeds, he wrote to the Respondent and desired him to send his bond for £5000, as the price of Monkland; and the Respondent accordingly, on the 18th of February 1793, executed a bond for that sum in favour of Colonel Craufurd, as the price of these lands, and sent it to his agent Mr. James Dundas, writer to the signet, to be exchanged for the disposition of Monkland. Colonel Craufurd died before that bond arrived in Scotland.

On the 17th May 1793, the Respondent was duly infeft in the lands of Craufurdland and of Monkland.

Afterwards Mrs. Howieson, who was the aunt and heir at law of Colonel Craufurd, (with William Beveridge, writer to the signet, her trustee) brought an action of reduction before the Court of Session in Scotland, for reducing and setting aside the disposition in 1771, in favour of Sir Hugh Craufurd, and the two deeds executed in 1793, conveying the lands of Craufurdland and Monkland to the Respondent.

The process of reduction came before Lord Stonefield, as Lord Ordinary, who, after hearing parties, took the cause to report: and on advising informations, the Court of Session (June 12, 1795) pronounced the following interlocutor: "Upon the report of the Lord President, in absence of Lord Stonefield, and having advised the informations for the parties, petition for the pursuers, and additional information for them, the Lords sustain the reasons of reduction in so far as they respect the superiority of the [658] lands in the county of Renfrew, contained in the charter, 12th February 1725, from the then Prince of Wales, as Prince and Steward of Scotland, and reduce, decern, and declare accordingly: repel the reasons of reduction, in so far as they respect the lands of Craufurdland, and others, contained in the disposition by the late Colonel Craufurd to the defender Thomas Coutts, of date 13th February 1793: assolvie the defender, and decern: Find that the alleged sale of Monkland, set forth in the other deed of the same date, 1793, was an unfinished transaction: and remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties procurators further thereon, and to do as he shall see just: remit also to his Lordship, to hear parties procurators upon the claim competent to the pursuers under the disposition and tailzie 1719, and to do therein as he shall see cause."

The disposition, so far as concerned the superiorities in Renfrewshire, was reduced, because these were not contained in the deed 1771: and the Respondent acquiesced in this part of the judgment.

The pursuers complained of this interlocutor, by a reclaiming petition, in so far as it sustained the conveyance of the lands of Craufurdland in favour of the Respondent, and prayed the court "to reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the libel: and, secondly, to find that neither Sir Hugh Craufurd, nor any of the persons called by the deed 1771, have any right to the lands in question, but that the same belong to the petitioner as the just and lawful heir therein."

The Respondent put in his answer, and the court pronounced (Nov. 17, 1795) the following interlocutor: "The Lords having advised this petition, and the additional petition, with the answers thereto, they adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refuse the desire of these petitions."

Mrs. Howieson, and her trustee, appealed from the interlocutors of 12th June and 17th November 1795, in so far as they repelled the reasons of reduction respecting the disposition of the lands of Craufurdland. This appeal was heard at the bar of the House of Lords: and on the 11th of July, 1799, Judgment was pronounced: "Whereby it was ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the [659] cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, and that the said court do rehear the parties upon the interlocutors complained of on the said appeal."

In consequence of this remit, parties were heard in presence of the Court of Session, and memorials were afterwards ordered, upon advising which, this interlocutor was pronounced (Feb. 3, 1801): "The Lords having resumed consideration of this cause, and in obedience to a remit from the Most Honourable the House of Lords, having again heard counsel for the parties upon the interlocutors complained of in the appeal to that Most Honourable House, and having advised the mutual memorials for the parties, they adhere to these interlocutors, assoilzie the defender from the reduction, in so far as concerns the lands of Craufurdlan, and decern."

Mrs. Howieson and her trustee also brought their appeal against this interlocutor, and the two former interlocutors pronounced in this cause, contained in the former appeal; and Mrs. Howieson having died, the appeal was revived in the name of the now Appellant, the infant, her grandson and representative.

On the 11th of July 1799, some time after the argument upon the first hearing in the House of Peers, Lord Rosslyn moved the judgment in the following terms:

The Lord Chancellor: The hearing at the bar upon this cause was had some time ago, and I have now to state the result of the opinion I have formed upon it. The more I have considered this case the more I have felt the difficulty and importance of it. I had the advantage of trying my own opinion by communications with persons conversant in the law of Scotland, who were present at the hearing, with a noble and learned Lord (Lord Thurlow), who perused the printed cases, and with a Judge of the Court of Session, who was not raised to the Bench when the judgment now appealed from was pronounced. I had verbal communication also with other persons, and I was favoured with the result of the opinions they had formed.

These opinions were not uniform. If they had all gone in one course I should have deemed that the safe mode [660] for you to have followed in determining this cause, though it had differed from my own sentiments. It is proper to state, that the learned Lord I alluded to concurs with me; and that our opinion is, that the judgment in the present case is contrary to law. At the same time he feels, as I myself do, much difficulty in a question purely of Scots law upon such opinions as we can form, to state it as advisable to reverse the judgment of the Court of Session.

I shall mention in a few words the nature of the present question, to show the importance of it, the grounds upon which the decision proceeded, and the nature of my doubts with regard to it; and I shall then submit what I conceive is proper to be done in the present case.

The facts in the cause are short. Colonel Craufurd possessed an estate, which he destined by deed, several years ago, to Sir Hugh Craufurd, who was not his heir. This deed remained in Colonel Craufurd's hands undelivered; but if he had died without executing any other deed, no doubt the estate would have gone to Sir Hugh. He reserved a power, however, to alter the deed, in whole or in part, et etiam in articulo mortis.

This reservation referred to a point in the ancient law of Scotland, which I have always looked up to as of great excellence; and I have read cases where it was treated with great respect by Lord Hardwicke. By that law no deed is valid against the heir if executed on death-bed, that is, if the grantor be attacked with the sickness of which he dies, and does not survive a certain number of days. In the argument stated in the printed cases it was held out that this was a personal privilege in favour of the heir at law, a regulation for his benefit alone. But in my opinion this comes far short of the excellence of the regulations; it is also highly favourable to the dying man, that his last moments should not be disquieted. It was, perhaps, at first intended to put a stop to the granting legacies to the church, and to charities, which prevailed so much in those days; it now prevents the mischiefs that might arise from deeds obtained by besieging a person when near his death.

The heir has a right to set aside all deeds executed contrary to this regulation. It appears in the present case, that Colonel Craufurd entertained a purpose that Sir Hugh Craufurd, in whose favour he had made the [661] former deed, should not succeed to his estate; and that he also had the intention, when in a declining state of health, to leave it to a very respectable gentleman, an old and intimate friend, perhaps his relation. By him it was neither asked nor expected; and when I mention, that this was Mr. Coutts, the respondent in the present appeal, I need not add, that he could be supposed to want it but little. Without communication with Mr. Coutts, he revoked the disposition in favour of Sir Hugh, and by same deed conveyed one of his estates to the former.

A singular transaction took place with regard to another estate, which he meant to give to Mr. Coutts by means of a fictitious sale for £4000 or £5000. He writes that gentleman a letter, mentioning that he had sold him the estate, and would give him a receipt for the price, but payment was still to be supposed; and he desired Mr. Coutts to send him a bond for the money. This transaction makes no part of the present appeal.

After Colonel Craufurd's death, the appellant, his heir at law, claimed his estates, if no person could show a better right to them. For this purpose she brought an action before the Court of Session for setting aside the disposition to Mr. Coutts as void, being granted on death-bed; and contending, that the pretended sale of the other estate was invalid, being a mere fiction. She called Mr. Coutts and Sir Hugh Craufurd as parties; but the latter was entirely out of the case: the only title he could make was through the deed which had been revoked. He however founded upon this, that it was the intention of the deceased that he should take the estate if it did not go to Mr. Coutts. But the deed in his favour was revoked in the most marked manner, and all intention as to him was clearly gone. When the question was agitated with regard to the estate which was the subject of the fictitious sale, Sir Hugh having stated his argument that if his deed was not revoked that estate must belong to him, the Court found that the heir was entitled to it, the deed to Sir Hugh being expressly revoked.

That determination was posterior to the decision which forms the subject of the present appeal in the other part of the cause, and Sir Hugh's argument, in some degree, arose out of that decision. The Court then held the ground of giving the estate to Mr. Coutts by some [662] confused mode of reasoning, to be of this nature: "It is true, an heir at law has a right to set aside deeds executed on death-bed; but what right have you in the present case? Sir Hugh must take in preference to you, though his deed was revoked; it was a revocation only to the purpose of validating the deed in Mr. Coutts's favour. Sir Hugh is a bar to you; but as the intention of the deceased was not in his favour, therefore Mr. Coutts's right is against him."

The Court then added a good deal of reasoning upon the decisions which had been pronounced. In one of these, about twenty-five years ago, there occurred a case (Rowan v. Alexander, 22 November, 1775) where a person possessed of two estates, A. and B., by one deed conveyed both estates to certain disponees; and by a second deed executed on death-bed he conveyed the estate B. to certain other persons. Lord Auchinleck, a respectable Judge, before whom this matter was first argued, held, that the heir at law was entitled to the estate B., and that the death-bed deed, though ineffectual as a conveyance, was sufficient as an implied revocation of the former deed with regard to that estate; and he supported the first deed as to the other estate. This judgment was altered by the Court upon an appeal to them; and it was determined that the death-bed deed was effectual, on the ground that the heir was cut off by the first deed, of which there was no express, but merely an implied, revocation, by the subsequent disposition of the estate B. on death-bed; and that if the death-bed deed was not to subsist, the prior deed would be effectual. The Court of Session here made a distinction between an express revocation and an implied one, which I confess I do not feel. If a person makes a disposition of his estate, and locks it up in his repositories, and at the distance of ten years makes another disposition of the same estate, I should be of opinion that the former deed was revoked, and that the posterior one must take effect.

Another distinction was taken in the present case, namely, that though Colonel Craufurd being in death-bed could not execute a valid disposition of his estate, yet he could still execute the reserved power to alter contained in his former deed, and which he had charged on Sir Hugh Craufurd the volunteer. My objection to this is, [663] that such a resignation cannot be allowed. A man may reserve a power to charge his disponee, whose sole right being founded on the disposition, he cannot object to any part of it. But what is the nature of the reservation made by Colonel Craufurd? it is a reservation of a power to do on death-bed what the law says he shall not do in that situation. He might reserve a power to alter his former disposition at any time of his life, which was a reservation against the disponee, but he could not reserve a power against the heir at law to do a deed which was contrary to law.

I may illustrate this by mentioning an instance where Lord Hardwicke determined a similar question upon a similar point of law (Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk. 695). A person conveyed her estate to her daughter, an infant, with power to dispose of the same during her minority, or to devise it by will for certain purposes. The daughter was a grown infant, and under coverture. After the mother's death, the infant's husband got her to grant a conveyance to his creditors, which was a different purpose from those pointed out by the mother. The daughter afterwards devised her estate by will, and died before her age of twenty-one years. It was contended in this case, that though the daughter was an infant, yet what she did in execution of the power granted by her mother must be held valid. Lord Hardwicke appears to have been at first caught with this argument, but he was clear that the powers mentioned in the mother's conveyance were contrary to law; and though an infant of twenty years had a greater capacity of mind than one of tender years, yet by law they were under the same disabilities. The same mode of reasoning applies to the case now before us.

It appears that the judgment of the Court below must have proceeded in a fallacy. The deed in favour of Mr. Coutts being executed on death-bed was a nullity; the deed in favour of Sir Hugh was also a nullity, because it was revoked, both expressly and by implication. But the Court, in some singular way, by splicing these two nullities together, which taken singly were of no effect, formed a deed carrying off the estate from the heir, though against a positive law.

[664] The respondent founded part of his argument upon what is termed in Scots law the maxim of Approbate and Reprobate: Says Mr. Coutts, "If you approve the revocation of the deed to Sir Hugh, contained in the posterior deed in my favour, then you cannot reprobate the other clause of that deed." But this is false reasoning. The Court cannot say to the heir at law, Under what deed do you claim? It is enough for her to say, God and nature have made me heir at law; show me by what deed my right is cut off. The title of an heir at law is always complete, inasmuch that a conveyance or devise to such heir in fee is held null, and of no avail. The law of England in such a case says, the heir is in by descent, and not by purchase.

Having stated so much of the argument in the present case, I must now mention the doubts that have occurred to me upon the subject. I cannot concur in the judgment which has been pronounced; and if I had been sitting as sole Judge in a court of law, bound to act according to the dictates of my conscience, I must have determined against the judgment of the Court below. But the case is different here: when I am to state what I conceive is fit to be done, I cannot arrogantly direct that my opinion should be held better than that of the Court of Session, and on a point of Scots law of great importance to the public, assert that they have been mistaken.

A matter, which I have yet to mention, appears to have biassed the Court considerably. Within these last twenty-five or thirty years an attempt has been made to remedy an inconvenience in conveyancing, which was a good deal felt. In Scotland every security on real estate is itself real. Persons in this country having money to lend are informed that the titles to estates in Scotland are clear, and that interest is there well paid; but they are staggered when they learn that they cannot dispose of such securities by will. A desire at first prevailed to have this matter settled by Act of Parliament, but it was not effected. The present Lord President of the Session, and the late Lord Justice Clerk, who was eminent for his knowledge in conveyancing, thought they could do away this difficulty, and still make a good security by creating, and so reserving, a power to devise by will. I am apprehensive that the decision in this case [665] would involve questions relative to the securities so vested in trustees, and therefore I feel the more delicacy with regard to it where the consequences might be so widely extended, and so disagreeable.

I have considered this point along with the noble and learned Lord already alluded to, and we agree in opinion that it should be regulated by an Act of Parliament declaring that money secured on real estates should still be considered, and be devisable, as money, though descendable to the heir at law, as in mortgages in fee in this country.

Upon the whole, my opinion is that the case should be remitted to the Court of Session, with a direction to them to reconsider their judgment. I think a future consideration of it may open and enlarge the views of the Court; for upon a part of the cause subsequent to that now appealed from, they preferred the heir at law, and they must then have entertained an idea of the case which was not consistent with their former decision.

Ordered accordingly.

After the remit and judgment in the court below, and the argument upon the further hearing in the House of Peers, Lord Eldon, at the end of the session of 1803, delivered the following opinion:—

The Lord Chancellor: This is a cause which has undergone more consideration than almost any which I remember in this place. I had hoped I should have found it in my power before the end of the present session of Parliament to have made a distinct proposition to you, either for affirming or reversing the interlocutors pronounced in this cause, but I have not yet been able to form an opinion to which I can give the character of judgment.

I have thought upon the cause with much anxiety again and again, but am not yet in possession of some facts, the knowledge of which would enable me the better to form my own opinion. I am aware, also, that some others of your Lordships (all now absent) whose sentiments are much attended to on such subjects, are not of one opinion in this case. One (Lord Rosslyn) of the noble and learned [666] persons to whom I allude formerly considered this case very minutely, and I understand adheres to his former opinion, maintaining it on the same grounds; another (Lord Alvanley) who attended the pleadings in this cause, though now necessarily absent, has inclined, I believe, to think that the present case is, in substance, though not in mode and form, no more than other cases of exception out of the law of death-bed; and a third (Lord Thurlow), who from indisposition has not been present at your deliberations during the present session, but who, whether absent or present, never fails to attend to what relates to judgments to be pronounced by this house, entertains, as well as myself, considerable doubt, whether, in a case of this sort, mode and form is not of the highest importance.

At one time I thought that it might be advisable to remit this cause to the Court of Session for further consideration, not recollecting the great consideration it had originally received in that court, and after it came here how much it was considered by the noble and learned lord then upon the woolsack. From the very mature discussion too that it has received since, and the great expense incurred by the parties, it does occur to me that future deliberation may be sufficiently employed, and necessary information may be otherwise obtained upon the points I am to allude to before the next session of Parliament. I have doubted the propriety of remitting also, because it is utterly impossible to do justice to the merit which I conceive belongs to the Court of Session for the learned and painful discussion given to this case, and the mode in which they have discharged their duty with regard to it.

This cause arises out of the settlement of a Colonel Craufurd. He was seised of two estates in Scotland, Craufurdland and Monkland. In 1771, he executed a settlement, conveying both these to himself in life-rent, and to Sir Hew Craufurd and others, in fee. That deed contained a clause dispensing with the delivery, and he reserved power to alter it at any time of his life et etiam in articulo mortis. The adoption of such a clause has been explained to arise out of what is termed in Scotland the law of death-bed. To avoid what were supposed to be inconveniences flowing from that law, it had been consider-[667]-ed as law, that if a former deed had been executed in due time, a person might execute another even in lecto, which in given circumstances would be effectual. By connecting the latter with the former the disposition was considered to have been made at the date of the former, and so not to be challenged as not made in due time; but in most cases at least the former has been a deed valid, effectual, and subsisting in operation, at the death of the grantor.

About twenty-two years after making the first settlement, Colonel Craufurd in 1793 executed a new settlement of his estate of Craufurdland. It will be noticed that this contains a procuratory of resignation, a precept of seisin, and other clauses necessary for making up the feudal title in the person of the donee, Mr. Coutts. This deed also contained certain superiorities in Renfrewshire, which were not contained in the deed of 1771. The estate of Monkland was not given by this deed to Mr. Coutts. If it required a joint operation, therefore, of these deeds of 1771 and 1793 to make a valid disposition, it is plain that as to the superiorities, and the estate of Monkland, there was no effectual conveyance.

The deed of 1793 contains the following clause, on which the question turns: [here his Lordship read the clause of revocation.]

Of the same date the Colonel executed a conveyance of his estate of Monkland by way of bargain and sale; but this was a fictitious transaction. The reason of his choosing this mode of making a settlement of that estate has not been distinctly explained. The disposition of 1771 was not then lying by him, and he did not recollect, perhaps, that Monkland also was included in that deed. He wrote a letter to Mr. Coutts to send him a bond for £5000 as the price of this estate, which, it is said, was accordingly executed; but it is not necessary at present to make any further statement on this point.

The heir at law then brought her action to set aside these deeds. It has been correctly explained to us, that the word heir is understood in Scotland in a different sense from what it is in this country. In Scotland an heir may be the person pointed out by the destination of former settlements of an estate. In this country the heir takes purely by descent; and the person taking by a destination is considered as a purchaser; as a person not [668] taking in the quality of heir. Mrs. Howieson was the person destined to the succession by the settlement of the estates prior to 1771, she contended that the deed of 1771 was made a nullity by the deed of 1793, and that the deed of 1793 also was a nullity, being executed upon death-bed; and that you would not, (in the phrase of the noble and learned Lord who formerly in this house considered this case,) by splicing two nullities together, make a valid conveyance of the estate to Mr. Coutts.

In this action, Mrs. Howieson called Sir Robert Craufurd, as well as Mr. Coutts, as defenders. [Here his Lordship read the conclusions of her summons, Mr. Coutts's defences, and the interlocutors, 12th June 1795, and 17th November 1795.]

After the question of death-bed had thus been decided, Sir Robert Craufurd appeared, and stated, that the deed of 1771 was not absolutely revoked; and that if Mr. Coutts did not take the estate of Monkland under the fictitious sale, that he was entitled to it. Upon this point the Court pronounced an interlocutor adverse to Sir Robert's claim, declaring, that the settlement executed by Colonel Craufurd in 1771 was effectually revoked by the clause of revocation contained in the deed of 1793. It is fair, however, to observe, that the principle of that declaration cannot be stated more broadly, than that the deed of 1793 had no other effect than the effect of revoking as to the estate of Monkland. The decision, as to that estate, does not amount to a declaration of the Court that they ought to have come to the same decision as to the estate of Craufurdland, because the two estates were in different circumstances. Sir Robert Craufurd appealed against this judgment, but his appeal was dismissed for want of prosecution.

Mrs. Howieson also brought her appeal against the judgment as to the Craufurdland estate. When the cause came to a hearing in this house, very great attention was paid to it. I hold in my hand a note of what fell from the noble and learned Lord then on the Woolsack, when the cause was sent back to the Court of Session, from which I shall read some extracts. [Here his Lordship read great part of the notes of Lord Rosslyn's speech as before stated.]

I have also the notes of the opinions formed by the Judges of the Court of Session, as they have been handed [669] to us, and of what passed in consequence of your remit. I should be wanting in due respect to that Court if I did not state it as my opinion that it is impossible to have discharged a duty more carefully, more anxiously, and more sedulously, than the Court have discharged theirs in this case. They differ considerably in opinion; but it has been the opinion of the majority that the former judgment was right. From these notes I cannot, however, accurately and precisely collect their respective opinions upon some (as they appear to me) important points.

The cause came again here by appeal, and has since been most ably argued by advocates from Scotland: the cases, whether similar or analogous, have been fully sifted, and the law of death-bed, and its effect on the public convenience, fully examined.

As to the law of death-bed, I never thought it necessary very anxiously to discuss its operation as convenient or inconvenient: it is enough that it forms undoubtedly part of the law of Scotland. It seems to have been relaxed from the rigour of the general doctrine concerning it in several decided cases; as in some cases the law of England, with regard to devises by will, has been relaxed. Though it be positively laid down that a mere deed on death-bed shall not disappoint the heir, yet if a former deed has been granted in liege poustie, the grantor may by a death-bed deed burden the grantee of the former deed, so as to leave nothing valuable remaining of the title to the beneficial interest in the estate given to such former grantee: the former deed, however, remains in that case valid as a title-deed to the estate, however burdened by the latter deed.

Analogous decisions have been pronounced in this country on the statute regulating the forms of attesting wills of land. By that statute three witnesses are necessary to attest a devise of real estate: yet it has been held, that if a testator devises his lands by a will so attested, subject to the payment of debts and legacies, he might afterwards by any writing, with or without witnesses, and even by any parol transaction forming a contract of debt, charge, in legacies and debts, the devisee to the full value of the estate: though he could not so dispose of so much of the land itself as was of half a crown value to any creditor or legatee. Here, however, the estate [670] remains in the devisee under the attested will, however burthened by what is not attested. Where a devise is duly made to trustees by sale of real estate to pay certain sums to given persons, and the residue to A. B., I apprehend that a subsequent devise of this surplus or residuary interest, attested by two witnesses only, would not be good. So much have we thought form matter of substance, that in this country, when it has been desired by parties that the Courts should apply the decided cases by analogy to others, the Courts have refused to say, that because you may in one mode effectually do what you intend to do, therefore, if you intend the same thing in effect, you may execute your intention in any other new mode of accomplishing it. The knowledge of this, as an English lawyer, may have, perhaps, caused a great difficulty in my mind in the present case.

I come therefore now to mention a doubt upon this cause, which I have not yet been able to get rid of. In most of the cases which have been cited, the first deed, the liege poustie deed, has remained an effective operative instrument at the death of the grantor. I don't mean as leaving a title to any thing beneficial in the grantee of the liege poustie deed, but as continuing at the death of the grantor an interest in the grantee of the liege poustie deed, on which the grantee of the death-bed deed must found his right, and to which he must knit and attach it.

If one makes a liege poustie deed in favour of one of your Lordships, and afterwards by a second deed on death-bed burdens the grantee thereof with some charge, the heir alioqui successurus would be by the first deed effectually cut out; and the grantee under the first deed is clearly bound to fulfil the directions of the second deed, for he cannot avail himself of the law of death-bed. So if the grantee in the first deed is ordered to convey to a person named in the death-bed deed. In both these cases the heir alioqui successurus is cut out by a liege poustie deed available at the grantor's death. In the one case the liege poustie deed gives the title to the estate though burdened: in the other also, though to be conveyed: in both, it is a subsisting operative instrument at the death of the grantor, cutting out the heir's title.

It is said, if you may disappoint your heir in this way, why not also by the mode used in the present case? if by giving a title to an estate burdened to its taker, or to [671] be wholly conveyed away, why not by a death-bed deed give the estate itself, a liege poustie deed having been once executed? My difficulty is to admit that a person can do what he has the power of doing by all the different modes in which he pleases to do it. The principle of the former cases appears to go only to this, that the grantee of the first deed would take if the death-bed deed was not effectual, and that the heir alioqui successurus had nothing to complain of in such a case, and the grantee of the first deed could not make any complaint. Now, though it is true that the present decision puts Mr. Coutts's case on the same footing, yet I do not find either in the notes of the Judges, or in the arguments of counsel at the bar, what is precisely the effect of the deed of 1771 in contemplation of law at the grantor's death. If a title to any estate is at the grantor's death left in the grantee of that deed, the case falls under one consideration: but if that deed at the death of the grantor was absolutely revoked, it is in effect the same case as if the liege poustie deed had been a disposition to the heir alioqui successurus, or as if it had never existed. When the interest under the death-bed deed knits and attaches itself to an estate to be claimed under the former, there is a liege poustie deed disposing of the title: but if there is no such estate to which that interest can attach, there is nothing but a mere death-bed deed.

To explain myself further: I have frequently put a question to my own mind of this nature, perhaps suggested by ignorance—Suppose the deed of 1793 had contained neither procuratory nor precept, it might still have furnished a good ground of action to get the property in due form; but who would have been defender in that case? Would the heir at law, or Sir Robert Craufurd? If Sir Robert Craufurd had no title to any estate remaining in him, then no action would lie against him. If the action was to be brought against the heir, must it not be admitted that the heir had some how got back the estate? This question has not been answered at the bar. The answer to it I must endeavour to collect; and I want to know whether the deed of 1771 be a necessary operative instrument in Mr. Coutts's title, as he must make it; or if he might without prejudice throw it in the fire; in one word, I wish correctly and precisely to know its effect, and whether the grantee of that deed is considered [672] as entitled in law to any estate or interest in the property in order thereout to make good Mr. Coutts's title.

It was said that the deed of 1771 was not fully revoked, but only revoked quoad certum effectum; and that this was more a question of intention than of power: I doubt whether it is not a question of intention and power. I entertain no doubt of Colonel Craufurd's power to have given the estate to Mr. Coutts, nor of his intention to give it to him; but the law frequently gives the power of effectuating the intention only in one mode, and you can do what you intend in no other. If by saying that this is only a revocation ad hunc effectum, you mean that the deed is not revoked; but that Craufurd's title to the estate is burthened with a duty to convey or denude for the benefit of Coutts, and must be taken to continue for the purpose of so effectuating Coutts's title: then the deed is not wholly revoked; but if it is wholly revoked, it seems difficult to argue that because, if a liege poustie deed remains effectual at the death of the grantor, a death-bed deed shall defeat the heir, therefore, also, the heir shall be defeated merely because a liege poustie deed had been executed, but which did not remain in effect at the death of the grantor.

If Mr. Coutts had declined to take this estate, I wish to learn who would in that case have been entitled to it; would Sir Robert Craufurd take it in such a case? The judgment admits that the intention was exercised in a way to take the beneficial interest from Sir Robert Craufurd; if it be not given to Mr. Coutts, how should the heir proceed to make good his title? must he contend with Sir Robert Craufurd or Mr. Coutts? Could it be argued, if Mr. Coutts had not taken, that the intent to revoke was only ad hunc effectum, viz. to give to Mr. Coutts, and therefore if he would not take, Sir Robert should?

I may mistake this matter very much, but I have not been able to find any case where the law of death-bed did not take effect in favour of the heir, if the liege poustie remained at the grantor's death, without any effect as an instrument through which the title must be made, and the notes to which I allude, as well as the argument at the bar, contains an assertion that Mr. Coutts must make up his title under the deed of 1771 without explaining how, and the contrary assertion also, that he need take no notice whatever of it. As to these points [673] I wish for further satisfaction. If he need take no notice of that deed, I doubt whether authority has gone the length of this judgment. If he must take notice of it, in what way he is to do so has not been explained. I admit that it was Colonel Craufurd's intention to have revoked only ad hunc effectum, but I question if the purpose of the revocation be sufficient to sanction a new mode of conveyancing, if it be such; for I do not presume at present to say whether or not the meaning of the words used is understood to be such as puts the judgment on this ground, and this only, that because there was once, though not at the grantor's death, a liege poustie deed, therefore the death-bed deed is good.

I could put many cases from the law of this country illustrative of the difficulties I entertain. Suppose I were to make a will in this country, devising my real property to a certain person, and were afterwards to execute another will, revoking my former will that I might make the other, and then devising my real property to one not capable of taking, the revocation would be perfectly good, but the devise being ineffectual, the heir at law would come in, though the intent of my act was to confirm the exclusion of him. Here is a fallacy, therefore, in the argument as to the effect of a revocation made ad certum effectum; if the revocation be complete, and an entire revocation is not a right mode of proceeding ad hunc effectum, the revocation will be good, and the disposition will be good for nothing.

If I were to intend to revoke a will already formally made in this country, meaning at the same time to execute another in due form, and had such will prepared and ready for execution, but was arrested by the hand of death before completing it, we hold in that case that the former will is not revoked, because the revocation is not complete, and the devisee under the former will would take. Neither of these cases so put from our law would support by analogy the present judgment. In the former case, the heir is let in; in the latter, the first devisee; this judgment excludes both the heir and Sir Robert Craufurd.

I may state unreservedly upon this part of the case, that I am not much impressed with the consideration of it as being an evasion of the law, or not such. There seems no doubt but that, in the circumstances of the case, it [674] was completely in the power of Colonel Craufurd to have disappointed the law; * and I consider the question as a question whether he can do it in this mode: Whether he can do it without having a liege poustie deed in actual effect at his death? The suggestion so often made, that the heir was already cut out by the liege poustie deed, appears to me to assume all that is in dispute, for the heir cannot be said to be cut out till the death of the grantor, and therefore it may be said, that if at that time there is no effectual liege poustie deed, there was never any liege poustie deed that affected his titles.

Another doubt with me is, whether this case has been decided by the court below, on the point of approbate and reprobate, or not. I see in the notes of the individual Judges opinions that some of them have laid great stress upon this doctrine, though others thought differently of it; but the judgment of the Court as to that point I cannot collect. If the judgment were put on that alone I should entertain great doubt of it. It seems very nearly to resemble the doctrine of election in this country, though I am aware of the difference between what is understood by the word heir in Scotland, and what we understand by that term. The heir has been stated to be whom God and nature have made such: I should say that the heir in England is a person succeeding by the mere operation and provision of the law.

In our doctrine of election we hold, that if any person takes benefit under any instrument he must submit to the instrument altogether; but if I give a legacy in money to my heir at law, without any express condition annexed to the legacy, and give by the same will part of my real estate to another, and this without the attestation of three witnesses, the heir is entitled to take the legacy; and at the same time to say, this is no good devise as to the land, and accordingly, in such a case, the heir would take the estate. So in the case of a devise against the Statutes of Mortmain, he would take against [675] such a devise, though he claimed under the same will, for these are not cases of election.

If the English doctrines are to rule, this is nothing like a case of election. The heir here does not take the estate or benefit under the instrument, but under the law. If a testator in this country was required to make his will of land 60 days before death, it would be quite competent for the heir to say, This is a death-bed deed; I take the benefit of the law, and I take the land under the benefit of the law. And he might also take personal benefits under the will. There may, however, be a considerable difference, attending to the distinction of character between an heir in England and Scotland; and it is impossible not to see that some cases have been decided in Scotland, which very nearly support the doctrine of approbate and reprobate, as applied in this case.

A person in this country cannot, by a will of land made and attested in a regular form, reserve a power of making a future devise of the land which should be attested by less than three witnesses. And the courts of this country, though they have admitted subsequent bequests, otherwise attested of the whole value of the land, do not admit them as to a particle of the land itself; and the bequests of the value of the land must be supported by, and must knit and attach themselves to, an instrument remaining at the death of the testator, effectual to give title to the land itself against the heir at law. The title to the land, to convey the benefit of the land to those claiming under the unattested bequests, must remain at that time in some person claiming under a testamentary instrument duly attested to pass an estate in the land. Upon principles which, because they are very familiar to my mind, perhaps affect it so much in the present case, I doubt whether the death-bed deed, can be supported, unless it can be founded upon some claim to the estate, available against the heir, created by, and continued available until, and at the death of the grantor, by the deed of 1771, to which the title under the deed of 1793 may knit and attach itself, as a burthen by a death-bed deed attaches itself to an estate created by a liege poustie deed.

* The right of the heir stands upon decision. The decision which first gave the land to the eldest son, rather than to all the sons or children, and the decision which prevents a man from disinheriting his heir in his last sickness, within sixty days of his death, are no more law than the decision that he may do so, if he has previously executed a deed in liege poustie, which is unrevoked at the time of his death.

If it were my duty to decide the present case this day, I should feel it a very irksome task to pronounce that the judgment was right or wrong. I believe that my [676] noble and learned friend, who has long paid so much attention to cases from Scotland, entertains considerable doubt of the judgment, if an estate of some kind or other be not remaining in Sir Robert Craufurd; if the liege poustie deed in making up the titles is to be regarded as an absolute nullity. It would be altogether indecent to decide the cause at present, in the absence of all the noble and learned lords, if I was more able than I am to state a judgment upon the case. But knowing the delay that has already taken place, and the anxiety that the parties must feel where such property is at stake, I should not have held myself excusable, had I not detailed to you at some length the whole circumstances operating upon my mind when I purpose that judgment should be postponed.

Cause adjourned accordingly.

(March 1806) The Lord Chancellor (Eldon): This is a cause which has already occupied a great deal of attention from the Court of Session and from you. It originates in the settlements executed by Colonel John Walkinshaw Craufurd, the representative of an ancient and respectable family. He was seised and possessed of two estates, Craufurdland and Monkland, in the county of Ayr. In 1771 he executed a deed of settlement to keep up the representation of his family of his estates of Craufurdland and Monkland to himself in life, and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, to Sir Hugh Craufurd, and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to a certain other series of heirs.

This deed contained a power to revoke at any time of his life in liege poustie, or in articulo mortis. It remained in the repositories of the grantor undelivered at his death.

This instrument appears to be evidence of a purpose on the part of Colonel Craufurd to defeat the heir aliique successoris from 1771 down to 1793. At the same time it is fair to observe that this case will fall to be decided as if the deed of 1771 was executed only 61 days before the death of the testator.

When, as is admitted on all hands, Colonel Craufurd was on death-bed, he executed a new settlement in Feb. 1793, of the estate of Craufurdland, in favour of Mr. Coutts, his heirs and assigns, containing a procuratory [677] of resignation, a precept of seisin, and other usual clauses, (the same as in the former deed for vesting the estate feudally in the dispositive,) we shall have to consider whether this deed be one altogether substantive, or if it be to be taken in connection with the former deed.

This deed, besides the estate of Craufurdland, conveyed certain superiorities which were not contained in the deed of 1771. These were clearly gone by the law of death-bed.

With regard to the estate of Monkland, this deed did not attempt to convey it to Mr. Coutts. I call your attention to this at present, as I shall afterwards have occasion to refer to it more particularly when considering the principle of the interlocutor as to Monkland.

[His Lordship here read verbatim the disposition of Craufurdland to Mr. Coutts.

as far as the clause of revocation.] You will observe that this was a deed under conditions, reservations, and declarations, under which Mr. Coutts might have declined to take the estate. Hitherto it has every appearance of a substantive and independent disposition. [He here read the clause of revocation.] This clause, in revoking the former settlement executed by Colonel Craufurd, of course revoked also the procuratories and precepts contained in the former deeds.

The day after the date of this deed Colonel Craufurd wrote a letter to his agent, directing him after his death to open his repositories at Craufurdland. When this was done, the deed of 1771 was found lying there. He had not cancelled this former settlement; if cancelled at all, it is so by the deed of 1793.

Colonel Craufurd died soon after; but before his death, and of the same date with the deed of 1793, he executed a conveyance of Monkland, bearing on the face of it the receipt of £5000, said to be paid by Mr. Coutts as the price thereof. At the same time he wrote a letter to Mr. Coutts to send him his bond for that sum. If that bond was sent, it did not reach Colonel Craufurd in time, for he died six days after the date of the deed.

I must here remark the difference of the situation of the two estates of Craufurdland and Monkland. The heir aliique successurus, by the judgment of the Court below, got this last estate. In their interlocutor of the 31st of Jan. 1798, the Court found that the deed of 1771 was effectually revoked by the clause of revocation con-[678]-tained in the deed of 1793, in consequence of which the estate of Monkland was adjudged to the heir. It was contended, that the principle of the decision as to the estate of Monkland was directly contrary to that in regard to the estate of Craufurdland.

The deed of 1793 conceived in favour of Mr. Coutts embraced the estate of Craufurdland, and the superiorities only, and did not affect the estate of Monkland, except in the clause of revocation. The clause of revocation revoked the deed of 1771, as well with regard to Craufurdland as to Monkland, but it also disposed Craufurdland to Mr. Coutts, and not Monkland.

The attempt to dispose of Monkland for a price was not fully completed, because not acceded to by Mr. Coutts in Colonel Craufurd's lifetime; as to Monkland, it was also clear that he meant the heir not to succeed, but the purpose of selling was only an inchoate purpose.

The decision as to the estate of Craufurdland is upon this ground, that, as to it, the revocation of the deed of 1771 was not an absolute, but a qualified, revocation to support the deed of 1793; whereas the revocation as to the estate of Monkland, of which the new conveyance was set aside, restored the right of the heir aliique successurus.

The difficulty upon this interlocutor is, that it lays down as a general principle that the deed of 1771 was effectually revoked by the deed of 1793, and does not express that it was only revoked as to Monkland, and not as to Craufurdland, which was the meaning of the court.

The principle so generally laid down in this interlocutor was pressed against Mr. Coutts, but farther than it would go. There may be a finding in an interlocutor in too general terms, and still the conclusion be a sound one. In considering this case, it is very material to take into view, whether the decision as to the estate of Monkland be consistent with that as to the estate of Craufurdland, but it is too much to say that the decision as to Monkland is one directly contrary to that with regard to Craufurdland.

After Colonel Craufurd's death, Mrs. Howieson his aunt (not as we understand the term, but the heir aliique successurus, as termed in Scotland) taking under former destinations in her favour, claimed these estates. In [679] prosecution of her claims she executed a trust-bond, as usual in such cases, on which an adjudication was obtained, and afterwards an action of reduction was brought against Sir Hugh Craufurd and Mr. Coutts. [His Lordship here read the conclusions of the summons of reduction, noticing the more especial ground on the law of death-bed. He next read the interlocutor of the 9th of June 1795, sustaining the reasons of reduction as to the superiorities which were not in the deed of 1771, and repelling them as to the estate of Craufurdland, and the interlocutor of the 17th Nov. 1795, adhering thereto.]

After the Court had thus decided as to the estate of Craufurdlund, Sir Hugh Craufurd conceiving that the deed of 1771, if not revoked, gave him the estate of Monkland, put in his claim to that estate, but after a discussion upon that point, the Court, by their interlocutor of the 31st January 1798, to which I have already alluded, found that the deed of 1771 in regard to Monkland was effectually revoked by the deed of 1793.

Then came the first appeal here, which was heard and remitted back to the Court of Session: Lord Loughborough was then upon the woolsack, and another noble and learned Lord concurred with him in the opinion which he had formed. These two great and eminent persons were not content to discuss this question as one depending merely on the construction of the instruments which I have stated, but conceiving that there was in the principle of the judgment something vicious in regard to the law of death-bed, they were still anxious not to decide it, fearing that their own view of the case might bring into danger a system of securities as to trust-bonds, then of some standing in Scotland. The substance of the opinion delivered by Lord Loughborough in that case was as follows:—

[Here his Lordship read the same, of 16th Oct. 1800, commenting upon it as he proceeded.]

On the case of Rowan v. Alexander, quoted by the noble and learned Lord, I have no scruple to add the authority of my opinion to his; and if that case had come before me in a court of appeal in 1775, when it was pronounced, it would have been impossible for me to have given my assent to the judgment of the court in that case, reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. I see [680] the Lord Justice Clerk Miller says, in that case, as a ground of his opinion, in which the majority of the court concurred, that as the grantor might have burdened his estate to the full amount of its value, he might therefore give it to the disponent under the death-bed deed. But I by no means coincide with the doctrine, that because you may do a thing in one mode, therefore you may do it in any mode.

It is perfectly settled in this country, that in a will devising land, which must be executed in the presence of three witnesses, you cannot reserve a power to devise any part of it by a will executed in the presence of two witnesses only. We may devise land by will to be charged with legacies, or to trustees, to pay such sums of money as the testator may direct; and such legacies may be granted, or directions given, in any writing executed before two witnesses, or without witnesses. Where the land is already vested, even the witnesses to the will may take as legatees to the whole value of the land, but not one particle of the land can be devised by our law but by a will in the presence of three witnesses. But the distinction goes a great deal farther; though the whole value of the land may be given in legacies, yet after giving legacies to a certain amount the surplus cannot be given away in this manner. The surplus is held to be land, and is not thus to be disposed of. These cases strongly prove the distinction between a power of giving by a certain mode, and giving by any mode.

Though I have said thus much of the case of Rowan and Alexander, it is, in my opinion, a very different thing to say what might have been done with regard to it in 1775, and what ought now to be done at this day. It would not be on any dry reasoning that I should disturb the authority of this case as applying to another occurring in 1793 if they coincided.

In the present case, I think that the reasons of the Judge in the Court below altogether amount to this, that it was the testator's purpose to bestow the estates on Mr. Coutts by the last deed; and that he did not do so if he did not keep alive the former deed; they held that the deed of 1793 only revoked the former deed to the end of giving effect of the later one.

If it be asked what he did not mean to revoke, I understand it to be supposed that he did not mean to revoke [681] that which gave a right to the disponent in the deed of 1771, to adjudge from the heir at law if the disponent in the second deed should refuse to take. If Mr. Coutts should be unwilling to take under the deed of 1793, is there a right under the deed of 1771 to adjudge the hereditas against the heir? If such a right could not exist under the deed of 1771, under what pretence does any deed exist to bar the right of the heir?

Whatever I might have been disposed to decide in such a case as that of Rowan and Alexander in 1775, I should be one of the last men in the world, in 1806, to disturb that decided ease, in so far as it applies to a case of implied revocation.

It appears from what was said by Lord Loughborough that those noble Lords who coincided in opinion with him were inclined to consider this as a case of fraud on the law of death-bed. My view of it is different: that this is not a case of fraud, and that the Appellant's case cannot be made out upon that ground.

[His Lordship here briefly stated the case of Hearle and Greenbank (Atk. p. 695) mentioned in the note of Lord Loughborough's speech.]

That Noble Lord concluded with saying, that he was afraid a reversal of the judgment of the Court then under consideration, might trench upon the system established with regard to those trust-bonds to which I have alluded; and therefore he thought it better to send it back to be re-considered. He added, that Lord Thurlow and he were of opinion that it might be proper to prevent all question upon these trust-bonds by an Act of Parliament declaratory of the law. It appears to me that this case may be decided without touching any of these trust-bonds.

The cause was accordingly remitted to the Court of Session, where it underwent the most painful and minute re-consideration. I think I never saw a more honourable specimen of judicial ability than occurred in the discussion of this case when they formed the opinion on which this second appeal arises.

They re-considered this case in all the points of view in which it had been taken up in regard to the alleged fraud upon the face of death-bed; the whole principles of that law, and the particular facts and circumstances of the case. They at length narrowed the case very much from what had formerly been discussed, and put it upon what [682] I think its true merits, the effect of the second deed upon the first through the clause of revocation.

They agree that if the deed of 1771 was cancelled, or wholly revoked by executing another instrument; if the right of the heir was let in pro brevissimo intervallo, that the deed on death-bed would operate nothing.

A narrow majority of the Court held, that under the deed of 1793 the deed of 1771 was not revoked absolutely, but under a qualification, and they therefore held, that if the death-bed deed of 1793 was challenged by the heir (for a death-bed deed is not in any view a nullity, but only liable to effectual challenge by the heir) the donee under it might found on the prior deed in 1771, and insist, with effect, that the heir had no interest to challenge the later deed, that if it was set aside Sir Robert Craufurd would have (as we should say in this country) a right to the estate; or, as they would say in Scotland, would have a personal right of action to obtain the estate. The true question in this case, therefore, is, whether or not, in a reduction brought by the heir of the death-bed deed of 1793, her claims could be repelled by any thing the donee under it could urge upon the deed of 1771, as at the death of the grantor.

If he could so repel the claim of the heir, he must prevail in this action; if he could not, then the present appeal would be well founded.

This question will still necessarily lead me into a discussion of some length, and I wish to reserve this till Tuesday, when I shall state my final opinion upon this case. If I be in error thereon, then I must say that it is conformable to the first views I have formed of the case, and that, with all the light since thrown upon it my opinion has never varied with regard to it.

Lord Eldon (12th March 1806), [after reverting to the opinion delivered in part by him as above]: The questions in this cause were anxiously discussed, and considered both before and after it was remitted to the Court below, by noble Lords, some of whom are now no more. One of these noble Lords (Rosslyn,) entertained but one unqualified opinion upon the subject throughout. He held that the settlement of 1793 was a fraud upon the law of death-bed, and that that deed was an unqualified revocation of the deed executed in 1771. His Lordship, [683] therefore, observed in strong, although not in legally accurate, language, that it was impossible to splice two nullities in order to make one effectual deed of disposition. This expression was not technically correct, inasmuch as the term nullity could not be applied with strict precision to the death-bed deed, because it was primâ facie a good deed, and was alone reducible by the heir, who was aliâquâ successurus. But his Lordship's meaning was this, that the first deed being revoked was an absolute nullity, and if the death-bed deed could not knit itself upon the first, it was a nullity likewise in the popular sense of the word, as it could convey nothing. Such were the sentiments of the noble Lord, which coincided with those of several Judges in the Court below, and were supported there by very strong arguments.

Another noble Lord (Lord Alvanley), who is also now no more, seemed to regard the question in another view. So far as I could collect his sentiments he did not consider the death-bed deed as an invasion of the law of death-bed, nor the liege-poustie deed as altogether revoked by it; but his Lordship seemed to be of opinion that the first deed was to be considered as in existence to a certain effect, and he thought we should look at the effect of the two instruments taken together, and construe them so as that a disposition, which the disponent had a clear power to make, might be supported, and that the manner in which he did so was to be regarded as matter of form, and not of substance.

But to this last sentiment I never can agree. I entirely concurred with the other noble Lord whom I have mentioned, that matter of form in conveyancing is matter of substance; and that it is not sufficient that a person should have power and an intention to dispose of his property, but that in order to render it effectual he must execute it habili modo, or in other words, he must execute it in the form and with the solemnities prescribed by law for conveying such property.

The case of Rowan and Alexander, which I shall have occasion to remark upon more particularly hereafter, was more relied upon in the argument than I think it can well be. It was relied on in that case, and has been argued here, that the party might have given the value of the estate by a death-bed deed, and why therefore not give [684] the substance or land itself. But this is not so by the law of Scotland any more than it is by the law of England. By the law of England, a will executed before three witnesses is necessary to convey land, and if land is so conveyed, it may be afterwards charged by a will which is not so executed. But it by no means follows, that because the total value of the estate could be conveyed in the way of a charge, although not attested, that therefore the land itself could be so conveyed. You know very well that even the surplus money arising from the sale of land cannot pass without a will attested by three witnesses, because a Court of Equity considers that as land.

It has been also said, that if a person means to revoke an instrument with reference to a particular purpose, if that purpose is not effected the original instrument is not revoked.

This proposition is to a certain extent true, but it is to be understood with various limitations and distinctions. It is true, that if a party sits down, meaning to revoke a disposition of his property, and by the same act, or as it is called unico contextu, to make a new one, if he makes the revocation, but dies before he has completed his new disposition, he shall not be held to have revoked his former disposition, because his revoking it was but part of his purpose, and his act was incomplete. But if he completed his purpose by a new disposition, the first is revoked however inadequate such new disposition may be to convey his property. Thus, if having made a will of land, I afterwards make another in which I revoke it, and give my land to a monk, or an alien, the revocation is good although the devise is void, because the purpose was complete so far as it was in my power to complete it. In the present case, the purpose of the party to dispose his land anew was complete, which decides the case with reference to this argument.

A good deal has been said on the doctrine of Approbate and Reprobate, and that it barred the heir from claiming in this case. I have made a good deal of inquiry into the grounds of the decision, to see if it went upon that ground, and if so how it could be maintained upon it.

I think that this is not a case where the doctrine of Approbate and Reprobate will apply. The heir does not [685] claim under the death-bed deed. The heir says, "your deed does not give you a title unless you can show me a deed executed in liege poustie, existing at the death of the grantor: if there be no such deed, the deed executed on death-bed is gone."

In various cases, which I need not at present specially mention, the death-bed deed has been held to be good. The law of death-bed has been so far altered, that a person may by certain modes give away his estate by a deed on death-bed. Upon this point, as well as upon the practice which has prevailed with regard to trust-bonds, we cannot shake the cases without great danger to private property. In our own law we have also instances of a similar kind, in the practice with regard to the barring of estates-tail, and the making of conveyances to enable a person to give legacies without regard to the statute of frauds.

If by inveterate usage and practice you find mens titles standing in a certain way, you will support them to the extent of the usage; but it is a very different thing to say that you should carry the law beyond the usage.

It is admitted that if a valid liege-poustie deed existed at the death of the grantor, the death-bed deed would also be good. It is to be observed, however, that this liege-poustie deed must be in favour of a stranger, and not in favour of the heir alioqui successurus. A deed in his favour would be held to be an evasion of the law, and not effectual. This is obvious on principle—the stranger disponee is bound to hold good any power reserved against him; if such power be duly executed he cannot complain. This seems also to have been admitted by all the judges, except those who decided against Mr. Coutts, on the ground of its being an evasion of the law.

It is clear that Colonel Craufurd meant to give the estate to Mr. Coutts. His power of doing so is also clear. In treating this matter, I deem it better to go upon the dry points of law than to consider whether it was more fit in Colonel Craufurd to prefer the nearest branch of an ancient family, or to give his estate to that deserving gentleman Mr. Coutts. The intention and power of the testator are both admitted.

The only question is, Has he executed that intention by effectual means? It is admitted on all hands, that Colonel Craufurd might have charged the estate vested [686] in the grantee of the liege-poustie deed to its full value in favour of Mr. Coutts, or he might have directed him to convey that estate to Mr. Coutts. The testator in doing so acts in affirmance of the estate vested by the liege-poustie deed, for the person to take by the death-bed deed could not call upon the disponee under the former deed to denude, unless the estate was vested in him. The author of the death-bed deed, in such a case, so far from revoking, asserts the validity of the liege-poustie deed.

Such cases are not authorities for the present decision, unless you could say Sir Robert Craufurd had some estate under the deed of 1771, of which he could denude himself in Mr. Coutts's favour, or which Mr. Coutts could have adjudged. But it is impossible to say that he had such estate of which he could denude himself, or which could be adjudged, if it can be made out on the construction of the death-bed deed that such estate did not remain in him.

You know that in Scotland the maxim of mortuus seisis vivum does not obtain as it does in this country: a proceeding in that country to take up hereditas jacens is rather against the estate than the person; the right can be made effectual directly upon the estate, if constituted by a deed containing procuratory and precept by an adjudication in implement. I say this to prevent any misunderstanding of the language which I use.

Another case was put; it was stated, that the testator might have rendered the death-bed deed valid by a clause in it that he meant the deed of 1771 to subsist, if the death-bed deed was found to be ineffectual. I do not mean to deny this. He would then have said, if my death-bed deed is not good, or if the disponee under it would not, or could not, take from popery or other cause, then the disponee under the deed of 1771 might have said to the heir alioqui successurus, "the estate is mine:" and he might have proceeded to connect himself with it by his procuratory and precept, or if none had been contained in his deed, by adjudication. In that case this would be the express meaning of the testator: I keep alive the former deed to all those purposes to enable the disponee, in the death-bed deed, to say to the heir that he has no interest to impugn the death-bed deed.

When I considered the cases of implied revocation, [687] (and I have never considered any question more deeply than the present,) I am free to say that I never could have assented to affirm the case of Rowan and Alexander if brought before me by appeal at the time when it was pronounced. Lord Rosslyn stated, when this cause was first here, that he could not give his assent to that case. But there is a manifest difference between what might have been fit and proper to be done when that case was recent, and what may be so at this day. No man can say that many titles may not rest on the principle of that case of Rowan and Alexander; and were we to touch that case, we might shake securities, in the validity of which there had been great confidence for many years. I allude to the trust-bonds which had been devised and approved of by the most eminent persons upon the Bench in Scotland.

In that case of Rowan and Alexander a false principle was laid down on the Bench, that because the testator could effectually have given the value of his estate in money, therefore the disposition of the estate was valid. It was said in that case, that there was no express revocation, but it is difficult to perceive what could be a more express revocation than giving the estate wholly to another.

That case must now be held to stand upon this principle, that the testator did not mean the former deed to be revoked unless the second deed was found to be good; and expressing nothing as to a revocation of the former deed, must be held to have meant in effect that both should stand to accomplish the purpose he wanted of giving the estate to the donee in the last deed. This would apply also to the case of the donee under the second deed being unwilling to take or incapable of taking.

But the same principle will not apply to a case of express revocation. This is the first instance where this principle has been so applied. It is unnecessary to enter into the cases of Birkmyre, etc. which are different from the present, in the revocations being by different instruments.

In the present case, as appears to me, there are only two questions: 1st, Is the disposition of 1771 revoked [688] entirely? 2dly, Is it revoked ad hunc effectum, or ad omnes effectus quoad, this species of question.

The case of express revocation proves, (and the decision in this case, with regard to the estate of Monkland, is the strongest of them all) that if the heir is let in pro brevissimo intervallo, the intention or power of the grantor signifies nothing, though he had half a dozen ways of giving away his estate upon death-bed. It signifies nothing if this is not done habili modo. The cases of the destruction of the liege-poustie deed, though cancelled only to execute another deed, or a revocation by indorsement, when a new deed was the next moment executed, clearly show this, that what may be done validly in one mode cannot be so in any mode.

In the case of Monkland the Court seems to have had considerable difficulty with their own decision; more, indeed, than I feel with regard to it. The disposition of Monkland was by a different deed from that of Craufurdlan. The former disposition of Monkland was revoked, that Colonel Craufurd might dispose of it by a sale; and on the same day he executed a disposition to Mr. Counts by such mode of sale, but before completing this purpose Colonel Craufurd died. We see here strongly that the power to give away in certain modes, and the intention, are nothing. The Court, in their judgment declared, that it was the testator's purpose to give to Mr. Counts, but they found (in terms too general to reconcile that decision with the decision with regard to Craufurdlan) that the deed of 1793 had revoked the deed of 1771, and therefore they give the estate to the heir.

It is clear in this country, where an estate can only be devised by a will executed in the presence of three witnesses, that in such a will a person cannot reserve power to make a valid devise of his estate by will before fewer witnesses. All the doctrines connected with this rule of law were much canvassed in the case of Habourgham v. Vincent. A person in this country cannot by the medium of a will or deed reserve to himself powers contrary to law.

In Scotland no man could make a valid liege-poustie deed in this form: "Know all men by these presents that I do hereby reserve a power to dispose of my estate [689] at any time of my life, et etiam in articulo mortis." The liege-poustie deed must be some actual deed of disposition existing at the death of the grantor.

Put the case, that Mr. Counts had repudiated the disposition in his favour contained in the deed of 1793; could the heir, under the deed of 1771, have made use of his procuratory and precept to attach himself to the hereditas jacens; or if there had been none such, could he have used an adjudication in implement against the estate? This question depends upon the fact whether the deed of 1771 was revoked by the deed of 1793, or not. If the testator left the deed of 1771 a subsisting deed, the donee under the deathbed deed might make use of that deed to protect himself against the heir at law. In order to find that this case can be ruled by the decision in Rowan and Alexander you must find the direct contrary of what the testator has expressed in the present case.

The deed of 1771 was a deed standing by itself, containing a procuratory and precept, and all the usual clauses of style. Let us see what the testator does or says with regard to this deed: Does he say that the deed of 1771 shall stand if the deed of 1793 is found not to be good? Does he substitute Mr. Coutts in the room of the donee under the deed of 1771? He does no such thing. The dispositive part of the deed of 1771, the procuratory and precept, are all revoked, and the deed of 1793 is made a complete disposition, standing solely by itself, containing a new procuratory and precept, and other usual clauses. It also contains the clause upon which the whole question turns. [Here his Lordship read the clause of revocation.]

The question of construction, as to what the testator has said, arises upon this. He says, I don't intend that the donee in the deed of 1771 shall take; nor that the deed of 1771 shall be kept alive, and that the donee therein shall denude in favour of Mr. Coutts; but I do expressly revoke that deed, so far as conceived, in favour of the persons to whom it is granted; and I keep it alive only with regard to the powers to alter, innovate, and revoke therein contained; thereby reducing the deed to nothing but one containing a power to alter and revoke.

I never in this case could bring my mind to any other opinion, than that the deed of 1793 reduced the deed of 1771 to a conveyance in favour of the heir alioqui successurus, because if the intermediate disposition was destroyed, the right of the heir to claim the estate was again set up. Any other opinion goes to make the deed of 1793 good by itself, which is illegal and impossible.

I put another question to myself, which I hope will free me from any charge of mistaking the law. I cannot conceive what the deed of 1793 would do, whether it contained an express or an implied revocation of the former deed, unless I were able to say, that if Mr. Coutts could not or would not take, some right to take up the hereditas jacens under the deed of 1771 would still remain. Now such right could not remain under the deed of 1771, because the revocation goes to every thing but what is therein excepted. How could a personal right of action be made out in the donee under the deed of 1771, as the deed of 1793 absolutely revokes that deed, as far as it contained any disposition?

The case turns entirely on the true construction of this part of the instrument; it destroys all right granted under the former deed without which the reserved powers to alter were vain.

In the opinion which I have formed I have the misfortune to differ from many persons in the Court of Session, of whom I am bound to say, that if I have been of any use in the matters of Scotch law I owe it to them; but I have also the satisfaction to agree with many others in that court, and with some who heard the case argued in this house.

I repeat, that this is a question of construction only, and that all apprehension must be gone of touching any title to estates, or any other decided case; the present case turning upon this point, and neither upon any general or special construction of the law. I shall defer giving in the judgment which I mean to move in this case till to-morrow, contenting myself at present with stating this conclusion, that the heir alioqui successurus has both a title and an interest in this case.

Ven. 14 Mar. 1806. The Lords, etc. find, that in this case, the question, whether the heir hath a title and interest to challenge the deed of 1793, as made on death-bed, depends upon the particular nature and effect of the several deeds executed by the late Colonel Craufurd, and especially on the nature and effect of the deed of 1793, regard being had to the particular terms of that deed, as [691] expressing the same to be a revocation and recalling of all former dispositions; and find, that the deed of 1771, though executed in liege poustie, ought not to be considered as being at the death of Colonel Craufurd, such a subsisting valid instrument or disposition executed in liege poustie, as that thereby the interest of the heir to challenge the deed of 1793, as to the lands by the same deed disposed to the defender Thomas Coutts, should be deemed to be barred, inasmuch as the latter deed contains in terms the most express revocation of all former dispositions, assignments, or other deeds of a testamentary nature, formerly made and granted to whatever person or persons preceding the date thereof, and particularly of the deed granted in the year 1771, and contains the most express declaration in terms, that such deeds are to be void and null so far as they are conceived in favour of the persons to whom they are granted : and also find, that although the deed of 1793 contains a declaration that the former deeds should be valid, and sufficient to the extent of the powers therein reserved, to revoke, alter or innovate the same to the effect only of making the deed of 1793 effectual in favour of the said Thomas Coutts, such declaration ought not to be taken as the ground of an implication rendering such former deeds valid or effectual beyond the extent in which they are in express terms declared so to be, or to be made the ground of a construction whereby such former deeds should be held to be valid, or sufficient in any respect in which they are, by the same deed, in express terms, declared to be null and void ; and find, that although such declaration was made in the deed of 1793, asserting the validity of the former deeds to the extent of such powers, all the dispositions in the former deeds having been revoked in express terms, there did not, according to the true effect of all the deeds taken together at the death of Colonel Craufurd, under any parts of the former dispositions so expressly revoked, and so expressly declared to be null and void, exist in any persons named in such former deeds any personal or other right in the lands by the deed of 1793 disposed to the defender, secure against the challenge of the heir, ex capite lecti, on which the disponent in lecto, under the deed of 1793, could be entitled to found as his defence against the reduction of the deed made in lecto : and find also, that as the deeds in this case are conceived as to the terms thereof, the disponees under the deed of 1793 cannot be considered as having title or right under the former dispositions, as if they had been named therein, or otherwise under the effect thereof : and find, likewise, that the heir is not excluded in this case from challenging the deed of 1793, ex capite lecti, and at the same time founding thereon, as revoking the former dispositions. And it is therefore ordered and adjudged, That the Interlocutors complained of, so far as they are inconsistent with the findings and declarations aforesaid be and the same are hereby Reversed : and it is further ordered, That the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be meet, regard being had thereunto.

[See 1 Dow, 392.]

UNDER a marriage-contract executed in 1735, lands subject to the limitations of an entail, made in 1708, are resigned by the husband, being heir in possession, and destined upon new infeftment to the husband, "and the heirs-male of the marriage, which failing, to the heirs-male of the body of the husband in any future marriage; which failing, to the heirs female of the said spouses, and the heirs-male to be procreated of their bodies, the eldest daughter or heir-female, and the heirs-male descending of her, always excluding the rest, and proceeding without division." To fulfil the obligations of this contract, the husband made up titles, and was infeft in 1736. A daughter was the only issue of the marriage. This daughter being married, by a contract, in which her husband joined, and which was carried into effect under a decree-arbitral in 1759, accepted from her father a sum of money "in full satisfaction of all right of succession which they have, or in any event may have, to the lands subject to the marriage contract, and of the provisions to children of the marriage in any portion, etc. whatever, which the daughter or her husband might claim on the decease of the father, and they accordingly quit claim, and discharge the father from all demands, and renounce and overgive to him, his heirs and assignees, all right, claim of succession, or other right which the daughter and her husband have, or in any event may have, under the provisions of the marriage contract." In the same year, 1759, a disposition was executed by the father in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to his brother, etc. The daughter died in 1768, leaving a son, J. R. The father died in 1774. In 1806 J. R. was served heir to his mother, and brought an action to reduce the disposition of 1759, and all subsequent conveyances of the [693] lands subject to the marriage-contract of 1759. J. R. dying in 1811, the Appellant, Mrs. Majendie, became pursuer in the action, as the sister of J. R. and heir of provision, under the destinations of the marriage contract: held, 1st, that she was heir-female within the meaning of the terms of the destination; 2d, that the entail of 1708 was barred, both by positive and negative prescription; 3d, that the daughter had power to contract with the father, and renounce and discharge the right under the marriage contract as a jus crediti vested in her: the effect of which discharge is to bar the right of all other heirs of the marriage.

The question in this case arose upon a marriage contract executed in 1735, by which lands (subject to an entail made in 1708,) were settled "upon F. C. the husband, and the heirs-male of his marriage with M. M., whom failing, the heirs-male of F. C. in any subsequent marriage, which failing, the heirs-female to be procreated betwixt the said spouses, and the heirs-male to be procreated of their bodies, the eldest daughter or heir-female, and the heirs-male descending of her, always excluding the rest, and succeeding without division." R. a daughter and only child of the marriage being under coverture, with the concurrence of her husband, and by agreement with her father F. C. in consideration of £650 to be paid by him, renounced her estate, right and claim under the marriage settlement.

This agreement was carried into effect by decree-arbitral, discharge and renunciation, in 1759, and the lands were settled by new dispositions made by the father on a new series of heirs. R. died before her father, leaving a son and two daughters. In 1806 the [694] son served himself heir of provision under the marriage settlement, and brought an action in the Court of Session to set aside the dispositions by which his claim was affected, and the principal question in the cause was upon the validity of the discharge and renunciation. The Court of Session, after various interlocutors, by a final judgment delivered in 1812, affirmed the validity of the transaction, holding the renunciation good against the son of R. Under these circumstances the cause came before the House in 1816, and after much argument and doubt on the principal question, expressed by the Lord Chancellor, was remitted to the division of the Court of Session, from which it came, with directions that they should call for the opinions of the judges of the other division on the points of law arising in the case.*

A petition having been presented by the Appellants to the Court of Session, (First Division,) to apply this judgment, an interlocutor was pronounced on the 10th July 1816, appointing the case to be stated in mutual memorials.

In the memorial which was thereupon presented for the Respondent, an objection occurred to the title of the Appellant, Mrs. Majendie, which was to the following effect:

By the marriage contract 1735, the estate is provided, "to Francis Carruthers and the heirs-male of the marriage with Margaret Maxwell, whom failing, the heirs-male of Francis in [695] any subsequent marriage, which failing, the heirs-female to be procreated betwixt the said spouses and the heirs-male to be procreated of their bodies." Under this destination Mr. John Routledge was properly served heir of provision, as being the heir-male of the body of Mrs. Elizabeth Routledge, the only daughter or heir-female of the marriage of Francis Carruthers and Margaret Maxwell. But the present Appellant, Mrs. Majendie, who is in a different situation, has served herself heir of provision to her brother John, taking it for granted that she is called as the next heir of this contract.

The destination is to the "heirs-female to be procreate betwixt the said spouses and the heirs-male to be procreated of their bodies, the eldest daughter or heir-female, and the heirs-male descending of her, always excluding the rest, and succeeding without division; which all failing, the said Francis Carruthers, his heirs and assignees whatsoever." The heir-female procreated of the spouses was Elizabeth Routledge; and John Routledge, her son, served himself heir of provision as the heir-male of her body. But the present Appellant is not an heir-male of the body of Mrs. Routledge; and there is here no provision to the heirs-female of her body. It was submitted, that, according to the sound construction of the terms of the destination of the contract, the destination after the immediate heir-female of the marriage, and the heirs-male of her body, is "to the heirs and assignees whatsoever of Francis Carruthers." Under this last clause, the Appel-[696]lant could have no title to challenge the settlement 1759.

On the 15th of January 1817, the Court of Session, (First Division,) pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lords having heard and considered the mutual memorials for the parties, and whole cause, appoint supplementary memorials to be lodged on the point of Mrs. Majendie's title to pursue the present action, whether in the character of heir of provision under the marriage-contract of Francis Carruthers of Dormont, or as heir of provision served to her brother John Routledge; appoint the memorials to be seen and interchanged."

These additional memorials having been advised, the Lords of the First Division ordered a hearing in presence upon the objection to the title. After the discussion of this question the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lords having advised the supplementary memorials, and having heard parties procurators in their own presence upon the point of Mrs. Majendie's title, they sustain Mrs. Majendie's title to pursue the present action, as heir of provision under the marriage contract of Francis Carruthers of Dormont, and decern: but find no expenses due to either party."

This incidental point having been thus disposed of, the First Division of the Court of Session pronounced the following interlocutor, in order to obtain the opinions of the Second Division and Permanent Ordinaries, in terms of the judgment of the House of Peers, on the questions stated in that interlocutor.

[697] "The Lords having resumed consideration of, and advised the mutual memorials for the parties and whole cause, before answer, and in obedience to the remit from the House of Lords, order these memorials, etc. to be transmitted to the Judges of the Second Division and Permanent Ordinaries, with a request that they will peruse and consider the same, and thereafter give their opinions in writing, either collectively or individually, on the following questions in law arising therefrom:

"1^{mo}. Was the pursuer's mother, Mrs. Routledge, vested in the jus crediti under the marriage-contract 1735, so as to give her power to discharge the obligation thereby incumbent on her father, either on receiving full and specific implement, or on such terms of compromise as her father and she settled, or as arbiters might decern?

"2^{do}. Whether the decree-arbitral was meant to regulate the succession of the estate, or was confined to the money provision?

"3^{to}. Did Mrs. Routledge, by her discharge and renunciation in 1759, following on the relative agreement, submission, and decrees-arbitral, effectually discharge her jus crediti under the marriage-contract 1735, so as to bar the claim of her son John, who, by her predeceasing her father, became the heir of the marriage-contract at his death, and, but for that discharge and renunciation by his mother, would have taken the estate under the marriage-contract?

"4^{to}. Was the entail, in the former marriage-contract in 1708, effectual to secure the estate to the heirs-male of that marriage; and was it a [698] valid and subsisting entail, binding on Francis Carruthers in 1735?

"5^{to}. Supposing it to have been binding, is it cut off by prescription?"

The case having been considered by the Judges of the Second Division and the permanent Ordinaries, the following opinions were returned:

"In reference to the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of 25th February last, applying a remit from the House of Lords, we have considered the printed pleadings on both sides, and report our opinion on the questions of law to which our attention is directed.

" Answer to question 1st.—We are of opinion that, in consequence of previous decisions, the pursuer's mother, Mrs. Routledge, must be held as vested in the jus crediti under the marriage-contract 1735, so as to give her power to discharge the obligation thereby incumbent on her father, either on receiving full and specific implement, or on such terms of compromise as her father and she might settle, or as arbiters might decree.

" Answer to question 2d.—We are of opinion, that the decree-arbitral was meant to regulate, and that its terms must be held to apply to the succession to the landed estate of Dormont, as well as the pecuniary provision to which Mrs. Routledge might eventually have been entitled.

" Answer to query 3d.—We think that Mrs. Routledge, by her discharge and renunciation in 1759, did effectually discharge her jus crediti under the marriage-contract in 1735, so as to bar the claim of her son.

[699] " Answer to query 4th.—We are of opinion, that the entail in the marriage-contract of 1708 was from the beginning ineffectual, in so far as it relates to the lands of Winterhopehead; but that as to the lands of Dormont and others proceeding from the husband, it was in 1735, and in consequence of the titles afterwards completed by Francis Carruthers, effectual in terms of the act 1695, chap. 24.

" Answer to question 5th.—But it appears to us, that all obligation under the marriage-contract 1708 is now cut off by prescription.

(signed) " D. Boyle, Wm. Robertson, David Douglas, Ad. Gillies, D. Monypenny."

" To query 1st.—Whatever might have been the effect of a conveyance by the pursuer's grandfather of the whole estate, settled by the contract of marriage entered into by him in 1735 in favour of the pursuer's mother, Mrs. Routledge, and especially if she had survived her father; we are of opinion that, as no conveyance was granted to her, and she did not survive her father, she had no power to discharge the obligation in the said contract any farther than concerned herself and the heirs who represented her.

" Query 2d.—We think that the decreet-arbitral was meant to apply to the estate as well as to the sum of £1000 stipulated in the marriage-contract, so far as regarded the interests of those who [700] were parties to the submission. But that it cannot in just or sound construction be held to extend to heirs of the marriage, who were not themselves, and do not represent those who were parties to the submission.

" Query 3d.—We are of opinion, that Mrs. Routledge, by the discharge alluded to in this query, did not effectually discharge the jus crediti under the marriage-contract 1735, so as to bar the claim of her son John.

" Queries 4th and 5th.—We agree with our brethren that the destination of succession in the marriage-contract 1735, was not rendered ineffectual by the entail in the contract of marriage 1708; and further, that this latter is now cut off both by the negative and positive prescriptions.

The case then came to be advised by the First Division of the Court; and a majority of the division having declared their opinion to be in favour of the Respondent, it was proposed that the former interlocutor should be adhered to in general terms. But the counsel for the Respondent having observed that an interlocutor in such terms would in point of form decide the question of prescription in his favour, which was contrary to the opinion expressed by the Judges, and that he wished for an opportunity of bringing that question [701] more particularly under the consideration of the Court, as he was afraid that his argument upon it might have been misunderstood by their Lordships, especially as it had been very much misunderstood and misrepresented by the Appellant; and, besides, it had been held of such inferior importance that no specific judgment had hitherto been given upon it. For these reasons he prayed the Court, if the opinion of their Lordships remained against him on the point of prescription, to insert a finding to that effect in the interlocutor to be pronounced, in order that he might have an opportunity to reclaim against that finding, and, in his reclaiming petition, to state the merits of the question of prescription as unmingled with the other points in the cause. It appeared to the Court that this was a reasonable proposition; and their Lordships not having changed their opinion on the question of prescription, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—" The Lords having advised the memorials, and additional memorials, for the parties, and having also advised with the Lords of the Second Division of the Court, and with the Permanent Lords Ordinary of both divisions of the Court, and having reconsidered the whole cause in terms of the remit from the House of Lords,—They adhere to their former interlocutor of date 12th May 1812, and decern in terms of the said interlocutor in the two several processes therein mentioned: And further, in the process of declarator of irritancy and of reduction, brought at the instance of William Thomas Carruthers, and founded on the contract of marriage and settlement of tailzie of 10th August 1708, the Lords [702] find, that all claim at the instance of the pursuer of the said process upon said contract of marriage and settlement of tailzie, is cut off by prescription both positive and negative; and therefore sustain the defences in the said process, assolvie from the conclusions of the same, and decern.”

This interlocutor was submitted to review in a reclaiming petition by the Respondent, in so far as it found that all claim at the instance of the Respondent upon the tailzie 1708 was cut off by prescription.

Answers having been ordered and given in to this petition, and one counsel on each side having been heard at length upon this point of prescription, the Lords of the First Division pronounced the following interlocutor: “The Lords having resumed consideration of this petition, and advised the same, with the answers thereto, and having also heard the counsel for the parties thereon, they refuse the prayer of the said petition, and adhere to their former interlocutor therein reclaimed against.”

Mrs. Majendie entered an appeal from the interlocutor of 25th May 1819, sustaining the defences for the Respondent, founded on the discharge and renunciation in 1759.

The Respondent entered a cross-appeal against the interlocutors of the 3d of Feb. 1818, from part of the interlocutor of 25th May 1819, and from that of 16th December 1819: in which the objection to the title and the point of prescription were decided against the Respondent.

[703] The case was argued in the House of Lords at very great length, by The Attorney-General and Mr. Brougham, for the Appellant.

Mr. Clerk and Mr. Hope, for the Respondent.

By the petitions of appeal three questions were raised, 1st, Whether Mrs. Majendie, being a daughter of a daughter of the marriage, was an heir-female within the meaning of the provisions of the marriage contract: it being contended by the cross appeal, that daughters only of the marriage were intended as heirs-female, which appeared from the provision for the heirs-male of such heirs-female! Upon this question the following authorities were cited:—

The second and principal question was, Whether Mrs. Routledge, being heir of provision expectant, and predeceasing her father without having received implement of the contract, could for all future contingent heirs, as well as for herself, renounce the right of provision under the settlement, and by agreement with her father discharge his obligation! Whether she had a jus crediti, or merely a spes successionis? Whether in fact she did, by the terms of the agreement, etc. renounce for herself personally, or also for the other heirs of provision! [707]

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

The GOVERNORS of HERIOT'S HOSPITAL,—Appellants: J. C. ROSS.—

Respondent [24th July 1820].

When a vassal sub-feus his possession for its full adequate value at the time, it is only a year's sub-feu duty, and not a year's rent upon the value improved by buildings, which he is bound to pay to his superior, as a composition for an entry to a singular successor.

The Respondent held under the Appellants a piece of ground in Edinburgh, at the yearly feu-duty of three bolls of wheat and three bolls of barley: The composition payable to the Appellants as superiors on the entry of a singular successor was not taxed. The Respondent, upon his entry in 1804, paid a composition of £30 sterling, which was the nominal value of the land. In 1807 the Respondent sub-féued the land to builders, who covered the ground with houses. The duty reserved upon the sub-féus was about £120 per annum, and the gross rental of the houses built and building was stated to amount to £3000 per annum. The feu-dispositions to the sub-vassals stipulated for a duplicando of the sub-feu duty on the entry of every heir and singular successor, and prohibited sub-inféudation. In the year , the Respondent being desirous to sell his interest in the feus, applied to the Appellants to assess the composition upon the [708] entry of a purchaser. The Respondent proposed to pay £120, the amount of one year's sub-feu duty. The Appellants refused to accept less than one year's full value of the land, as improved and increased by the buildings. The Respondent thereupon brought an action against the Appellants, seeking a declaration that purchasers were entitled to demand an entry from the Appellants, as superiors, on payment of £120 in full of the composition exigible by the superior upon the entry of the singular successor; and that the Appellants and their successors, as superiors, should be decreed to enter purchasers and singular successors of the Respondent, as vassals, accordingly on payment of £120, or the amount of sub-feu duties for one year, in full of non-entry duties, casualties of superiority, and other claims for entry of singular successors.

The Appellants contended in their pleadings in defence, that they were entitled to a full year's value at the time when the entry was to be given.

The Lord Ordinary and the court, upon a reclaiming petition, after condescendences and a hearing, delivered judgment for the Respondent. Upon a further reclaiming petition, praying the court to alter the interlocutor pronounced, so far as to find that the Appellants were entitled for the entry of an adjudger or purchaser to one year's sub-feu duty, and one year's average value of the whole profits derived by the pursuer and his successors from his sub-feus, by casualties or in any way whatever, the court by an interlocutor, pronounced on the 6th of June 1815, adhered to their former judgment.*

[709] From these several interlocutors the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants:—The Lord Advocate, Mr. Warren, (and Mr. J. Miller.)

For the Respondents:—Sir S. Romilly and Mr. Moncrieff.

The authorities cited were: For the Appellants, Aitchison v. Hopkirk, Fac. Coll. 14 Feb. 1775; *Jordanhill v. The case stood over for judgment from the time of the argument in 1818 until the end of the Session 1820, when the Lord Chancellor, in moving the judgment, observed, that it was a question of great importance and difficulty; that he had bestowed upon it, at various times since the argument, much and repeated attention, but he could not venture to advise the House to disturb the judgment.

The result of his deliberation was, that the majority of the judges below had decided the case properly.

Judgment affirmed.

REPORTS of CASES heard in the House of Lords upon Appeals and Writs of Error, and decided during the Session 1821. By RICHARD BLIGH, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. III.

ENGLAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY, 1 Meriv. 436.)

SAMUEL WHALLEY, CHARLES HARRISON and ELIZABETH his wife, and CATHERINE GEORGIANA WHALLEY,—Appellants; JOHN WHALLEY and DANIEL WHALLEY,—Respondents [7th Feby. 1821].

[Mews' Dig. vii. 221, 294; ix. 308; xii. 902. Cited in Gibbs v. Guild, 1881, 8 Ch.D. 296, at p. 394; and see notes to Huguenin v. Buscley, 1807, 14 Ves. 273, in 1 Wh. and T. L.C. 7th Ed. 247.]

The purchase of a reversion, by a Nephew from an Uncle of very advanced age, for a price grossly inadequate, the deed of conveyance in the operative part, but not in the recitals, expressing that the grant was made partly in consideration of love and affection, not impeached on the ground of fraud under the circumstances.

A reversion, valued at £6000 and upwards, in consideration of annuities secured to be paid on the lives of two very old persons, and valued at less than £400, is conveyed by a deed executed by an Uncle, aged 80, in favour of a Nephew, who was so described in the deed. There was no recital that blood formed a part of the consideration; but in the operative part of the deed [2] the grant is expressed to be made in consideration "of love and affection," as well as the annuities.

The grantor had previously made a valid will, devising the reversion to his Nephew, the grantee; and after the execution of the will, and before the grant, had sold part of the reversion, and received the price. The attorney (a stranger to both parties) who drew the will upon his own suggestion, but by the instructions of the Uncle, and the deed upon the instruction of both parties, was dead.

The deed was executed in 1773: the grantor died in 1774, leaving an heir, who died in 1791, not having impeached the deed. In 1794 the heir of the heir filed a bill to set aside the deed, on the ground of fraud, which bill was dismissed for want of prosecution.

In 1812 the devisees of that heir filed a new bill for the same purpose.

Held,—That the description of the party as a relation was equivalent to a recital: that the making the will was evidence of the truth of the consideration of love and affection; that the absence of recital did not afford sufficient ground to presume fraud, which being denied by the answer, and not proved in the cause, no issue ought to be directed, as the court of equity had before it sufficient evidence to decide the case; and on these grounds, and under these circumstances, that the conveyance was rightly held valid, and the bill properly dismissed; but no costs having been given in the Court below upon the decree of dismissal, that no costs ought to be given on affirming the decree upon the appeal.

The cause of action within the meaning of the statute of Limitations arises when the party has the right to apply to a court of equity: As where a reversion, alleged to have been fraudulently purchased, descends in equity to the heir by the death of the ancestor. Semb. that the time of limitation begins to run from the time when the fraud is discovered, either in the lifetime of the ancestor, or upon the descent.

In the year 1772 certain freehold and copyhold lands (subject to a life-interest, vested in the widow of J. Eyre,) descended to Samuel Whalley, who was then eighty years of age.

[3] In September 1772, a notice to let being affixed on premises, part of the estates in question, Daniel Whalley, the nephew of Samuel, called on Mr. Garth, a respectable solicitor, who had acted for Mr. Eyre, the former owner, and had the management of the estates for the widow, but with whom Daniel was before unacquainted, to treat with him, as the agent of the widow, for renting the premises. Mr. Garth, in the course of this treaty, having stated that the premises could only be let upon the contingency of the widow's life interest, as he had been unable to discover the heir of J. Eyre, Daniel informed him that his uncle Samuel was the heir; and having afterwards brought his uncle to the office of Mr. Garth, he was informed of his right, and advised to dispose of the reversion by a will being drawn up in the office upon the suggestion of Mr. Garth, and Samuel Whalley being asked to whom he would devise the reversion, answered, to his nephew Daniel, whereupon the will was accordingly filled up, and executed on the 25th of September 1772.

After the date of the will, part of the lands were sold by agreement between the tenant for life and Samuel the reversioner, and Samuel received his share of the price. In 1772 an agreement took place between Samuel and Daniel for the sale and purchase of the residue of the reversion, by which it was agreed that Daniel should secure to Samuel an annuity of £80 to be paid to Samuel during his life, and an annuity of £20 to be paid to Martha Linwood for her life, commencing from the death of Daniel Whalley; and that Daniel should convey the reversion to Samuel. The annuities were after-[4]-wards, upon the suggestion of Daniel Whalley, increased to £100 and £30 respectively, and thereupon deeds of lease and release were prepared in the office of Mr. Garth. The deeds were dated in December 1772, and executed in January 1773. The release, describing Daniel as the son of Samuel's brother, recited the contract for sale, the consideration of the annuities, and the security given for payment of them; and witnessed, that in consideration of the annuities so secured, and in consideration of the natural love and affection which Samuel then bore to Daniel Whalley, he granted, etc. the freehold, and covenanted to surrender the copyhold estates, subject to the life-interest.

The reversion of the copyhold lands was surrendered to the use of Daniel Whalley according to the covenant.

Samuel Whalley died in 1771, leaving Peter Whalley his heir-at-law and customary heir, who died in 1791, having devised his freehold and copyhold lands to the Appellants, who at that time were infants, but afterwards, and as stated in the bill, lately obtained administration of his personal estate as next of kin, he having died intestate as to his personal estate. Martha Linwood died in 1775. Rebecca Eyre, the tenant for life, died in 1782: from which time Daniel Whalley held possession of the lands under the conveyance until 1811, when he died. In 1791 a bill was filed in the Exchequer by the Appellant Samuel Whalley, as the customary and right heir of Samuel and Peter Whalley, to set aside the conveyance; which bill was dismissed for want of prosecution. In 1812 a bill was filed in [5] Chancery by the Appellants against Daniel Whalley, impeaching the sale and conveyance on the grounds of fraud, and gross inadequacy of price, stating the facts before mentioned and praying an account of the rents and profits of the lands, and of waste done or permitted, from the death of Rebecca Eyre, the tenant for life, to the death of Peter Whalley, and a like account from that time, and a conveyance of the lands, etc.

This bill was afterwards amended, but not in any respect material to be noticed

The answer to the original and amended bill denied fraud; relied upon the consideration of love and affection, as expressed in the deed; and insisted upon the Statute of Limitations as a bar to the claim.

It appeared in evidence, by production of the bill of costs, upon the hearing in the Court below, and upon the appeal, that Daniel Whalley paid Garth for preparing the deed of conveyance, and the bonds to secure the annuities. By items of charge in the same bill, it appeared that Garth had managed the lands in question as steward or solicitor. It further appeared that the freehold lands, in 1773, according to a surveyor's valuation, were worth about £2025, and the copyhold about £4200. The defendant, by his answers, admitted that the reversion might at that time be worth £3000. It further appeared, by the valuation of an actuary, that the annuities were worth £389 14s. There was no direct proof of fraud.

The cause was heard at the Rolls, before Grant, M.R. who made a decree (Meriv. supra), dismissing the bill [6] without costs. This decree being signed by the Lord Chancellor, and enrolled, was now brought by appeal before the House of Lords.

For the Appellants, Mr. Wetherell and Mr. Wakefield.

On the part of the Appellants it was argued, that under the circumstances of the case the length of time since the right accrued was no bar * to the suit; that the conveyance ought to be set aside on account of the inadequacy of price, and the suspicious circumstances of the transaction †; that the consideration of love and affection inserted in the operative part of the deed was fraudulent, and the absence of recital on that subject was proof of the fraud, and ought to control the operation of the deed ‡; that an issue to try the validity of the deed ought, at all events, to be directed (Filmer v. Gott, 4 B.P.C. 230).

For the Respondents, Mr. Hart and Mr. Buck.

If this were a case of mere bargain, being the sale of a reversion, the transaction if it had been impeached in due time, might have been assailable on the ground of inadequacy of price. But in this case there was a mixture of considerations, price and [7] blood. No Court can apportion what belongs to each. With what justice to the Respondent could an issue now be directed after a lapse of forty years, when the witnesses are dead who could have explained the transaction. There is no evidence of fraud; and the answer denies it. There is therefore no ground for an issue. In Filmer v. Gott the issue was directed upon a clear presumption of fraud, and the jury found that love and affection formed no part of the consideration. The grantor in this case died in 1774, and his heir must then have been apprised of the fact that he was disinherited by the will.

The Lord Chancellor: Is the will of Peter proved?

For the Respondents: It was not thought material; because if the Appellants could not claim as devisees of Peter, one of them claimed as his heir-at-law.

Lord Chancellor: It is material in this view, if the claim is by the heir-at-law; he, in 1794, filed a bill to set aside the conveyance, and suffered that bill to be dismissed for want of prosecution.

For the Respondents: From 1782, when the tenant for life died, to 1794, when Peter Whalley died, no claim was made by him. Long delay, where no legal disability exists, is fatal to the claims of a suitor in a court of equity. Mr. Garth, the [8] only person acquainted with the particulars of the transaction, died in 1792. How are the Respondents now to produce evidence to show absence of fraud, (if such evidence ought to be required,) but by the transaction itself? Part of the property was sold by the grantor; that is a proof of free-agency. He left abundant assets, which shows that he was not in a state of necessity; and that he was not in a state of imbecility is proved by the surrender of the copyhold.

This is not a case of direct trust, in which it may be admitted, as a general proposition, that length of time is no bar; this is a case where a party is to be declared a trustee upon the effect of evidence and constructive inference from the acts of the parties. In such cases courts of equity, by their own rules, give great effect to length of time. The statute has given the measure, and furnished the rule in equity, not merely in difficult cases, like the present, but even in cases where fraud is manifest.* Mrs. Eyre, the tenant for life, died in 1782; the reversion then fell into possession. There is no proof that Peter Whalley was then abroad; the cause of action then arose, and the time of limitation began to run from that hour; an ejectment could not have been brought after 1802, and the bill was not filed till 1812. The recitals are not a necessary part of the deed: they may be used to explain the intention of [9] the parties, if it is doubtful in the operative part, but they have no distinct operation.†

If fraud is to be implied from the absence of recital as to love and affection forming part of the consideration, it would be easy for persons intending fraud to have provided against such inference, by inserting a recital to that effect.

Lord Redesdale: It is recited that Daniel, the grantee, is the son of John, the brother of the grantor.

Mr. Wetherell, in reply: The time had not elapsed, according to the rule: it began to run only when the reversion fell in.

Lord Chancellor: The cause of action arose when the party had a right to apply to a court of equity to set aside the deed. Peter had that right immediately after the death of Samuel.

Reply: Where the subject of fraud is a reversion, the time has been reckoned from the falling into possession. Peter Whalley died abroad; and from the frame of the bill in 1791, it appears that nothing was known of the fraud. As to the respectability of the solicitor employed, the same argument might have prevailed in Purell v. Macnamara (11 Ves. 91), and Hudson v. Beauchamp (see note at end of this case). In those cases the deeds were prepared in respectable offices.

[10] Lord Redesdale: You forget that Garth had the means of knowledge, which might not be the case in those offices. Garth let the estates, and must have known the value. The agreement for the leases of the house and farm shows his knowledge.

Lord Chancellor: He had the management of the farm. As to the annuities, the answer represents that £80 was required by Samuel the grantor, and that £100 was proposed by Daniel the grantee of the reversion.

Reply: The neutrality of the solicitor, in not interfering to prevent an unfair transaction raises no presumption of fairness.

Lord Redesdale: You are to make out that the words "love and affection" were fraudulently introduced into the deed.

Lord Chancellor: Filmer v. Gott ought to have been decided without an issue. In that case there was not only no evidence that love and affection formed part of the consideration, but the contrary.

Lord Redesdale: I observe that there is no charge in Garth's bills for taking instructions.

Lord Chancellor: What has become of Hudson v. Beauchamp?

Reply: It is still in the Ecclesiastical Court.

That testimony has perished is an accident which ought not to affect the right of a claimant.

[11] The Lord Chancellor: The question in this case is, whether a deed, executed in December 1772, is to be considered fraudulent, upon a suit instituted in 1812.

There are two points: 1. On length of time. 2. On the nature of the transaction. But if, from the nature of the transaction, the deed is not to be considered as fraudulent, it is unnecessary to discuss the question of length of time.

It appears that J. Eyre, who was entitled to the reversion in fee of the estate in dispute, died in 1772; Rebecca Eyre, who was tenant for life, died in 1782.

It also appears that in the transactions forming the subject of this suit, Mr. Garth, a very respectable man, was employed as the attorney; but undoubtedly his respectability cannot be used as evidence of the fairness of the transaction. There are attorneys and conveyancers who do not think it their duty to decide what parties ought to do, but attend only to their instructions, and carry them into execution. That remark may apply to the cases of Purcell v. Macnamara, and Hudson v. Beauchamp, where highly respectable solicitors were employed in the transactions which formed the subjects of those causes: yet the Court thought, from the relation of the parties, the nature of the conveyances, and other suspicious circumstances, furnishing a presumption of fraud, that investigation was necessary. I can recollect the time when counsel, being consulted, thought it a part of their duty to point out the propriety or impropriety of the transaction submitted to their consideration. But in this case it will be more satisfactory to consider the [12] nature of the advice given by Mr. Garth, as bearing upon the transaction, than the respectability of his character.

It appears that Samuel Whalley was ignorant that the reversion had descended to him, until he was informed of the fact, in consequence of the application made by Daniel Whalley to Mr. Garth. The reversion was expectant upon a life-estate, vested in a person aged fifty-four, and S. Whalley was then eighty-three years of age. The estate, therefore, was not likely to be productive to him, unless it should be immediately converted into money.

Samuel Whalley died in 1774, leaving Peter Whalley his heir at law, who died abroad in 1791. But it does not appear by the answer, or by proof, whether, in the interval between his ancestor's death and his own, he resided abroad or in England permanently or occasionally.

Peter Whalley devised all his real and copyhold estates to the Appellants.

In the year 1794 a bill was filed in the Exchequer, by the Appellant S. Whalley, praying that this deed might be set aside as fraudulent.

The cause of action arose at the moment when the deed was executed, or as soon after as the parties interested were apprised of the facts. Suppose that Samuel Whalley was not aware of the fraud alleged, and died in such ignorance; whether Peter, his heir, was or was not informed of the state of things does not appear by evidence; but at least Peter knew that he was the heir of Samuel, and he must have known the connexion of Samuel with John Eyre.

[13] In this case my judgment will not proceed upon the doctrine cited, as to express or constructive trusts, or the distinction between them; nor shall I rely upon the lapse of time.

Those doctrines deserve serious consideration when cases arise which require it. In all cases, delay of suit, where parties are cognizant of their rights, and under no legal disability, must affect a tardy claim, as importing a conscious acquiescence in what they have supposed to be an adverse right.

In the case of Filmer v. Gott, the transaction purported to be a sale of the property, and upon the recital of the deed it appeared to be simply a sale: but in the operative part of the deed, love and affection was expressed as part of the consideration, and in fact there was blood enough to support that consideration. But in that case the grantor filed the bill to set aside the conveyance. There was no question as to length of time. It was contended, on the part of the Defendant, that the deed imported a consideration of blood, as well as money, and primâ facie it was so; but the House of Lords (superfluously perhaps) sent the cause to be tried upon the question, whether love and affection formed any part of the consideration. It was considered, even in that case, that unless there was presumption, or proof, to destroy the effect of a consideration expressed in the deed and to prove that there was nothing but pecuniary payment, though otherwise asserted in the deed, the Court was not at liberty to refuse to give effect to that which was expressed; but in fact, in Filmer v. Gott the issue was unnecessary. It was manifest that the Defen-[14]-dant considered himself a mere purchaser, and until the bill was filed he never thought of the consideration of love and affection. The grantor was in a state of partial incapacity, never intending to give any thing from love and affection; nor was it so considered by either party.

In questions of this kind it is necessary to look to the difference of facts and circumstances.

In this case it appears, that upon the death of John Eyre, from whom the reversion descended, it was unknown to Garth, who managed the property, who was entitled to the reversion as heir at law.

The information is obtained accidentally from Daniel Whalley, that his uncle Samuel is the heir; and he, upon being introduced to Garth fairly, as represented by the answer, devises the property to his nephew. The personal property is distributed under the administration of Peter, the Appellant's father, among the next of kin, and at that time no complaint is made of the deed. Upon the answer, unimpeached by other proof, the Defendant is entitled to credit; at least the Plaintiff must prevail by admissions in the answer, or proof in the cause, that the deed was obtained by fraud, or that the consideration expressed in it of love and affection was not founded in fact. But the answer represents that Samuel Whalley, the grantor, lived on terms of great intimacy and affection with Daniel his nephew, the grantee, and that he was offended with and averse to Peter, the Appellant's father, and his family; and those representations are not falsified by proof to the contrary.

With respect to the transaction in obtaining the will, it is to be watched with jealousy; but it appears, from the statement of the conversation between Garth and Samuel Whalley, that the reversion was willingly devised to Daniel. Garth attested the will; and if the testator had died the day after the execution, the validity of the will could not have been affected by the interposition of Garth; and in that view the will gives countenance to the subsequent deed.

In Filmer v. Gott the aunt had devised her estate to near relations, and had no intention to sell or give it to the nephew.

Here, at the date of the will, the old man had the intention to give the property to his nephew. The mode of selling for annuities was not impolitic for a man of eighty-one expecting a reversion subject to a life of fifty-four; and he had in fact joined with the tenant for life in selling a part of the property. He could not, therefore, be ignorant of his right and power to sell, nor entirely so of the value.

The deed primâ facie is a grant, not only for a money-consideration, but for love and affection.

It is open to proof, that love and affection formed no part of the consideration; upon such proof it would be considered as a mere money bargain. It is urged, that the want of recital affords presumptive proof; but the deed in the description of the parties shows the relationship.

In Filmer v. Gott, if I had heard the case in the Court below, I should have decided without directing an issue, upon the ground that the answer did not set up the consideration of blood.

In this case the Defendant, by answer, insists that the grant was made upon the consideration of love as well as money; and the oath of the Defendant must prevail in the absence of proof to the contrary. The witnesses who could explain the transaction are dead; and it would be unjust to the grantee to submit the case now to a jury, at the risk of deciding against the judicial presumptions arising from the expressions of the instrument, the oath of the Defendant in his answer, and the absence of other evidence to affect the answer.

Lord Redesdale: It would be attended with infinite mischief if courts of equity were to hesitate in deciding questions, when sufficient evidence is before them. In such cases they are more competent than a jury. Issues are usually, (or ought only to be,) directed in those cases where evidence is wanting; and it is only in those, because the mode of examination is more effectual at common law, that issues are directed in equity. Here, according to the answer, the attorney was employed by both parties; and in such cases it is at least gross negligence of duty in the attorney not to see that the transaction is fair.

To suppose that Garth, without instructions, inserted the consideration of love and affection, is to impute to him gross misconduct. The transaction cannot be impeached without charging him with fraud. He knew the value of the reversion, and that the annuities were not a compensation; and if he considered the transaction as a mere bargain of sale and purchase, when he inserted the words importing consideration beyond money, he acted fraudulently.

The objection arising from length of time is important in this as in other cases. It is the policy [17] of the statute to prevent the discussion of questions upon title when evidence has perished. In this case Garth, if living, could have decided the question.

If he had deposed that he inserted the words to give colour to the deed, that would have been a ground to rescind it; if he confirmed the representations made in the answer of the Defendant, the deed must have been supported. Those representations must now be presumed true, because the Appellants, by their delay, have deprived the Respondents of the evidence of Garth.

Under such circumstances length of time, if it had been less, would have been a sufficient ground for rejecting this application to Equity. Courts of Equity have always followed the statute of limitations; they are bound to act according to the spirit of that statute; and even in cases where it is not too late to maintain an ejectment, courts of equity have refused to interfere, because evidence has been lost.

The lapse of time is fatal to the claim of the Appellants. The parties having a claim were bound to proceed while the evidence of Garth was to be had, unless his death had happened very soon after the transaction.

Samuel Whalley, the grantor, had a right to impeach the deed, if fraudulent. The cause of action then existed; and thirty-nine years having since elapsed it would be grossly unjust now to rescind the deed, unless there were some evidence of fraud upon the face of the instrument.

The only ground stated by the Appellant is the [18] absence of recital as to the consideration of love and affection; but the grantee is described as the son of John, the brother of the grantor, and that is equivalent to such a recital. There is no internal evidence of fraud, and the will proves decisively that such a consideration in part existed; what ground is there to impeach the will? There is, therefore, positive evidence of the existence of the consideration, and nothing to rebut it.

As no costs were given below, that is a circumstance always regarded in the decision of appeals; and therefore no costs ought to be given here in this case.

Decree affirmed 7th February 1821.

Reg. Lib. 1819. A. 1745.

HUDSON v. BEAUCHAMP.

The bill in this case was filed by Humphrey Hudson, as sole next of kin of Anne Hudson, whose maiden name was Beauchamp, stating, that he had procured letters of administration to her effects; that she, when living, was possessed of large property in the public funds; that she was of very advanced age, and in a state of imbecility and decrepitude; that Messrs. Ransom and Morland were her bankers, and had the entire management of her property; and that the defendant, Robert Farthing Beauchamp, (no relative,) but a stranger to Anne Hudson, who had lately assumed the name of Beauchamp, being a clerk in that banking-house, and having thereby become acquainted with the extent of her property, and her inability to manage or dispose of it, had, under pretence of being in love with her, and deluding her with a promise of marriage, obtained an improper influence over her weak [19] mind; had taken her away from her residence at Twickenham, and secluded her from intercourse with her relatives, friends and acquaintance; had treated her as a child, and exercised an uncontrolled dominion over her imperfect faculties; that shortly after her removal from Twickenham, the defendant, by undue means, upon his own suggestion, and by direct instigation, prevailed on Anne Hudson to transfer all her stock in the public funds into the joint names of herself and the defendant, to execute a deed of gift to him of all her estate and effects, and, moreover, to make a will bequeathing all her personalty, except two small legacies, to the defendant; that the plaintiff had commenced proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court against the defendant to recall the probate of the will; upon these allegations the bill prayed, that the deed might be delivered up to be cancelled, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from transferring the stock or receiving the dividends.

To this Bill a demurrer was in the first instance put in, upon the ground, that the plaintiff had, by his own shewing, proved the title to be in the defendant, who, as he stated in his bill, had obtained probate of the will. This demurrer was afterwards abandoned.

On the 20th of July 1820, upon a motion before the Lord Chancellor, supported by affidavits, stating the facts before mentioned, and various instances of imbecility on the part of Anne Hudson, and of influence and coercion on the part of the defendant, an injunction was granted according to the prayer of the bill, until answer or further order.

In delivering his opinion upon the motion, the Lord Chancellor considered the accumulation of the will upon the deed of gift as a badge of fraud. He seemed to doubt the validity of instruments, obtained under the circumstances appearing in the affidavits, and dwelt particularly on the impropriety of the transfer of the stock into the [20] joint names, which deprived Ann Hudson of the power to deal with it.*

The suit instituted in the Ecclesiastical Court was pending till 1823, when a sentence † was pronounced by Sir J. Nichol in favour of the will. In Michaelmas Term 1823, on the application of the defendant, stating that the answer had been put in denying all the plaintiff's equity, the injunction was dissolved.

One of the points made by the answer to rebut the charge of fraud was, that the instruments were prepared in the office of respectable solicitors.

A TENANT, by the terms of his lease, was bound to uphold and maintain the houses

* For the account above given of what passed on the hearing of the motion, the editor is indebted to Sir George Hampson and Mr. Wilbraham, who were opposed to each other as counsel in the cause.

† [In delivering judgment, Sir J. Nichol made the following general observations.]

The case set up in argument was a case of fraudulent circumvention, practised on an impaired capacity. This is a case which certainly may exist. It is a mixed case, consisting of two ingredients, namely, weakened capacity and fraudulent circumvention; and the quantity and degree of each of these ingredients must therefore be examined into. If the degree of capacity is important, if very much reduced, slighter evidence of fraud and deception would be sufficient; whereas if the capacity was quite perfect, or nearly perfect, more clear proof of fraudulent circumvention would be required. Faculties so impaired as to be liable to imposition, is a proposition extremely loose and indefinite. No person, much passed the very prime of life, has not suffered in some degree a deterioration in respect of some of the faculties, and no capacity, even the most perfect, is completely safe against the practice of extreme cunning and artifice. Upon the question of capacity or incapacity, the Court relies but little in opinion, it looks for facts and conduct, in order to ascertain the boundary between testamentary capacity, and the absolute want of capacity, but any opinion that a person is liable to be imposed on by artful and designing persons, is of all species of evidence the most unsatisfactory that can be resorted to. Hence it becomes necessary for the Court to examine, with some degree of caution and carefulness, the conduct of the deceased. First, the degree of capacity or incapacity to which she was reduced, and then to see what evidence there is of fraudulent circumvention being practised upon her. The learned judge then entered into a minute statement and discussion of the facts, after which he pronounced the judgment above mentioned.

let in sufficient tenantable condition, during the lease, and to leave them so at his removal, subject to a special provision, that the timber in the sub-tenants houses should be valued at the commencement, and at the expiration of the tack; and that the out-going tenant should pay, or receive from the proprietor or in-coming tenant, the difference in value at those respective times.

The lease contained a further provision, that if the tenant should build an additional steading during the lease, the value thereof, at the expiration of the lease, to be ascertained by arbiters, at that time, should be allowed to him. Holding under this lease, the tenant pulled down the old buildings, and built a new steading.

It was decided on appeal, reversing in part the judgment of the Court below, that he was not authorized to pull down the old buildings without rebuilding or substituting others in their place, that the knowledge of such unauthorized acts without interference on the part of the landlord, did not conclude him on the principle of acquiescence, which is not applicable to such a case; but that the tenant is entitled to the value of so much of the new steading as ought to be considered as an additional steading, and not a substitution for the old buildings, subject to the provision in the lease, as to the timber in the sub-tenants houses. It was held also, that the tenant was entitled to be allowed for so much of the new buildings as consistently with the former finding he was entitled to have an allowance for, according to a valuation to be fixed at the time of removal, and not according to actual expenditure.

[22] In the year 1785, the Respondent's father, obtained from the grandfather of the Appellant, a lease of the farm of Borrowstone, for the term of twenty-one years.

At the commencement of the lease, the buildings on the farm consisted of a servant's dwelling, a stable, a byre, two barns, a kiln, an oxen-house, and cot-houses, inhabited by sub-tenants.

The lease contained the following clause:—

"The tenants shall keep, uphold, and maintain the whole houses thereby set in sufficient tenantable condition, during this tack, and leave them so at their removal, with this provision and declaration, that the timber in the several sub-tenants houses shall now be appraised and valued, at the sight of two neutral men, one to be chosen by each party; and the like appraisement and valuation shall be made at the issue of this tack; and that the out-going tenant shall pay to or receive from the proprietor, or in-coming tenant, according to the difference of those valuations to be made by neutral men as aforesaid."

A clause was also inserted in the lease, by which, in contemplation of improvement, it was provided, "That in case, during the currency of this lease, the said John Manson, or his foresaids, shall build an additional steading (i.e. a farm-house and offices) on said lands, etc. at their own expense, they shall have allowance of the value of such steading, etc. at the issue of this tack, from the said Sir John Sinclair, or his foresaids, according to a valuation to be put thereon at the term of removal, by two neutral men as arbiters. [23] one to be chosen by each party, whom the parties shall be obliged to name, and whose determination shall be final."

The Respondent's father died in 1786, by which event this lease devolved upon the Respondent. Shortly after he came into possession, the Respondent pulled down the old buildings and erected on the land a new farm house, with offices.

These buildings were completed, without objection on the part of the landlord, two years after the commencement of the lease, and were occupied by the Respondent during the term.

At Whitsuntide, 1806, the Respondent quitted the premises on the expiration of his lease; and the land, together with these buildings, was let to another tenant, at a rent of £400.

Before quitting possession, the Respondent applied to the agent of the Appellant, who had succeeded to his grand-father's estate, and was then a minor, for the appointment of a person of skill, to concur with one to be named by the Respondent, to survey these buildings, and to make up a report of their value. These applications having been disregarded, the Respondent, on the 23d June 1806, made a notarial requisition by a written instrument, to the Appellant's manager, protesting, that in the event of failure within a time specified, judicial measures would be resorted to for such an appointment, and that the proprietor would be liable in the penalty stipulated in the lease, for this contravention.

No attention having been paid to this requisition by those who had the management of the Appel-[24]-lant's affairs, the Respondent presented a petition to the Judge Ordinary, the sheriff of Caithness, 'craving him to grant warrant to some fit person whom he should appoint, to concur with George Burn, architect, in the valuation of the houses and enclosures erected by the petitioner on the lands of Borrowstone and Lybster, during the currency of the before-mentioned lease, as the same stand at the present period, and to ordain them to report the same to him; and after the said valuation has been carried into effect, to ordain the proprietor's agent to relieve the petitioner, after payment and satisfaction has been made to him of the value of the said erections, in terms of the tack of the possession of the foresaid houses, and of all further risk or concern in the same.'

Upon this application the sheriff pronounced the following deliverance:—
"The sheriff-substitute having considered the within petition, together with the original lease therewith produced, grants warrant for serving a copy thereof, and of this interlocutor, upon Sir John Gordon Sinclair of Murkle, Bart., and his tutors or curators, and appoints them to concur with the petitioner in the choice of a proper person or persons, to estimate and value the house and enclosures mentioned in the petition; and that within fourteen days after such service, with certification to them, if they fail, that a person or persons will be appointed by the Court to inspect, estimate, and value the said houses and enclosures."

This petition and deliverance were served edict-[25]-ally on the defender, and his tutors and curators, who appeared, and opposed the petition. After some discussion, in which the Appellant contended that his obligation went no farther than the original cost of the buildings, valued at the time of removal, the sheriff-substitute granted warrant to a mason and a slater to inspect and value the masonry and slate-work, and to a wright and a house-carpenter to value the timber-work of the houses, and report. In consequence of this warrant the inspectors gave in a report, from which it appeared, that the value of the mason-work of the buildings, etc. was £355 2 11 and of the carpenter-work 403 2 6½

Total £758 5 5½

and the valuers deponed, in presence of the sheriff, that "the foresaid statement contains a just and true estimate of the several buildings therein mentioned, according to the usual rates of charging for such workmanship and materials in this county, and according to the best of their skill and judgment in those matters."

The Respondent made a requisition upon the Appellant's curators for payment of this sum, with interest from the term of Whitsunday 1806; and payment having been refused, he raised an action before the Court of Session, concluding for the above sum, "together with £100, being the penalty stipulated by the lease for the contravention of any of its provisions, which the Appellant had incurred by refusing to name a person to inspect these buildings, and thus occasioning delay in the inspection, [26]-tion, during which the buildings were deteriorated, and also for the expense of the proceedings before the sheriff, in ascertaining the value of these houses, together with the expenses of process."

Against this action defences were lodged for the Appellant and curators, objecting, 1mo, That the amount of alleged repairs, etc. thus claimed exceed ten years rents of the farm: 2do, That there is an action on the same ground, at the instance of the pursuer, depending before the sheriff of Caithness: 3to, That the pursuer owes arrears of the stipulated rents, which were left in his hands to compensate any just claims for repairs of buildings.

The case came before Lord Succoth, Ordinary, who sustained the defence of lis alibi pendens, by pronouncing the following interlocutor: "Having heard parties procurators on the libel and defences, in respect the sums now pursued for are the subject-matter of certain proceedings between the same parties, still in dependence before the Sheriff of Caithness, dismiss this action," etc.

Against this judgment the Respondent represented that the proceedings before the Sheriff were not of the nature of an action for payment of this claim, but were merely preparatory, with the view of ascertaining the amount of the claim under the authority of the Judge Ordinary, as the Appellant had refused to concur in the mode pointed out in the lease; that the petition to the Sheriff accordingly contained no conclusion for payment, so that there was no lis alibi pendens, nor any means in that action of awarding to the Respondent the estimated value of these houses; but the Respondent after-[27]-wards brought an advocacy, ob contingentiam, of the process before the Sheriff, which was conjoined with the ordinary action in the Court of Session.

Lord Succoth accordingly (12 May 1825) recalled his interlocutor of the 15th February 1811, and appointed the case to be stated in memorials, upon considering which he pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the mutual memorials for the parties, and whole process, Finds, that it appears from the proof adduced before the sheriff of Caithness, that the steading upon the farm of Borrowstone, belonging to the defender, was both incomplete and in bad repair at the commencement of the lease granted in the year 1785, to the pursuer's father; and that although the proofs were not satisfactory, the stipulations in the lease, upon which the present question depends, afford real evidence that this was the case: Finds, That, by an express clause in said lease, it was provided, that in case the tenant should build any additional steading on the said lands, he should have allowance of the value of the said steading at the issue of this tack: Finds, That no restriction is put upon the tenant, by this clause, as to the nature or extent of the steading which he might build upon the farm; and that it did not impose an obligation on the tenant to communicate the plans of the intended buildings to the landlord, or to give him formal intimation before commencing them: Finds, That the pursuer's father did erect a new steading, consisting of a slated dwelling-[28]-house, and farm-offices, which must have taken considerable time to erect; and that no complaint was made at the time by the landlord or his factor that they were too large and not suitable to the farm, nor any objection made until the pursuer came to demand the value of the same at the expiry of the lease: Finds, That even, after the cause came into this Court, the objection stated by way of defence was not that they were too large for the farm, but that the expense exceeded ten years rents, (which does not seem to be true in point of fact): Finds, That although by a clause in the lease the tenant was bound to keep the whole houses upon the farm in sufficient tenantable condition, yet that, according to a fair and rational construction of this clause, he was not bound to maintain old houses after he had built new ones sufficient for the farm; and, therefore, that the argument in defence, founded upon a supposed breach of covenant in this respect, on the part of the pursuer, is not well founded: Finds, That as the interest of the money laid out in building the new steading would be at least equal to the sum which it would have cost the tenant to keep the old steading in repair, the defender is not entitled to insist for any deduction on account of the pursuer having been saved the expense of keeping the old houses in repair. Therefore, as the reports and valuations which were made by tradesmen appointed by the sheriff are not objected to, and appear to have been made after a minute examination of the premises, finds the defender [29] liable in the sum of £758 5s. 5¼d., being the amount of the valuations of the houses, with interest from the expiry of the lease, viz. Whitsunday 1806; and finds the defender liable in the expense of the litigation since the interlocutor of 3d January 1813, conjoining the advocacy with the process previously depending in this Court. Lastly, as the claim for penalty and damages arising from the delay which took place in valuing the new steading, and which is said to have been owing to the opposition given by the defender, and also the amount of the ameliorations upon the houses occupied by the subtenants, are not sufficiently stated in the memorials, ordains parties to be heard at the bar upon these points; and also upon the expenses incurred in the Sheriff Court."

To this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary adhered, by refusing two representations; upon which the Appellant presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session, praying their Lordships "to alter the interlocutor complained of, and to assolvie the petitioner from the present action, and find him entitled to expenses." In this petition, the Appellant rested his case, 1st, Upon the interpretation of the clause in the lease regarding the expense of these buildings. 2dly, Upon the proof adduced in the proceedings before the Sheriff, by which he alleged it was made out, that the Respondent had failed to implement the obligations incumbent upon him with regard to the old houses on the farm, which he was bound to keep in a sufficient tenable condition. 3dly, Upon the allegation that the buildings which the Respondent had erected were [30] upon an extravagant scale, and altogether unsuitable to such a farm.

This petition was appointed to be answered; and, thereafter (11 Nov. 1816), the First Division of the Court of Session, "having resumed consideration of this petition, and advised the same, with the answers thereto, refuse the desire of the petition, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: And, in the mean time, decern against the petitioner for the sum of £700 Sterling, which sum they ordain to be paid to the Respondent, on or before the term of Candlemas next; and, if not then paid, decern also for the expense of extract, and allow the interim-decree to be then extracted."

The Respondent having also brought under the review of the First Division, that part of the interlocutor of Lord Succoth, which found him liable in the expenses of process, prior to the 3d January 1813, their Lordships "so far alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, as to find neither party entitled to any expenses which were incurred prior " to that date.

The Appellant presented a second petition, upon nearly the same grounds as those which were set forth in the former petition, against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which reclaiming petition was unanimously refused by the First Division, without answers on the part of the Respondent.

The above interlocutors being thus final in the Court of Session, the Appellant presented his appeal to the House of Lords.

[31] For the Appellants, The Attorney-General, and Mr W. Adam.

The determinations of the Lord Ordinary and the Court against the Appellant proceeded upon a misinterpretation or misconception of the real nature of the agreement between the predecessors of the parties, contained in the lease, founded on by the tenant in support of his claim. The Court of Session held that the bargain was, that the tenant should have it in his power to build a separate and entirely new suit of farm-offices, under the name of an additional steading, on the lands let, without reference to the accommodation which was previously on the farm: whereas the tenant was expressly bound to maintain and uphold the old existing steading, and even to leave it at his removal in sufficient tenable condition, and therefore any new buildings which the tenant was to be entitled to demand compensation for from the landlord, were merely such as were necessary or proper additional buildings, over and above the other houses, which were to be at all events upheld. The case of Ducat (3 Bl. p. 33) cited for the Respondent, is not applicable in its circumstances, and the authority of that case may be doubted.

The judgments under review are erroneous, in so far as they gave effect to a plea of the Respondent, founded on the alleged state of the houses in 1785, as appearing from a proof taken in the Sheriff's Court at an early stage of the present litigation. This evidence, it was said, showed the old houses to be [32] so ruinous and worthless as to lead to a presumption that the parties had it in contemplation to allow the erection of an entire new suite of buildings. But parol proof is inadmissible to explain the lease; and the reasoning is not only irrelevant, and contrary to the express provisions of the lease, but proceeds on a view of the proof altogether inaccurate.

According to the judgments of the Court of Session the Appellant's claim to the value of the steading (or similar buildings), which the tenant was bound to uphold, was disallowed; but as the new buildings were erected partly with the materials of the old, the Appellant, by the decision against him for the full value of the whole new steading, has been obliged to pay a price for his own property.

The decree against the Appellant is untenable, as the additional buildings were unsuitable to the farm, as possessed by the Respondent and his predecessor.

The Respondent pleaded, that the Appellant was bound to pay the estimated value of the buildings in this case, because he or his predecessors and then factor acquiesced in the erection. This is also one of the grounds adopted by the Lord Ordinary and the Court, but is utterly unfounded both in fact and in law.

The plea of the tenant in this case, being unsanctioned by the special terms of the lease, has no other foundation in law or equity against the Appellant.

Even as to any part of the buildings which may be properly termed "additional buildings," the valuation, at present rates, is such as the tenant is not entitled to demand.

[33] Upon these grounds, if the tenant was found entitled to the value of any buildings at all, it ought to have been limited to such as had been fair and bona fide "additions" to the former steading on the farm; and even these ought to have been valued, not at the price of labour and materials in 1807, but at the actual rate of outlay when the buildings were erected.

For the Respondents, Mr. J. P. Grant, and Mr. H. Stephen.

The lease, in terms of which the Respondent possessed his farm, expressly bears, That in case the tenant should build "any additional steading on the said lands," he should have "allowance of the value of such steading, at the issue of this tack, from the said Sir John Sinclair, and his foresaids, according to a valuation to be put thereon, at the term of removing, by two neutral men as arbiters, one to be chosen by each party, whom the parties shall be obliged to name, and whose determination shall be final."

In the case of Ducat against the Countess of Aboyne (Fac. Coll. 14 May 1803), the plea of the landlord was much stronger than in the present case. For in that case, the claim of the tenant for the expense of erecting a new dwelling-house was sustained, although the lease did not contain any express clause authorizing a new house to be built; and although the proprietor, before the house was begun, distinctly signified [34] to the tenant that he was determined not to make any allowance for such an expenditure. The lease contained a clause binding the tenant to leave the houses on the farm, which he was to take under inventory, in a sufficient and habitable condition at his removal, and "if the said houses shall be then found to have been ameliorated, the said Charles Ducat shall have allowance therefor from the said Countess of Aboyne." After the lease had subsisted some years, Ducat, instead of ameliorating the old house pulled it down, and built an entire new one; and before commencing this building, a protest was taken, that the proprietor should not be liable in the expense. Ducat, notwithstanding, went on with the work, and at the expiry of the lease brought an action for the difference between the estimated value of the new house which had been erected, and the old houses upon the farm, and in this action he prevailed, although the proprietor pleaded that the clause in the lease applied only to meliorations on the houses existing on the farm at the commencement of the lease; and although the tenant had been distinctly informed before he made this outlay, that no allowance would be made for it at the expiry of the lease.

The appellant having refused, though required by a notary-public, to name a person to concur on his part in the valuation of the farm, the Respondent had no other means of ascertaining the amount of his claim than by an application to the Sheriff of the district, to name neutral persons of skill, to inspect and value the farm-steading, who gave in a report upon oath that the buildings which had [35] been erected by the Respondent, were worth the sum for which decree has been given.

There being no limitation in the lease as to the amount of the sum to be expended in these farm-houses, and the Appellant's predecessor having made no objection at the time to the nature or extent of the accommodation, the Appellant is not entitled, at the end of the lease, to derive the whole benefit of buildings erected at the Respondent's expense, without making a fair allowance for their value.

After erecting a complete and substantial farm-steading sufficient for all the purposes of the farm, the Respondent could not reasonably be considered as being any longer under the obligation of keeping up the old houses, which were thus rendered unnecessary.

Even if the Respondent had been still under the obligation of keeping up the old houses, after he built a new farm-steading, the Appellant has not shown either that the Respondent allowed those old houses to fall into any other disrepair than what was necessarily occasioned by lapse of time, or that he ever required the Respondent to keep up those houses.

Any supposed deficiency in the implement of such an obligation can never afford a legal defence against a clear and liquid claim upon the Appellant for the estimated value of these houses.

The buildings erected by the Respondent, the value of which was not equal to two years rent obtained for this farm at the expiry of the lease, did not contain any superfluous accommodation, or any [36] thing more in this respect than is usually allowed to a tenant paying a rent of £400 per annum.

The Appellant, as proprietor of the estate, derived an advantage from these buildings equivalent to the sum he has been decreed to pay, and he is not entitled to this benefit at the expense of the Respondent.

[In the course of the argument the following observations were made.]

The Lord Chancellor: The principle of acquiescence is undoubted. But if I covenanted with my tenant, and he with me, that he should keep the buildings in repair, and he pleases, instead of repairing, to rebuild, can it be said, (unless there are special circumstances in the contract,) that because I stand by and permit him to rebuild I must pay for the alteration? Is there any case to such effect?

Lord Redesdale: The decision in Ducat's case did not go so far as this. For there the judgment was only for the difference between the value of the new and the old buildings, so far as the substitution of the one for the other was an amelioration. In ordinary cases, not governed by any special contract, if a tenant pulls down and rebuilds he is entitled to no allowance. In Ducat's case, under the circumstances of the contract, it was held, that the tenant was entitled to the value of amelioration. That was a strong decision; but does it warrant the judgment in this case? If he had made an addition, that was to be the subject of allowance [37] according to the contract. But has he done so? If he has acted, not under the contract, but according to his own discretion, he must bear the legal consequences. If it is a mere substitution, he is entitled to no allowance. To the value of additions he is entitled under the contract, but not for mere substitution, according to the judgment of the interlocutor. What is substitution, and what addition may be the subject of inquiry.

The Lord Chancellor, after stating the lease and obligations, proceeded to make the following observations:—Among the provisions of this lease, it is material to observe the respective times when the valuations are to be made, with respect to the timbers of the sub-tenants houses, and the additional standing. The timber is to be valued at the commencement and the issue of the tack, and if the tenant builds an additional standing, he is to have the value of such standing at the issue of the tack, according to a valuation then to be made.

It might be difficult to collect the meaning, or to put a satisfactory construction upon these clauses of obligation, taken singly; but looking at them altogether they tend to explain each other. What precisely was intended by the parties, in the provision for building an additional standing, is not, perhaps, with certainty to be ascertained. But instead of the addition contemplated or expressed, new edifices have been erected. Upon this state of things the question arises how the valuation is to be made between landlord and tenant in a case apparently not [38] anticipated*. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, affirmed by the Court of Session, finds the Appellant liable in the whole amount of the valuation of the new buildings; but the obligations of the lease require that the old buildings should be kept and left in repair, subject to certain valuations of timber, and the tenant is at liberty to build an additional standing, not to pull down the old one and replace it by new buildings. Under these circumstances it is impossible at the end of the tack to allow the tenant the whole value of the new standing. He cannot claim more than he would have been entitled to demand if the obligations had been observed as to keeping the old buildings in repair and making the addition of the new standing. The allowance by the Court of Session of the whole value of the new standing is too much.

Under the circumstances of this case it will be proper for the House to embody some special findings in their order,† and remit the case to the Court below for reconsideration.

Lord Redesdale: According to the covenants in this case, the tenant was bound to repair the old tenements, and he was authorized by the contract to add new buildings, but he was not authorized to pull down and rebuild. Having done so, when the new buildings were substituted for the old ones, all [39] the covenants applicable to the old became obligatory as to the new buildings. That part of the clauses of obligation, which relates to the valuation of the timber of the sub-tenants houses, seems to explain what is otherwise difficult of construction.

The timbers before the commencement of the lease were probably in a state of decay, and it was foreseen that it would be necessary to substitute new timbers: it was therefore provided, that in case of such substitution the value of the timber at the entry should be estimated and compared with the value at the expiration of the lease, and that landlord or tenant should pay or receive the difference, according to the result of such valuation. This provision shows that the tenant was to have allowance only for ameliorations. The landlord is not to be deprived of the old buildings, and to pay the full value of the new ones without compensation for the repairs which the tenant was bound to make.

Die Mercurii, 21st February 1821.

The Lords, etc. find, That according to the terms of the lease the tenant was bound to keep, uphold and maintain the whole houses set in sufficient tenantable condition during the tack, and to leave them so at his removal, subject to the particular provision respecting the timber on the sub-tenants houses: and that the tenant was not authorized by any provision in the lease to pull down the old buildings without rebuilding the same, or substituting other buildings instead thereof: but inasmuch as the tenant was authorized by the terms of the lease to build an additional steading, and has built an entire new steading, and pulled down the old buildings, he is entitled to the value of so much of such new steading as ought to be considered as an additional steading, and not a substitu-[40]-tion for the old buildings: subject nevertheless to the particular provision in the lease touching the timber in the sub-tenants houses: Further find, that according to the terms of the lease the Respondent is entitled to be allowed for so much of such new buildings as, consistently with the former finding, he is entitled to have an allowance for, according to a valuation to be put thereon at the time of removal, and not according to the actual expenditure in making such new buildings: And it is ordered, that, with these findings, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as is just and consistent with such findings.

SCOTLAND.

FROM THE COURT OF TEINDS.

Sir HENRY HAY MAKDOUGALL, of Makerston, in the County of Roxburgh, baronet.—Appellant: The Reverend DAVID HOGARTH, Minister of the Parish of Makerston,—Respondent [23d Feby. 1821].

[1 Shaw, App. 5.]

A DECREE having been made under the Authority of the High Commission Court in 1635, valuing the teinds of various lands therein described, and now belonging to the Appellant, an extract of that decree had been produced by the ancestor of the Appellant, in a process of augmentation of the minister's stipend in the year 1720: when it appeared, or was assumed, without objection on the part of the Heritor, that the word ascertaining the number of chalders at which the teinds of his lands were valued, had been obliterated by a fold in the paper, (or possibly left in blank:) and in that process consequently the lands were held as unvalued. Upon a similar process, in 1799, it was found by the Court that the valuation of the lands in question, in the decree of 1635, is not legible, and that, although the decree appears to have been intended as a valuation of the whole parish, and the lands belonging to the Appellant are set forth in the decree, the valuation annexed to them is totally obliterated. The same course was pursued, and with a similar result, in a process for augmentation in 1805. In 1814, upon a new process for augmentation, the Appellant as heritor having by his first defence admitted that the word appeared to be obliterated, afterwards produced evidence to show that the word supposed to be effaced was either ten or twa, and that no other word could have occupied the vacant space; and reports to that effect were made by men of skill and experience, in decyphering ancient and decayed instruments, to whom the inquiry was referred.

The original decree had perished among the records of the Teind Court, consumed by fire in the reign of Queen [42] Anne. The extract had remained in the possession of the Appellant and his ancestors.

Held, that the extract not being an original instrument in the possession of the law, but of the party claiming a right under it, whose duty it was to have supplied the defect under the provisions of the statute of Anne (1707), as to the records of the Teind Court destroyed by fire, conjectural evidence could not be admitted to supply the word supposed to be effaced.

Whether under the provision of the Scotch statute 1707, for "making up the tenor of decreets, whereof the extracts are amissing and the registers lost in the fire," the Lords of Session were empowered to receive evidence and supply the defects of an extract not missing, but imperfect and unavailable, on account of the obliteration of material words.—Quære.

Whether a defect by loss, erasure, or obliteration, in an instrument of gift or contract, if the proceeding to supply the loss, etc. were instituted recently after the accident, or the discovery of the defective state of the instrument, and where the party is not estopped by his own admission, and by former adjudications.—Quære, semb. affirm.

Where the substance of a question has been adjudged by former decisions, upon the admission or acquiescence of the party, costs are given upon the affirmance of a subsequent judgment on appeal.

The question in this Appeal arose out of a process raised by the Respondent for an augmentation of his stipend, as minister of Makerston. The following are the material facts upon which the decision turns:

The proprietor of an estate now held by the Appellant obtained by process before the Court of High Commission for the surrender of teinds in Scotland, a valuation of the teinds of his lands by a decree dated the 15th July 1635.

Of this decree an extract * was obtained by the proprietor of the land, from whom it was transmitted [43] to the Appellant. In this extract the numeral, ascertaining the number of chalders at which the lands were valued, had been effaced by the folding of the paper, or (possibly) had been from some cause originally left in blank. The extract, as produced in the process in the Court below, which is the subject of the present Appeal, appeared as follows:—

"They find and declare the just worth and yeirlie availl of the lands underwritten, pertening to the persones above and efter nominat, heritable, lyand within the said parochin of M'Kerston, to be in personage teind, the quantities of victuell underwritten of the qualities efter spect., ilk one of the saids heritors as follows: To witt, the landis, town, and maynis of M'Kairstoun, etc. with their pendicles and pertinentis pertening heritable to Sir W. McDougall, to be worth in personage teind chalderis victual, tua part cheritet heir, and thrid pairt heiper ait meill, all of the old mett and measour of Jedburgh. In the year 1720 a process of modification and locality of the stipend of the parish of Makerston was brought before the Lords of Council and Session, as commissioners for plantation of kirks, and valuation of teinds, in the course of which it became necessary to make up a state of the teinds of the parish, in order to show the extent of the fund liable in payment of stipend to the minister. The different heritors were accordingly required to produce the rights which they had to the teinds of their [45] respective lands. Upon this occasion, as appears from the records of the Teind Court, Henry MacDougall, of Makerston, the ancestor of the Appellant, produced, in presence of the said Lords, ane "decree of valuation, obtained before the said lords and others of the commission, for surrenders and teinds, upon the 15th day of July, 1635 years : whereby they found the just worth and constantly yearly avail of the lands under-written, pertaining to the persons after mentioned, lying within the said parish of Makerston, to be in personage tiend the quantities of victuals under-written, of the qualities after specified, viz. the lands, town, and mains of Makerston, Lintonlaw, Murdean, Nethermains, Manorhill, with their pendicles and pertinents pertaining, to Sir William MacDougall, of Makerston, knight, to be worth of parsonage tiends, ——— chalders victual, two part cheritet bear, and third part heipit oatmeal, all of the old mett and measour of Jedburgh," etc. The decree then proceeds to specify the lands of Stodrig, and four husband lands in Makerston, which are valued at two chalders, eight bolls : the three husband lands of Makerston, which are valued at nine bolls, and the lands of Charterhouse, which are valued at eight bolls.

In making up a scheme of the teinds of the parish on this process, the lands of Stodrig and others, where the decree of valuation was legible, were valued at the quantities of grain there specified : but in regard to the first parcel of lands mentioned in the decree, viz. the lands of mains of Makerston, etc. where the number of chalders of grain [46] corresponding to the teinds, had either originally been left blank, or had been accidentally obliterated, the teinds were held to be unvalued, and the stipend modified to the minister of the parish was allocated accordingly.

The stipend continued to be paid in terms of the decree of modification and locality of 1720, down to the year 1799, when the predecessor of the Respondent raised a new process of augmentation * and locality. Upon this occasion a rental was made

* According to the present forms, a process of augmentation is conducted thus :—The process is brought by the minister, as pursuer, against the proprietors of lands, the titular or lay impropiator of the teinds, and all others having right to teinds within the parish. The minister produces a rental of the parish, which is made up generally of the rents actually paid at the time. The first step to the process is to adjust that rental agreeably to the rights of parties. Those proprietors who have decrees of valuation of their teinds produce those decrees, or refer to them, if upon record : and they are rentalled agreeably to such valuations. Those having no decrees of valuation are rentalled agreeably to the rents actually paid at the commencement of the process, one fifth part of which is taken as the teind. After the rental is adjusted the minister exhibits the amount of the fund out of which augmentation may be made, and craves the Court to grant him a suitable addition to his stipend out of that fund, or to grant him the whole fund, when it is inconsiderable.

A decree of valuation made by the competent Court is conclusive as to the value of teinds. The person having right to such a decree has a right to have the stipend up in the usual way, which was approved of [47] by the Court; and in enumerating the lands belonging to the Appellant, it is stated that by decree of valuation, dated July 16, 1635, the lands after specified "were valued as under." The rental then specifies the lands of Stodrig, and four husband lands of Makerston, which are valued at two chalders, eight bolls; the three husband lands of Makerston, which are valued at nine bolls; and the lands of Charterhouse, which are valued at eight bolls. It then proceeds thus, "These are all the lands of which the valuation in the decree above mentioned is legible." The decree, however, seems to have been intended as a valuation of the whole parish, and it specifies, besides the above three articles, the lands, town, and mains of Makerston, Luntoulaw, Muirdean, Nethermains, and Manorhill, pertaining to Sir William MacDougal, of Makerston, knight; but the valuation annexed to these lands in the decree is totally obliterated." The rental then enumerates the different farms belonging to the Appellant, including as well those of which the valuations are especially mentioned in the decree, as those of which the valuation was illegible or omitted; and after the enumeration concludes thus,—"Of all the lands, the decree of valuation is effectual only quoad Stodrig, seven husband lands of Makerston, and Charterhouse." Upon this rental the heritors were held as confessed. It was approved of by the Lord Eskgrove, ordinary, and afterwards by the Court; and upon the proven rental the decree of augmentation was pronounced upon the 5th of June 1799.

The Respondent's predecessor instituted a second process of augmentation in 1805, which was ultimately dismissed, upon the ground of there not having been any such change of circumstances within so short an interval as to authorize a second augmentation; but the cause was prepared for decision in the usual way. A scheme of the rental was made up in common form; and in this scheme, (upon which the heritors, and among others the Appellant, Sir Henry Bay Macdougal, were held as confessed, and which was afterwards approved of by the Court,) the same statement is given as to the illegibility of the decree of valuation 1635, except in so far as regards the lands specially enumerated. The rental was accordingly made up in the same terms as the previous rental of 1799.

In the year 1811 the Respondent raised a process of augmentation and locality, in which the Court held the heritors as confessed upon the rental produced by the Respondent, and remitted to Lord Reston, Ordinary, to prepare the cause.

The Appellant, who is proprietor of the whole parish, with the exception of a small farm belonging to the Duke of Roxburgh, gave in objections to the rental exhibited by the Respondent, in which, after specifying the valuation of the three different parcels of land, which are contained in the decree 1635, he observes, "these are all the lands of which the valuation in the above decree is legible. The decree, however, was in fact a valuation of the whole parish, as it specifies, besides the above three articles, the lands, town, and mains of Makerston, Luntoulaw, Muirdean, Nethermains, and Manorhill, pertaining to Sir William Macdougal, of Makerston, knight, but the valuation annexed to these lands is totally obliterated."

[49] The Respondent lodged answers to these objections, which it is not necessary to state, as the Appellant, in his replies, abandoned the grounds of objection to the rental which he originally brought forward, and insisted that this decree (extract) must be held as a good and effectual decree of valuation of the teinds of the lands called Mains of Makerston, &c. as at ten chalders, two thirds beer, and one third part oatmeal.

The Respondent maintained that this part of the decree was altogether illegible, that the amount of valued teind might be taken just as well at any other supposed quantity as at ten chalders; and that it was impossible to supply this omission or obliteration in the decree.

The decree (extract) was produced to the Lord Ordinary at the bar. It appeared that there had been a fold in the document, which was written upon a single sheet, and a hole had been worn through the paper at the place where the word expressing the number should have occurred. The Lord Ordinary made a remit to Mr. John Dillon, writer in Edinburgh, and to Mr. James Miller, one of the teind clerks, who payable by him restricted to the amount of his valued teind—for this purpose he may at any time make a surrender to the minister of his valued teind, after which the minister can demand no more than the amount thereof.

were accustomed to examine old writings, "to examine the decree, and to depone as to their opinion of the disputed word therein."

In consequence of this remit, Messrs. Dillon and Miller made a report on oath upon the 1st of June 1815, in the following terms, as expressed by Mr. Dillon, and concurred in by Mr. Miller: "That he has, along with the said Mr. James Miller, read over and examined the decret of valuation of [50] teinds, shown to him, and marked as relative hereto; and particularly that part thereof which specifies the valuation of the town and mains of Makerston, Luntounlaw, Muirdean, Nether Mains, Manorhill, with their pendicles and pertinents: that the word which expresses the number of chalders payable out of these lands has become illegible, owing to a small part of the paper on which it was written being wasted away, occasioned, as appears to the Deponent, by the fold: That part of the first letter of the said number of chalders is visible: and, from comparison with the other parts of the decret, the deponent conceives that letter has been a capital T, as what remains of it, being the top stroke, agrees with the like stroke of other capital T's occurring on the same decret: That the space which the remainder of the word has occupied could not well contain more than two letters, and it is most probable the word was either twa or ten: but in the present state of the paper the deponent cannot take upon himself to say, from any thing that now appears on the face of the paper, which of these two words was originally written: but upon measuring with a pair of compasses, the space occupied by the word twa, in the third line below the word in question, it appears to be of the precise same extent as that word: That there is a chance that the application of infusion of galls may make some parts of the word more apparent, which the dimness of the ink, and bad colour of the paper, may at present conceal: but the success of the application is doubtful, because the substance of the paper [51] is gone where the most part of the word was written, and all that can possibly be made appear is only a small part of the letters, which may have reached that part of the paper which remains, and of which the deponent thinks some trace remains, but at present cannot be certain. And further depones, that having, in presence of the commissioner, applied infusion of galls to the word in question, nothing appears that enables him to say, with greater certainty than he has above deposed to, what that word originally was. And being interrogated, depones, that he does not think the word in question was either three or threttie, because he can observe no trace of the appearance of the down stroke of the letter h, which letter, throughout the whole Decreet, at least when it is medial, is almost constantly written with a down stroke coming below the line: That the only instance in said paper where an h appears without the down stroke, is when the words begins with th, in which case, the letters th are made in a sort of capitals, taking up a considerable space, and, by measurement with compasses, the space so taken up for these two letters alone would be more than the room left for it in the writing in question. Interrogated if it be his opinion that said word could be a contraction for twenty, depones, that he does not think it probable; for this reason, that it is not common in decreets of valuation of teinds to contract the numbers; and more especially, that, in the writing in question, which is written in a fair and uniform hand, there are throughout not a single contraction of a number, and therefore [52] it is not likely that the doubtful word would be the only exception. And on again examining the Decreet, the deponent does not find in it any word contracted besides M in Mackairston."

The Lord Ordinary afterwards took the case to Report, and appointed the parties to state their respective pleas in memorials. These memorials were accordingly submitted to the judge, who, upon the motion of the Appellant, allowed an additional report to be made by Messrs. Miller and Dillon: and also a report by Thomas Thomson, Esq. advocate, as to the state of this writing. The additional report by Messrs. Miller and Dillon was made on the 13th of February 1816, in the following terms: "We have again carefully examined the decree of valuation in question: and it appears that the solution of galls has had a further operation, more than it had when we formerly examined it, in so far as the colour of the ink, where it was applied, is now deeper: and, particularly, we can now discern what appears to be the remains of a stroke, which probably constituted part of the last letter of the word which occupied the place where the paper is worn away: and we are of opinion, after again carefully perusing the Decreet, and examining the forms of the letters in it, that the last letter of the word was more probably an n than any other we can conceive to have stood there; we are also of opinion that the first letter (which we suppose to have been a capital T) could not be an F, as we observe the form of the F is quite different from that of the T, wherever it occurs." Mr. Thomson reported, "I have examined the extract [53] of a decree of valuation of the teinds of that parish, dated July 15, 1635, produced in that process, and more particularly that part of the writing which is partly worn away, and which has been the subject of dispute between the parties; and I am of opinion that the word in question could not have consisted of more than three letters; that the first of these letters evidently enough has been a capital T; that the next letter is entirely obliterated, or rather, the paper on which it has been written is entirely worn away; that the last letter is very nearly in the same state, but that there does appear a small portion of it, which I am inclined to think from its form is more likely to have been the last limb of the letter n than of the letter a, or any other letter that can be supposed to have ended in y numerical word that could have stood in this place; and, without presuming to state it as any thing more than a probability, I am of opinion that the word is more likely to have been ten than two or two, the only two numerical words which I can conceive it possible to have stood in this part of the writing."

Upon these reports the Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the cause to the court.

The memorials were afterwards considered by the Court, with the aid of these additional reports, when the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lords having advised the memorials for the parties, and the minute for the pursuer, they sustain the objections made for the pursuer to the decree of valuation produced and founded on by the defender, [54] Sir H. H. MacDougall of Makerston, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to prepare a scheme of the rental accordingly, and to report."

Against this interlocutor the Appellant presented a reclaiming petition, in which he insisted, that the reports which had been obtained from the persons who had been appointed to examine this old writing afforded sufficient evidence that the obliterated word was either two or ten; that he was willing to take the numeral which was more favourable for the Respondent, and to hold the teinds of the lands in question as having been valued at ten chalders; and he therefore maintained that the decree should be so interpreted.

The Respondent having put in an answer, the Court, upon advising the petition and answer, adhered to their former interlocutor.

Against these judgments the appeal was presented.

For the Appellant, The Attorney General, and Mr. Wetherell.

Although part of the word in the extract of the decree has been obliterated, enough remains to afford conclusive evidence, that the word must have been ten or two. According to the reports of experienced men no other word could have been in the space worn away. The Appellant ought not to be deprived of his right by unavoidable accident, if the loss of more certain evidence can be supplied by probable conjecture.

In the analogous case of wills the Roman law [55] permitted such a defect to be supplied by any means whereby the will of the testator might be ascertained (Auct. Lib. 28, tit. 1, s. 2). In such cases, where instruments were lost or destroyed, recourse might be had to parol testimony (Mathæus de Probationibus, c. 3, s. 134).

The law of Scotland is the same as to instruments of gift or contract which have been lost, destroyed or effaced. In all which cases the Court allows the tenor to be proved.*

Here the proof is supplied by probable conjecture. According to the report of the inspectors no word could have occupied the obliterated space but ten or two, and the Appellant is willing to concede to the Respondent the insertion of the word most for his advantage. By inspecting the valuation of the lands in the parish, as it appears in the cess-books, it is ascertained that the proportion of value assignable to the Lands of Makerston, as compared with the other lands in the parish, and their proportion of teinds remaining legible in the decree, gives exactly ten chalders as the amount of Makerston. So that the conjecture of the reporters is fortified, if not rendered certain, by this calculation.

In former proceedings on this same question it has been taken for granted, that the word is illegible; but there has been no decision to that effect, nor any admission sufficient to exclude the Appellant [56] from now showing that the word is legible. The presumption arising from the experiments and examination, detailed in the reports, is sufficient to infer that certainty or strong probability, to which the text-writers refer (Ersk. B. 4, tit. 2, s. 34).

For the Respondent, Mr. Brougham, and Mr. W. Adam.

The burthen of proof lies upon the Appellant. It is for him to produce a perfect document to ascertain the value of his teinds. The defect of this indispensable word cannot be supplied by conjectural evidence.

The referees commence their report by admitting that the word is illegible. The question is thereby concluded. They cannot make it legible by any hypothesis, or any chain of hypotheses. The ground of their conjecture from fragments of lines and measuring of spaces is fanciful. The instrument has been in the possession of the heritors, and who knows how and when the marks now forming the basis of this conjecture came, or were put upon the paper. As to spaces, the writers of manuscript vary materially in their writing. Mr. Thomson, whose opinion is the clearest, will not presume to state it as more than a probability. If the horizontal line which furnishes the ground for the hypothesis was not discoverable in 1720, in 1799, or in 1805, the probability is, that it has grown upon the paper since one of those dates.

[57] As to the argument drawn from the comparison of the teinds with the cess, and the real rent, it is entirely against the Appellant. In the comparison of the cess he selects the lands of Charter House, which happen to answer his purpose. If he had tried a comparison with the other lands comprised in the decree, he would have found, that the result was adverse to his conjecture. So it appears also upon a comparison of the real rents with the teinds, which gives twenty or thirty chalders as the probable valuation of the teinds.

There is no precedent for supplying such a defect in a record or instrument by conjectural evidence. It is an accidental loss which must fall on the party who claims under it: * Bayley v. Garford.

The Lord Chancellor: The question upon this appeal is, whether the blank in the decree ought to have been considered as filled up with the word "ten:" Whether, upon inspection, or upon the result of the evidence produced in the cause, the Court of Teinds should have found that the instrument was perfect, and acted upon it as demonstrating the number of chalders of victual, which originally stood in the decree.

The instrument now produced is not the original record. It is an extract which comes out of the [58] possession of the party, who now insists that it ought to have the effect of a complete record. He therefore, or those under whom he claims, were bound to preserve the document in such a state as to manifest the right with reasonable certainty. The act which was passed in Scotland in 1707, for the valuation of teinds, reciting the loss of the registers of the Court of Teinds by fire, provides, "that authentic extracts from these records may be brought in;" (the authenticity of this extract is not disputed, the question turns upon the contents,) "and being presented to the Lords, be recorded in a particular register, and that the said extracts so brought in be kept by the Lord Clerk Register, etc. and be held as valid and authentic, as the principal warrants themselves, if the same were yet extant; and the Lord Register, and his deputies, are ordained to give a new extract, gratis, to every person that shall give in an old extract, etc.; and extracts from these new records shall make the like faith in judgment, and out-with the same as the extracts from the old registers of the commission were wont to do before they were burnt."

If indeed the extract here in question was as defective at the date of this statute, as it now appears to be, the giving a new extract copied from the old one would not have assisted the claim. But then a material question might have arisen, whether the

* March, 125, 2 Show. 29, S.C. Three were bound in a bond, jointly and severally: the seals of two were eaten by rats. As March reports the case, the Court were inclined that the bond was void against all. Shower cites it as adjudged that the bond was void.

Court were not authorized to inquire what were the contents of the original register; for, by the following clause of the act they were "empowered, upon such evidence, and as they should see cause, to [59] make up the tenor of such Deereets in manner above mentioned, whereof extracts are amissing, and the registers lost in the said fire." If this clause is to be considered, as providing only for the case of extracts from the burnt registers, which had been lost, it would be inapplicable to the case in discussion. But if such a construction may be put upon the words of the clause, as to authorize the Court to make up the tenor of the decree, where a word is missing or obliterated, then an application might have been made to the Court of Teinds, under this act of Parliament. It appears that in the process in 1720, this extract was produced, and considered to be unintelligible as to the lands in question.

The same thing has happened in two subsequent proceedings; and it is now to be considered, whether the proofs, in support of the instrument produced, furnish such a degree of certainty as to authorize a reversal of the judgment.

You cannot apply to the case of a document in the custody of a party the same principle of decision, as if the question related to a record in the keeping of the law. Considering, moreover, what has taken place with respect to this extract since the year 1720, it would be too hazardous to decide, upon the evidence now produced, that the obliterated word in the extract was "Ten;" and as the Court of Teinds has repeatedly held this extract to be unintelligible, the judgment ought to be affirmed with costs.

Lord Redesdale: The evidence produced in the cause is evidence to prove that some teinds of the [60] parish were valued, but is no proof as to the teinds in question. The valuation of those teinds might have been left in blank in the original decree: there is nothing to prove the contrary. In that case the decree had no operation as to these teinds. The act 1707 provided a remedy for the loss of the records of valuation; and it was the duty of all persons, who had an interest in preserving the records, to proceed without delay to establish their rights.

The persons, who in 1707 were entitled to the lands of the Appellant, ought to have brought their extract into the Court of Teinds, to have it recorded as evidence of their rights, if it was then perfect; or if any part of the extract was effaced by accident, to have supplied the defect by evidence. Such evidence then probably might have been adduced. Now it is difficult, if not impossible, to produce, and dangerous to admit, such evidence. If the right ever existed, it has been lost by the negligence of those who failed to claim it. A century has elapsed since the claim ought to have been presented; and this neglect furnishes a strong ground to presume, that they were incapable in 1707 of supplying the defect. The proceeding in 1720 called upon the party to supply the defect. Instead of doing so, it seems by acquiescence to be admitted, that the defect was incapable of being supplied. Can we at this distance of time supply the word by conjecture? The evidence which has lately been produced might equally have been offered to the Court in 1720. As the parties interested omitted to do so, we must presume that the defect [61] could not be supplied, which, in effect, they have admitted then, and in subsequent proceedings.

Die Veneris, 23 Feb. 1821.

Ordered, and adjudged, That the said petition and appeal be and the same is hereby dismissed this House; and that the interlocutor therein complained of be affirmed, with £200 costs.

IRELAND

FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Sir ROBERT LYNCH BLOSSE, bart. and FRANCIS LYNCH BLOSSE, his eldest Son, an Infant, by the said Sir ROBERT LYNCH BLOSSE, his Father, next Friend and Guardian. Appellants: The Right Hon. JOHN LORD CLANMORRIS and GEORGE RICHARDS, Esq., Respondents. 26th Feb. 1821.]

[Mews' Dig. iv. 1135; vii. 45; xiii. 1870; xiv. 1157. Cited (arg.) on point as to doubtful title in Howarth and Others v. Smith, 1833, 6 Sim. 161 at p. 166, and see Elliott v. Pott 1821, 3 Bl. at pp. 114, 115.]

LANDS being settled by H. upon the sons of R. successively in tail male, with divers remainders over, and the ultimate reversion to H. and his heirs. H. is attainted of high treason, and afterwards B. the issue in tail, being in possession under the limitations of the settlement, suffers a recovery. Whether it is effectual to bar the reversion vested in the Crown by the attainder.—Quære.

A TITLE, depending upon a recovery suffered by a Tenant in tail of lands, the reversion of which had vested in the Crown by attainder of the reversioner, is not such a Title as a purchaser is bound to accept.

A purchaser brought into Court upon a doubtful title ought to be discharged with costs.

Sir Henry Lynch, baronet, being seised in his demesne as of fee, of divers lands in the barony of Carra, in the county of Mayo, in Ireland, in the year 1684, granted and released the said lands to the [63] use of the first and other sons of Robert Lynch, severally and successively in tail male, with divers remainders over, with the ultimate limitation to the right heirs of Sir Henry Lynch.

After the date of this deed Sir Henry Lynch was attainted of high treason.

In the year 1779 Sir Henry Lynch Blossse became seised of the lands under the limitations of the deed, as tenant in tail male; and in Michaelmas Term 1779 suffered a common recovery of the lands to the use of himself in fee.

By his will, bearing date the 18th day of February 1788, Sir Henry Lynch Blossse gave certain legacies and annuities, to be raised by sale or mortgage of his lands in Ireland; and, subject thereto, he gave all his real estates in Ireland to the use of his nephew, the Appellant Sir Robert Lynch Blossse, for life, with divers remainders over.

Sir Henry Lynch Blossse died in February 1788, leaving the Appellant, Sir Robert Lynch Blossse, a minor.

During the minority of Sir Robert Lynch Blossse several of the incumbrances affecting the lands were paid off by his guardian, out of the savings of the estates; and Sir Robert Lynch Blossse himself, after he came of age, paid off more of the incumbrances with his own money. The securities were assigned to the Respondent George Richards, in trust for the Appellant Sir Robert Lynch Blossse.

In 1811 the Appellant, Sir Robert Lynch Blossse filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, in the name of George Richards, against himself, and the Appellant, Francis Lynch Blossse, [64] his eldest son and others, praying an account of the debts and legacies of Sir Henry Lynch Blossse, and that the same might be paid, or in default thereof, that a sale might be had of a competent part of the estates, for payment of the debts and legacies, pursuant to the trusts of the will.

In consequence of proceedings under the decree made in the cause, Brabazon Browne, in trust for the Respondent, John Lord Clanmorris, became the purchaser of several denominations of the lands. On the 17th of November 1815, by an order made in the cause, it was referred to the Master to inquire and report, whether a good title could be made out to the purchaser, and whether any and what act was necessary for that purpose.

On the 7th of December 1815 the Master reported that a good title in fee-simple could be made to the lands; and that the only acts necessary were to procure a certain judgment affecting the lands for £60,000, to be assigned to a trustee to protect Lord Clanmorris and the other purchasers. An objection was taken to this report on the part of the Respondent, Lord Clanmorris, upon the ground that, after the settlement made by the indentures, bearing date the 16th and 17th days of July, 1684, Sir Henry Lynch was attainted of high treason, whereby and by virtue of the several statutes in force in Great Britain and Ireland, the reversion in fee-simple, limited by the settlement to the right heirs of Sir Henry Lynch, became forfeited to and vested in the Crown, and could not have been effectually barred or destroyed by the common recovery suffered by Sir Henry Lynch [65] Blossse, and that therefore the said title was defective.

On the 3d of February 1816 an application was made to the Master of the Rolls, to set aside the report,* which was ordered, on the grounds of objection before stated.

The Appellants acquiesced in the last-mentioned order, and on the 10th of February, 1816, by an order made, on the application of the Appellants, it was referred to the Master in the cause, to inquire and report whether any and what acts were necessary to be done to make out a good and sufficient title; the Appellant, Sir Robert Lynch Blossse, undertaking to procure such report within a week; and if any acts were necessary to be done, it was further ordered that the said Master should report within what period of time the same ought to be completed, if reasonable diligence should be used, the solicitor for the Respondent undertaking to attend before the Master on the first summons.

In pursuance of this order the Master made his report on the 19th day of February, 1816, that a good and sufficient title could be made out to the Respondent, in case the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Treasurer of Ireland, by and with the consent of the chief governor of Ireland, should conceive themselves warranted to grant the reversion in fee of the said lands under and by virtue of the powers vested in them by the Act of the forty-sixth of George the Third, chap. 123;* [66] and if that could not be obtained, that a good title to the said lands could be made out to the Respondent, by means of a private Act of Parliament, to be obtained by the Appellants; and the Master further reported, that such grant or private Act of Parliament might be procured with reasonable diligence in the course of the then session of Parliament; and he further reported, that the Appellants, procuring a certain judgment for £60,000, to be assigned to a trustee to protect the said purchase, would secure the purchaser against any outstanding judgments that might remain unsatisfied.

This report was confirmed, and afterwards the Appellants appealed from the order of the 3d day of February, 1816, to the Lord Chancellor, who, by an order dated the 12th day of March 1816, refused the Appellants application, and affirmed the order.

The Appeal to the House of Lords was against the orders of the 3d of February, and the 12th of March 1816.

Against the order confirming the report of the 19th of February, 1816, there was no appeal.

For the Appellants, Mr. Wetherell, Mr. Shadwell (and Mr. Blake.)

The question in this case is, whether a reversion, after an estate-tail vesting in the Crown by attainder of the reversioner, can be barred by a common recovery suffered by the issue in tail when in possession. The Crown can only take the reversion subject to all its original properties and incidents. The King can take no more than the party by forfeiture lost.

[67] The reversion, while it belonged to the original reversioner before the attainder, was subject to the right of the tenant in tail, to be destroyed by a recovery.

Lord Redesdale: Is there any Irish statute similar to the English statute 34 Hen. 8, saving the rights of the Crown?

For the Appellants: There is not.† That statute has been held by construction to apply only to estates-tail created by the Crown (Co. Litt. 372, b.). The principle of that construction applies equally to remainders and reversions not flowing out of the Crown. A reversion vesting in the Crown by grant, subject to a condition, may be barred by the recovery of the tenant of a particular estate. Where the estate vests in the Crown by forfeiture, the same principle applies.§

† See Mr. Butler's note (323) to Co. Litt. 372, b.

‡ Chomley's case, Rep. 2, 52, and Moor, 342. In Coke's Rep. the case is put thus in one of the points resolved.

"A man makes a gift in tail, the remainder in fee; he in remainder grants his remainder to another for life; the remainder to the queen in fee, upon condition, ut supra, tenant in tail suffers a common recovery; if this recovery shall bar the estate of tenant for life in remainder, and the condition also, is the question. And it was resolved, that the recovery doth bar, not only the estate-tail, but also the estate for life, although the remainder of the fee was in the queen; par. t. 1. c. 1. f. the stat. of 34 H. 8, c. 26, because the estate-tail was not of the queen's estate, etc. fo. 52. "And by operation of law, the estate for life being defeated, the remainder to the Queen, which depends upon it, shall be defeated also," fo. 53.

§ See Nicholles v. Nicholles, Plowden, 481, 486; and Walsingham's Case, Id. 552, 3.

[68] Lord Redesdale: Have you considered the effect of the statute de donis,* as to reversions in the Crown: how far the principles on which the Courts have permitted parties to suffer recoveries of estates-tail, and reversions upon them, affect the Crown? It must be argued, on authority: there is no intelligible principle.†

For the Appellant: The effect of the statute de donis ought to be the same as to the King and private persons. Can it be contended that a reversion vesting in the King by the felony of the reversioner, or upon a conveyance by the most remote remainder-man, would deprive the tenant in tail of his right to bar the reversion by a recovery?

How does a recovery operate? By enlarging the estate-tail into a fee. If therefore the recovery bar the estate-tail, it ought to bar the remainders over, and reversions also, of which the fee-simple is composed. A recovery puts the estate-tail under the statute, in the same situation as the alienation by the donee in tail after issue born put the gift in [69] tail before the statute de donis. The decision in the great case upon the validity and effect of recoveries, rests expressly upon this principle, that "he who claims by another cannot be in a better estate of right than he through whom he claims."‡

For the Respondents, the Attorney General and Mr. Horne.

It is fully established, that a remainder or reversion vested in the Crown, and expectant on an estate-tail, cannot be barred by a common recovery suffered by the tenant in tail.§ If that point were doubtful, yet, according to the rules of a Court of Equity, a purchaser is not compelled to accept a title subject to a serious doubt as to its validity.

The Lord Chancellor, after stating the facts and [70] proceedings in the case, observed, that there was no appeal against the order confirming the last report: which might create a difficulty as to further proceedings, if the judgment upon the other orders should be reversed.

The question was, whether a reversion vested in the Crown by forfeiture, and not by original grant, could be barred by a recovery: whether the doctrine of law upon that point could be stated to be so clearly against the Crown that a purchaser

* 13 Ed. 1. In Magdalen College, Case, 11 Rep. 72, etc. it is resolved, that the stat. de donis binds the King, although he is not named, because it is a remedial statute. By parity of reason, the statute of fines, 4 and 5 Hen. 7, c. 24, binds the King where the estate-tail is not of his gift, etc. But whether the practice of his courts, as to recoveries, which has in effect repealed the statute as to gifts by a subject, can affect the King's right to a reversion vested in him by grant, bonâ fide, or by operation of law, quære. ought to be compelled to take an estate with such a title. That the law as to estates-tail, under the stat. 34th Hen. VIII, was clear and settled: but not so with respect to such a reversion as now was in question. That he could not advise the House, sitting as a court of equity in appeal, to hold a purchaser to the contract in a case, where it could not be stated as a matter free from doubt, whether the reversion had been barred by the recovery; and as the purchaser had been brought into Court upon a doubtful title, he ought to be discharged with costs.

Lord Redesdale: That a reversion vested in the Crown, but not reserved upon a gift by the Crown, may be barred by a recovery, there is no authority but in one loose report,* which is contradicted by [71] every other case. The case in Rolfe's Abridgment (394, l. 2) is decisive on the point. Pigott,† in one passage, treats it as a disputable point at common law. Cruise‡ seems to understand the law on this subject, as it is laid down in Rolfe, and refers to the practice of divesting the reversion of the Crown by act of parliament, to enable the tenant in tail to make an effectual recovery. The practice is important as evidence of the state of the law. General opinion is certainly against the title. In this case it is not necessary to come to any precise decision on the point. It is sufficient, on the question now before the House, if the law be doubtful. A purchaser has a right to require a marketable title: and this title, it must be admitted, rests on a point of law which at least is doubtful. This being so, the purchaser who has been obliged to keep his money in readiness, and deprived of the opportunity of vesting it in another purchase, has been hardly used, and is entitled to his costs. The proceeding in the Court below, of setting aside the report is extraordinary practice.

26th Feb. 1821. It appearing to the Lords that the title offered to the Respondent, Lord Clannorris, at the date of the Report of the 7th December 1815, was not such a title as a purchaser was bound to accept under the circumstances stated, etc.: It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the said petition and appeal be dismissed, and that the said orders therein complained of, be affirmed with £250 costs.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION, SECOND DIVISION.

JOHN DINGWALL,—Appellant; The Reverend GEORGE GARDINER,

Respondent [2d March 1821].

[3 Scots R.R. 623. See Gardiner v. Dingwall, 1823, 2 Shaw, 409; Dingwall v. Gardiner, 1825, 4 ib. 216. Considered in Elgin (Magistrates of) v. Gathorne, 1841, 4 Dunlop, 25, at pp. 31, 32, 31.]

The Scotch statute of the 1st Parl. of Charles II. sess. 3, c. 21, provides that where competent manse are not already built, the heritors, etc. shall build competent manse to their ministers, the expenses thereof not exceeding one thousand pounds (£83 6s. 8d. sterling), and not being beneath five hundred marks; and where competent manse are already built, ordains that the heritors shall relieve the minister of all charges for repairs, declaring that the manse, being once built and repaired, etc. by the heritors, they shall be up-holden by the incumbent ministers during their possession, or by the heritors out of the stipend in time of vacancy.

In this latter Case the question was, whether the estate-tail was barred by a fine. According to the note in Hardres, it was adjudged in the C. P., upon advice with all the other Judges and Barons, that after a conveyance and regrant, a reversion in the Crown might be barred by tenant in tail of the gift of the Crown or the issue; and the case is cited in Pigott, 90. On this point, see the dict. of Street, Baron, arg. pro, 2 Shower, 109, ad finem, and Sir Tho. Jones, 254, contra.

† Recov. 85, see the passage ante, p. 69, note. ‡ Recov.

Up to the year 1760 the sum allowed for building manse, upon litigation in the Courts Ecclesiastical and of Session, had not exceeded the amount specified in the statutes, except in cases where the heritors consented. But from the year 1760, it had been the practice in both courts, without the consent of the heritors, to grant much larger sums.

In 1814, the Respondent applied to the Presbytery to ordain the heritors to build a new manse, which was decreed accordingly, upon an estimate of the Respondent, amounting to £1214. The question being brought before the Court of Session, £1000 sterling was finally decreed for building a new manse. The question upon the construction of the act, whether expense of building was not limited to one thousand pounds Scots, had been adverted to, but not insisted upon, by the Appellant in his pleas before the Presbytery or the Lord Ordinary, but only before the Court of Session in the last stage of the proceedings. The point raised, discussed in the former stages of the cause, was, whether £1214 or £700, or any intermediate sum, should be allowed.

Held, that the case fell within the clause of the statute which relates to the repairing of manse, and not within [73] the clause as to the building of manse; and with this finding the judgment below was affirmed.

Whether a custom, beginning in 1760, can abrogate or control a Scotch Act of Parliament, quære?

The defender, by his pleadings in the first instance, having taken issue upon the sum necessary to build a competent manse, and not having then insisted upon the limitation of the statute (sensu.) had waved the objection arising out of the statute; but having finally, in a reclaiming petition, insisted upon that objection, which the Court referred to the Lord Ordinary as a point not before argued, and the pursuer not having objected or appealed against the interlocutor, by which this reference was made, the right to insist upon the objection was restored.

By the Scotch act of the first parliament of Car. II. 3d sess. c. 21, it is recited and provided as follows: "And because, notwithstanding of divers acts of parliament made before, diverse ministers are not yet sufficiently provided with manse and glebes, and others do not get their manse free at their entry, therefore our Sovereign Lord, with advice foresaid, statutes and ordains, That where competent manse are not already built, the heritors of the parish, at the sight of the bishop of the diocese, or such ministers as he shall appoint, with two or three of the most knowing and discreet men of the parish, build competent manse to their ministers, the expenses thereof not exceeding one thousand pounds, and not being beneath five hundred merks: and where competent manse are already built, ordains the heritors of the parish to relieve the minister and his executors of all costs, charges and expenses for repairing the foresaid manse: Declaring hereby, that the manse [74] being once built and repaired, and the building and repairing satisfied and paid by the heritors in manner foresaid, the said manse shall thereafter be upholden by the incumbent ministers during their possession, and by the heritors in time of vacancy, out of the readiest of the vacant stipend."

In the year 1814 the Respondent, who is minister of the parish of Aberdour in Aberdeenshire, made an application to the Presbytery of Deer, within which the parish lies, setting forth that his manse was in a ruinous condition, and praying that it might be inspected, and that the heritors of the parish might be ordained to build a new one; and at the same time he produced a plan of the proposed house and offices, with an estimate of the expense, amounting to £1200.

The Appellant, who is proprietor of the greater part of the parish, objected to the plan as extravagant, stating, that although the presbytery could not legally subject the heritors to the payment of any sum beyond what was mentioned in the act of parliament, yet, considering how inadequate that sum was in the present times, he was willing to forego the plea, and would consent to a sum being assessed equal to what had been expended in erecting manse in some neighbouring parishes of much greater extent than Aberdour; and he produced a plan of what he considered a sufficient manse, with an estimate of the expense, amounting to between £700 and £800.

The Respondent rejected this proposal: and after an inspection and report by a mason and a carpenter, [75] to whom the matter had been referred, the Presbytery gave their decree against the heritors for £1214 11s. 10d. sterling.

The Appellant complained of the decree to the Court of Session by bill of suspension, which was passed; and the matter came to be discussed before the Lord Pitmilley as Ordinary.

On the 16th of February the Lord Ordinary made avizandum to himself, etc.; and on the 24th lodged a note in process, by which he states, that "having considered the plans in process, there is no question about repairing or adding to a manse already built. It seems admitted that a new manse and offices must be erected, and the point to be determined is, whether the plan produced by the minister should be adopted, etc."

On the 1st March 1815, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor: "Having heard parties procurators, before answer, remits to Mr. Laing, architect, to inspect the plans, specifications, and estimates produced, to consider the objections to each which have been stated in the extracted decree of the Presbytery, and to report."

Mr. Laing accordingly made a report on the merits of the several plans, in which he stated, that the sums allowed by the Presbytery exceeded any he had ever heard of being allowed for building a manse and offices.

The Lord Ordinary made avizandum to himself with the report, and thereafter pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lord Ordinary having considered the report of Mr. Laing, and heard Mr. Laing along with [76] the counsel of the parties thereon, of new remits to Mr. Laing with instructions to adopt either of the plans in process, or to make such alterations as he shall think proper; or, if preferable, to make a new plan: the expense of whichever plan to be adopted not to exceed £1000 sterling, exclusive of the old materials."

Against this interlocutor the Appellant having offered a representation, it was refused by the Lord Ordinary.

In all the discussions before the presbytery and the Lord Ordinary, the question turned upon the amount of the sum to be expended in the erection of the manse, etc., the Appellant admitting that it was reasonable, and had been the practice, with the consent of the heritors, to exceed the sum specified in the statute as the maximum to be expended in erecting a manse, and consenting to allow £800 for the purpose; but at the same time referring generally to the objection arising under the words of the statute.

Against the final interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary the Appellant presented his petition to the whole Court, reclaiming against the interlocutor, and praying even to suspend the letters simpliciter, and to find that the expense of the manse and offices, so far as leviable from the heritors, could not exceed £1000 Scots; or at any rate to remit to the Lord Ordinary to find, that the sum to be expended should not exceed £750, granted of consent of the heritors.

On hearing this petition the Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties thereupon, in [77] respect that the plea stated in the prayer thereof, that the expense of the manse and offices leviable from the heritors should not exceed £1000 Scots, had not been discussed before the Lord Ordinary.

The Respondent having given in to the Lord Ordinary an answer, the following interlocutor was pronounced:

"The Lord Ordinary having considered this petition, with the answers thereto, and whole process, finds, that by the act 1663, c. 21, the heritors of parishes are ordered to build competent manses for their ministers, and that this express provision of the statute, under the authority of which alone new manses can be built, could not in the present day be complied with if the expense of the building were to be limited to the sums of money mentioned in the act of parliament, which, with a view to the expense of building at the date of the act, was fixed at £1000 Scots, as the maximum, and five hundred marks as the minimum: Finds, that the clause in the statute which provides that where manses are already built, the heritors shall relieve the minister of the expense of repairing them, does not limit the amount, and that these repairs therefore must frequently in the present day exceed the expense of building a new manse as fixed in the act, although it must evidently have been the intention and understanding of the act that the expense of repairing an old manse should be much less than the expense of building a new one, and that it should be for the interest of the heritors to repair rather than to build, while the reverse would be the case if the [78] construction put upon the statute by the petitioners were adopted: Finds, that the usage to this effect is not only uniform and long established, but was sanctioned by the Court in the case referred to by the Respondent of the minister of Inverury (see note at end of case), after the point was litigated by one of the heritors: Refuses the desire of the petition, and adheres to the interlocutor reclaimed against."

Against this interlocutor the Appellant presented a reclaiming petition to the whole Court, which was refused. And a second petition against the former interlocutor, praying an alteration, and that the Court would suspend the letters simpliciter, and find that the sum mentioned in the statute could not be legally exceeded, was also refused.

For the Appellant, Mr. C. Warren, and Mr. J. P. Grant.

On the part of the Appellant, it was contended, that the act 1663 was a temporary measure: that the act was not applicable to the case of rebuilding when the manse once built has become ruinous, or to a second repair at the expense of the heritors.

That although the institutional writers on the law of Scotland construed this statute as a subsisting and perpetual law, authorizing the presbyteries, in place of the bishop, to take cognizance of the state of manses, and to subject the heritors in the expense of repairing or rebuilding under the control of the Court of Session; yet every writer who touches on the subject is agreed that the power of the Presbytery is restrained to the sum mentioned in [79] the statute (£1000 Scots) as the maximum for building*.

That the inadequacy of the sum which the statute allows might afford a ground for application to the legislature for enlarging it, but could afford no reason for the church courts usurping a power of assessing the subject at their discretion.

When a sum was limited, beyond which the heritors could not be assessed, for building a new manse, and at the same time they were subjected to the expense of repairs without an express limitation, the reasonable interpretation of the statute is, that the cost of repairs could not go beyond the cost of building. If, immediately after the passing of the act, the Presbytery or the Bishop had decreed the heritors to pay a sum beyond the £1000 for repairing an old manse, while necessarily confessing that they were limited to that sum for building one entirely new, it seems impossible that the courts of law could have given their sanction to such a decree: and Lord Stair accordingly considers the limitation to apply equally to repairs and building.

The Appellant is not called upon to show that the statute is consistent. He admits that there ought to be a new law on the subject, to correspond with the present state of society.

The legislature, when limiting the expense of the original building, could not mean that the expense of repairing or rebuilding should be unlimited.

The Appellant denies that any practice can justify [80] the disregarding a clear act of parliament in such a case as the present. If the heritors were under an obligation to provide competent or suitable manses by the common law, or independent of the act 1663, it might be argued that that act had become obsolete, or had been departed from, and that therefore the common-law obligation might be resorted to. But the common law is here out of the question, there being no such obligation but by force of the statute. If that statute is obsolete, there is no authority to assess the heritors in any sum whatever.

It is true that Presbyteries have taken upon them to exceed the sum limited by the act of parliament, and that the Court of Session has lent its sanction to their doing so, it being felt that the sum mentioned in the statute had been extremely inadequate: but those interested were considered as tacitly consenting, till very lately, that it has been done avowedly and against their will. The industry of the Respondent or his counsel has discovered one solitary case, occurring in the year 1760, which the interlocutor alludes to, where one of the heritors did plead the act of parliament unreasonably, the sum decreed for being extremely moderate; and the Court appear somehow or other to have got over the plea: but this case, so far from being considered as consistent with law, or as settling the law, has never been reported or mentioned as an authority by any writer. In the second edition of Erskine's Institutes, published several years after this decision, no notice is taken of it; but, on the contrary, the rule of the statute 1663 is laid down broadly, as the law by which Presbyteries are bound to proceed.

[81] The judgment in the present case seems inconsistent in principle with that given by the Court in the case of the minister of Dunbar (15 May 1811). The statute on which the present question arises also enacts, that the minister besides his glebe shall have pasture land for a horse and two cows; and if there be no pasture land in the parish as distinguished from arable, there shall be paid to the minister in lieu of it the sum of £20 Scots. In the parish of Dunbar there was found to be no pasture land in the sense of the statute; and the minister arguing, as in the present case, that the sum specified in the act was totally inadequate, and instancing that the Court had in practice disregarded the limitation with regard to manse, prayed that they would do the same, by awarding compensation in money in lieu of pasture, computing what would be sufficient, according to the modern rate, to maintain the cattle specified in the act: but the Court, holding themselves bound to follow the direction of the statute, declared that they had no power to go beyond its strict letter.

For the Respondents, The Attorney General and Mr. H. Stephen.

On behalf of the Respondents the argument was to the following effect:

At the Reformation the clergy were deprived of a part only of their revenues; and, therefore, at first a certain part only of the burden of building churches was imposed upon laymen. By the act of Privy Council 1563, it was provided that two parts of the [82] expense thereof be made by the parishioners, and a third part by the parson, who then was not a stipendiary minister, such as all the clergy of Scotland now are, but a parson in the proper sense of word, viz. a beneficiary having a right to the tithes of his parish.

With regard to manse, by an act of Parliament (1563, c. 72.) it was provided that ministers serving at kirks should have "the principal manse of the parson or vicar;" or, if the manse and glebe was set in feu or in tack, it was enacted that "ane reasonable and sufficient house be bigged to them, beside the kirk."

After episcopacy was restored in the reign of James VI., it was thought just that the old law should be revived, throwing the burden of repairing and upholding manse upon the beneficed clergy; and accordingly the act 1612, c. 8, was passed, which speaks of "archbishops, bishops, and others, ecclesiastical persons;" but it is plain from the purposes of the act, as well as from the period when it was framed, that beneficed persons only were meant; and hence it is denominated in the rubrick, "An act anent repairing of bishops manse."

On this footing the law stood till the abolition of episcopacy in the reign of Charles I. By the act 1641, c. 30, (afterwards rescinded,) it was provided that the stipends of ministers should be modified out of bishops' tithes, as well as out of other tithes. By another act passed about the same period, patronage was abolished; and, in lieu of this right taken from patrons, all the unappropriated tithes were bestowed upon them. In this way the whole clergy of [83] Scotland became stipendiaries; and having become stipendiaries, it was thought just that the burden of building and repairing manse should be thrown entirely upon heritors. This was specially provided by the rescinded acts 1644, c. 31, and 1649, c. 45; and the enactment in the latter statute was, after the Restoration, revived almost verbatim by the act 1662, c. 21.

The Appellant has argued that the question at issue is not whether the burden of manse should be again transferred to the clergy, but to what extent it shall be imposed upon a particular class of the laity; and has maintained that it was by the titulars or lords of erection, and not by the heritors at large, that the spoils of the church were acquired. That the heritors at large did not obtain the whole spoils of the church is very true; but in acquiring the privilege of valuing and purchasing their tithes, heritors certainly shared in a very important part of those spoils. But the point at issue must be regulated by the statutes, according to the interpretation which has been put upon them by long usage, and by express decisions.

The limitation of the statute 1663 was only meant to apply to those parishes which had no manse built at the date of the statute, and which were to be immediately built. The sum was fixed upon as the maximum in those cases, because at that period a good manse might have been built for the sum of £1000 Scots.

In that part of the enactment which devolves upon heritors the burden of repairing manses there is no limitation of any sum. Heritors are required to [84] relieve ministers "of all costs, charges and expenses for repairing of the foresaid manses: " Under the authority of this part of the statute, the courts in Scotland have a power of ordering a manse to be repaired to an indefinite extent; and can it be supposed that the legislature could mean that more than £1000 Scots might be given for repairing a manse, and yet that no more than this sum should be allowed where it was necessary wholly to rebuild it? Even speaking of manses which were to be rebuilt, the legislature says that they shall be "competent manses," that is, they should be suitable to the respective benefices: whereby it virtually enacted that the sum to be allowed must vary with the expense of the building; and it follows that as soon as the supposed sum became inadequate, from a rise in the materials for building, or a fall in the value of money, the courts who had jurisdiction in this matter were entitled to increase the estimated value according to such a change of circumstances.

In interpreting acts of Parliament, all writers on the law of Scotland agree that a certain latitude is given to judges (Ersk. Inst. b. 1. tit. 1. s. 52, 53. Inst. 1. 17, 18, 24, 28).

This being a remedial statute must receive a liberal interpretation. The words founded upon by the Appellant are evidently contrary to the spirit of the enactment, and even to the words used in the very same statute, which immediately precede those which have been quoted. Supposing the words used conveyed a doubtful meaning, that construction must [85] be adopted which accords best with the real object of the legislature.

But this strict construction of the act is contrary to the practice both of the church judicatories and of the courts of law, and the express judgments of the Court of Session.

So long as a competent manse could be built for £1000 Scots, this sum was not exceeded. For nearly a century after the date of the act 1663, there was little diminution in the value of money, or rise in the price of materials employed in building manses. This appears from the price of grain remaining stationary till about the middle of the last century, £100 Scots the chaldier being the conversion price of grain at the date of the act 1663; and this was not merely the Court conversion, but seems to have been much about the real price during the first half of last century.

From the date of the act 1663, downward, to about 1750, it appears that £1000 Scots continued to be the sum usually allowed by the Court for building a manse; and, until that period, competent manses could generally be built for that sum, partly in consequence of the low price of labour and materials, and partly from the very humble buildings which were then allowed to the clergy: for not only were these very small, both in the number and in the dimensions of the rooms, but the walls were frequently built with clay instead of lime. About the year 1750, the expense of building appears to have risen; and as other ranks of people began to live in better houses, it was natural that the clergy [86] should look also for some melioration in their habitations. At first, however, it appears the Court did not venture to exceed the £1000 Scots, unless there was a consent of the heritors: but in the year 1760, the power of the Court to exceed that sum was fully discussed, and terminated in a judgment in favour of the minister.

The question occurred in the case of the minister of Inverury (see note at end of case). This decision was probably the origin of the practice which has prevailed so long both in the ecclesiastical judicatories, and in the Court of Session in Scotland, of awarding to clergymen such sum as would give them competent manses, without regard to the pecuniary maximum mentioned in the act 1663.

It is a maxim of law universally acknowledged, that "as one statute may be explained by another, it may also be explained by the uniform practice of the community, for which reason custom is said to be the surest interpreter of law" (Ersk. b. 1, tit. 1, s. 45.)

It is an express rule of Scotch law, that a statute may be entirely deviated from and lose its power by custom. This is laid down by Lord Stair (B. 1, tit. 1, s. 16. Inst. l. 37, de Legib.). "In the next place our statutes, or our acts of Parliament, which in this are inferior to our ancient law, that they are liable to disuse which never encroaches on the other. In this we differ from the English, whose statutes of Parliament, [87] of whatever antiquity, remain ever in force till they be repealed, which occasions to them many sad debates (public and private) upon old forgotten statutes."

The same doctrine is laid down by Lord Bankton (B. 1, tit. 1, s. 60). He says, our municipal law "further consists of our statutes or acts of Parliament; to those, no doubt, former laws or ancient customs must yield, but with this limitation, that laws here, before the Union, relating to private rights, are not to be altered by the British Parliament, but for the evident utility of the subjects within Scotland. Many of our old statutes have run in disuse, a contrary usage for a long course of time acquiesced to by the law-givers, being a tacit abrogation of them; and this is expressly declared to be the law with us by our old statute."

In like manner Erskine (B. 1, tit. 1, s. 45) states, that "as a posterior statute may repeal or derogate from a prior, so a posterior custom may repeal or derogate from a prior statute, even though that prior statute should contain a clause forbidding all usages that might tend to weaken it, for the contrary immemorial custom sufficiently presumes the will of the community to alter the law in all its clauses, and particularly in that which was intended to secure it against alteration; and this presumed will of the people operates as strongly as their express declaration."

Although, therefore, the Appellant could make [88] out that the act of Parliament was once imperative with respect to the sum to be allowed for building manse, yet the Respondent, in virtue of these authorities, would be entitled to argue that this part of the act has lost its force by contrary usage.

Supposing the words of the statute to be doubtful, they have received an interpretation by express decisions and long-continued practice. The Duke of Hamilton v. Scott.*

As to the acts respecting bail in criminal matters, to which the act in question has been assimilated, [89] there is a wide difference between the cases. The act of 1701 gave no power to magistrates to exact "competent" bail; but fixes precise sums, which no authority short of that of the legislature could exceed. Criminal statutes must in all cases be strictly interpreted. The act 1701, with respect to bail, has not been deviated from in relation to the sum specified, either by the decisions of the Court or by a contrary practice.

In the cases before the House of Lords, respecting second augmentations of

* The question there was, whether a minister, whose manse had been once repaired, was entitled to demand farther repairs from the heritors? The heritors founded upon a clause in the same act of Parliament, 1663, c. 21, in support of their argument, that after a manse had been once repaired, the burden of upholding it should fall upon the incumbent. The minister (Mr. Scott) pleaded, that although this argument received some countenance from the words of the act of Parliament, yet it was quite contrary to the spirit of the enactment, and that a different construction had been put upon the statute for a long period. It was said by the Lord Chancellor, in moving the judgment, that he "agreed that the legislature meant, by the act of 1663, that when the manse should have been once built or repaired, the burden of upholding them should rest on the ministers. But it had not been so construed; and when a different construction had been for so long a time put upon it, and acted upon, especially considering the effect of desuetude, as connected with the Scotch acts, they were not now to go back nearly two centuries to give it a new construction. The statute, as it had been construed, was now to be taken as the law." Accordingly the judgment of the Court of Session finding Mr. Scott entitled to a certain sum, for additional repairs to his manse and offices, was affirmed D. P. July 13, 1813.

ministers stipends, the argument of the heritors was founded upon the special words of the decreets arbitral of Charles I. and of the relative acts of Parliament; and the answer made on the part of the clergy was, that supposing the argument to be well-founded, it was overturned by the invariable practice of the Court in granting first augmentations after the Union: and that if the Court had power to augment a stipend once which had been modified during the time of Charles I. it had power to augment more than once. It was upon this ground principally that the judgments by the House of Lords were founded (see the cases of Kirkden, Tingwall, and Preston-kirk, D. P.). The rule of the Court of Session in refusing to grant second augmentations was objected to as a recent practice, which could not be put in competition with the prior inveterate usage. The issue of these cases, therefore, so far from being favourable to the argument of the Appellant, is directly the reverse; for the judgments were founded entirely upon the force of usage to explain express laws of a doubtful nature, or [90] rather to explain laws which were generally thought to be unfavourable in the very words.

In the case of Dunbar the question was, whether a minister was entitled to ask more than £20 Scots, (the sum fixed by the act 1663,) in lieu of a grass-glebe where land could not be given. The claim of the minister rested upon very different grounds from those on which the present claim stands: 1st, The act of Parliament does not provide, as it does with respect to manse, that ministers shall in all cases have "competent" grass glebes; 2d. The practice of the Court with respect to grass-glebes was precisely the opposite way from what it had been in relation to manse, for from the date in 1663 down to 1811, the date of the Dunbar case, the Court had not in any one case given more than £20 Scots in lieu of a grass-glebe.

The objection now pleaded by the Appellant was discussed in the House of Lords, and repelled in a case decided in the year 1786.*

* This was a case respecting the manse of the parish of Lethindy. The old manse had been ruinous, and a new one became necessary. The Presbytery pronounced a judgment, whereby they decreed that the heritors should build a new manse, and approved of a plan and an estimate of the expense, amounting to £210 sterling. One of the heritors, Mr. Mercer, of Lethindy, who was proprietor of nearly three fourths of the lands in the parish, carried the cause to the Court of Session, and pleaded that a manse might be built sufficient for the parish for a smaller sum; but did not maintain the argument, that no more than £1000 Scots could be allowed. The Lord Ordinary approved of the plan which had been adopted by the Presbytery; but after some proceedings both before the Lord Ordinary and the Court, an inquiry was ordered to be made as to whether this plan could not be executed for a smaller sum. Thereafter he found that it might be executed for £195 10s. sterling, which was about £15 less than the sum allowed by the Presbytery.

Mr. Mercer then carried the cause by appeal to the House of Lords, and he maintained four "reasons" of appeal, the first of which is stated thus in his appeal case: "Because by the act of Parliament above recited, passed in 1663, it is enacted, that the heritors shall provide and build manses for the ministers, and that the expense thereof shall not exceed £1000 Scots, and not beneath 500 marks; and that this is a positive statute which must be binding in all cases, and over which the Court of Session neither have nor ought to have any discretionary power whatsoever, either to exceed the maximum, or to go below the minimum; but in the present case, the Court of Session have decreed a sum for rebuilding this manse, greatly more than double the maximum allowed by law, three fourths of which falls upon the Appellant in respect of his property within the parish; and therefore he has a right to object, and does contend, that the sum to be allowed for the purpose ought not to exceed one thousand pounds Scots, the maximum allowed by the statute above mentioned."

To this reason of appeal the following answer is made in the appeal case for the minister:—"This plea made its appearance for the first time in the appeal; it was not stated in the Presbytery, or in the Court of Session, and consequently is inadmissible here. It will not be believed that such a bar to the proceedings would have been omitted, had not the Appellant and his counsel been satisfied of its being groundless. It is well and long established, that the act 1663, in circumscribing [91] The Lord Chancellor: This is a question of great importance to the heritors and clergy of Scot-[92]land; and it will be unfortunate if the main question in the cause cannot be decided upon this appeal.

The principle upon which the act of parliament is to be construed is the first question of difficulty. Looking at the admissions in the bill of suspension, it might have been difficult to contend that this point made upon the construction of the act had not been waived. But the Respondent seems to have restored the right to make that defence, by not objecting to the interlocutor of the Court of the 12th June 1815, which remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary on that point. So it seems that question is still open. Whether all the findings of the Lord Ordinary can be adopted in case of affirmance, it is difficult to say. It will be necessary to look with care at the statute, to determine what ought to be the construction as applied to circumstances.

The Lord Chancellor: As we find it to be necessary to alter some of the declarations of the interlocutor of the Court of Session, the proposal of the minutes of judgment in this case must be postponed. The interlocutor states several propositions of law not necessary to be decided in this [93] case. Experience confirms the truth of that which is apparent in theory, that it is inconvenient and dangerous to incorporate in judgment doctrines of law which are not called for by the circumstances of the case. It will be proposed, on moving the judgment, to narrow the finding of the interlocutor; but to sustain the judgment in effect, with some observations on the question of costs.*

March 2, 1821. The Lords, etc. find, That this case ought to be considered as falling within the meaning of that clause in the statute 1663, c. 21, which relates to the repairing of manse, and not within the clause which relates to the building of manse, where manse had not been then already built: And it is ordered and adjudged, that with this finding, the said interlocutors of the 11th March 1815, and the 11th May 1815, and so much of the interlocutor of the 10th January 1816, as refuses the desire of the petition of the Appellant, and adheres to the interlocutor reclaimed against, be affirmed: And it is further ordered and adjudged, That the said several other interlocutors be affirmed, with £100 costs.

[94] The following account of the case of Laverury, mentioned in the text, p. 86, is taken from the records of the Kirk session of that parish, where the proceedings are preserved:—

The Presbytery of the bounds having given a decree to the minister for a new manse in the usual form, letters of horning were raised upon this decree, and a charge was given to the heritors. Of this charge, one of the heritors, Mr. Leith, of Black-hall, presented a bill of suspension. His reasons of suspension were, 1st, That the manse was appointed to be built upon some grounds belonging to the Earl of Kintore, which was possessed under a strict entail: 2d, That the manse, according to the plan approved of by the Presbytery, was too large in point of dimensions, and would exceed the sum of £1000 Scots, which was the maximum allowed by the act 1663. The reasons for suspension came to be discussed before Lord Coalston, the expense to £83 6s. 8d. sterling, respected only manse then immediately to be built in parishes where there had been none before: so it says. The sum mentioned must have been reckoned sufficient in those days; but the legislature could not be so absurd as to suppose that it would be sufficient in all future times. And accordingly, in the next clause in the statute respecting reparation of manse then already built, when they should come to need repair, no restraint or limitation is imposed.

The case having been heard in the House of Lords, a judgment was pronounced, ordering and adjudging, "that the appeal be dismissed, and the interlocutor complained of affirmed with £100 costs." D. P. 1786.

Quare whether this judgment did not proceed on the ground that the Appellant, by his mode of pleading in the court below, had waived the objection arising out of the words of the statute. But see the case of Laverury post, the note at the end of the case.

* On the subject of the effect of desuetude and practice, as applied to acts of parliament in Scotland, see the observations of Eldon, Ch., in the D. of Hamilton v. Scott, 13 July 1813, MSS. and 1 Dow, 403.

Ordinary, and the heritor then "judicially offered at the bar to pay his proportion of £1000 Scots, which is the maximum directed by the law for building a manse; and agreed that the chargers might dispose of that in such a manner as they thought proper, and this besides the materials of the old manse; but further he apprehended, under the circumstances in which the case stood, he could not in equity, nor in law, be desired to go."

This offer, judicially made, "was refused by Mr. Simpson (the minister) and the Presbytery, who contended, that the rule laid down in the act of parliament was not a reasonable one; that the expense of building had much increased since that time; that the minister was entitled to have a sufficient manse built to him without any regard to the statute; and that the plan approved of by the Presbytery was a reasonable plan."

Lord Coalston pronounced an interlocutor, turning the decree of the Presbytery into a libel, and "granting probation to both parties for ascertaining whether the repairing the old manse would be done at a lesser expense than building a new one, and for proving that Lord Kintore's estate was under a strict entail." Thereafter the minister produced "an estimate of the expense which, [95] he said, was necessary for building the new manse, which had been approved of by the Presbytery, amounting to £123 6s. 2d. sterling, besides the materials of the old manse, and the benefit of all carriages from the parish, except the drawing of stones." The cause was then taken to report by Lord Coalston; and the appointment to report was renewed at a subsequent calling, in consequence of a viva voce debate of the minutes.

On the part of the minister it was stated, that one of the points of debate was, "whether or not a manse should be built according to one or other of the plans produced, whether the expense exceed £1000 Scots or not." In answer to a proposal on the part of Mr. Leith, that a consent should be obtained from the whole heritors to exceed the sum mentioned in the statute, it was stated on the part of the minister, that "the charger does not think that (viz. the heritor's consent) absolutely necessary, and must rest it upon what is already in process." "Montgomery (for the heritor) answered, that he always was, and still is, willing to pay his proportion of £1000 Scots; but he contends, that, at no rate, can he be subjected to any more." The cause having been reported, the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lord Ordinary having considered the memorials for the parties, and plans, and other writs produced, and having advised with the Lords thereanent, finds that the suspender, and the other heritors of the parish of Inverury, are obliged to build a competent manse; and in respect the suspender objects to the plan of the manse approved of by the Presbytery as improper, ordains him betwixt and the 11th instant, to give in another plan of a manse, such as he judges proper and competent for the minister of this parish."

In consequence of this interlocutor, the heritor procured a new plan and estimate of a manse, according to which the building would only cost £898 14s. Scots. According to this plan the front of this house was only to be fourteen feet; the side walls to be only sixteen feet high, and two feet four inches thick in the first story, and two feet in the second story; the chimney-heads to be carried three feet above the roof; the walls were to be built with clay instead of lime, and the floor of the dining-room was to be of earth instead of wood. To this plan the minister gave in objections, complaining of the small dimensions of the house; of the outer walls not being to be built with lime; of the want of a wooden floor for the dining-room, etc. [96] Thereafter the court pronounced this interlocutor: "On report of Lord Coalston, the Lords find, that the heritors of Inverury must build a manse and offices for the charger, according to the plan given in for the suspender, with the following variations and additions: 1mo. That the manse is to be thirty-six feet long, and eighteen feet wide within the walls: 2do. That the side-walls are to be twenty feet high above ground, and the gables of a proportional height: 3tio. That the walls of the first story above the ground are to be two feet seven inches thick, and the walls of the second story two feet four inches thick: 4to. That the chimney-heads are to be four feet above the roof: 5to. That the floor of the dining-room is to be laid with deals: 6to. That the partitions are to be made with brick, and standards, etc. of wood, all proper distances: and that the whole of the walls are to be built with stone and lime; and the walls on the inside as well as the partitions and roofs of the first and second stories, are to be sufficiently plastered; 7mo. That the barn, stable and byre are to be eleven feet wide within walls, and the walls to be eight feet high, and wholly built with stone and lime. And in respect of the offer made by the charger of transporting the stones of the old manse at his own expense, find, that the manse and office-houses are to be built upon that part of the glebe which is described in the charger's memorial; allow and authorize the charger to call a meeting of the heritors and magistrates of Inverury, to meet at the church of Inverury upon the first Tuesday in September next, and ordain the magistrates and heritors then and there to stent themselves and the burgh of Inverury with such sum of money as may be necessary for executing the plan as above mentioned; and find expenses due to the charger, which they modify to £4 sterling, and decern therefore, and for the expense of the decree to follow thereon, as the same shall be ascertained at extracting."

The heritor immediately gave in a reclaiming petition, in which he stated, in explicit terms, that "the alterations made upon the plan by the interlocutor will make the expense (if the work is to be sufficiently done) amount to more than double the sum in the act of parliament." In this petition the cause was again argued by the heritor, on the general ground that the court had no power to exceed the sum of £1000 Scots, allowed by the act of parliament. In one part of the petition the clause in the act of [97] parliament is quoted; and it is stated that the "words are so express that they leave no room for comment; and, under the authority of them, the petitioner maintains that he, as an heritor of this parish of Inverury, cannot be decerned to build a manse at a greater expense." In former cases, it is stated, where a large sum was allowed, "a consent of the majority of the heritors" was always obtained; and that in the present case there was not only no evidence that such consent was obtained, "but it evidently appears that such consent has been refused."

Besides this general argument, which is enlarged upon in other parts of the petition, it was stated that, according to the plan, as approved of by the Court, the manse would be made better than any of the other manses in the neighbourhood; and the heritor particularly objected to building the offices with stone and lime. The petition concludes with a prayer, applicable to the various pleas maintained in the petition; and, so far as respected the general point, the heritor craved that it should be found, "that the petitioner, as a heritor of the parish, cannot be decerned to build a manse at an expense above £1000 Scots, being the maximum allowed in the statute 1663."

Upon advising the petition, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lords having heard this petition, and parties procurators thereon, they find the offices are to be built with stone and clay, and harled (plastered) with lime; and, with that variation, adhere to their former interlocutor as to the other points, and refuse the desire of the petition."

The effect of this judgment was, to allow a sum of about £2000 Scots for building the manse, etc.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

ROBERT ANGUS, JAMES TODD, WILLIAM CURRIE, JAMES BARCLAY, sen. JAMES BARCLAY, jun., JOHN ALLAN, JOHN FLEMING, HENRY ARNOTT, ROBERT WALKER, and WILLIAM STEWART, Appellants DUNCAN MONTGOMERY, DAVID WISHART, JOHN MONTGOMERY and JOHN GULLAND, Respondents (2d March 1821).

[7 Geo. II. c. 16, s. 7, and 16 Geo. II. c. 11, were repealed by the Stat. Law Rev. Act 1867.]

In a summary complaint under the act of 16 Geo. II. c. 11, s. 24, respecting a wrong alleged to have been done upon the election of magistrates and councillors of a Scotch burgh, by the express provisions of the act it is necessary that all the magistrates and councillors should be parties in the proceeding below, and, as Appellants or as Respondents, upon appeal to the House of Lords; as, upon a similar proceeding before the act, by action of declaratur, all persons interested must be parties. Where the whole body are not before the House no judgment can be given. Cases which have been decided contrary to this doctrine (semb.) are of doubtful authority.

Whether a special objection should be taken, at the election, and a vote, put upon the objection as a necessary preliminary to found the complaint under the act.—Quære.

The 7 Geo. II. c. 16, s. 7, does not expressly require such notice to, and summons of, magistrates and councillors as the 16 Geo II. c. 11, s. 24; but the latter act being passed to explain and amend the former (semb.) they may be considered in many respects as one act.

The proceeding under the act 16 Geo. II. m st be within two months after the election or wrong done. Whether this can apply to a case of continuance upon the roll, upon an election many years before, without actual re-election.—Quære.

[99] In the case of a party, not a magistrate or councillor, but having a vote, where the election is for life, and the party has demitted his office, being struck off the Roll, (semb.) there is no authority under the act to summon, and à fortiori no authority to hear and decide the case on summary application.

Whether this provision of the act is not confined to summary complaints under the act, and whether there is authority to extend the provisions to actions of declaratur not under the act.—Quære.

Upon a summary complaint under the 16 Geo. II. c. 11, s. 24, the Court of Session have no power to award costs in part, the act directing that they shall allow to the party who prevails full costs of suit.

According to the set or constitution of the burgh of Inverkeithing the council consists of fifteen persons at least, viz. the provost, two bailies, the dean of guild, and treasurer, and ten or more inhabitant burgesses.

The number of the ordinary councillors is indefinite, they must be at least ten. There is no annual election of councillors, as in most burghs; when those of the old council who are desirous to resign have demitted their offices, the magistrates and old council choose new councillors in the room of those who have resigned.

The set further provides, with regard to the election of magistrates and office-bearers on the 29th September yearly, in the following terms: "First, they elect the provost, then leets five of the council, and chooses two out of them for the ensuing year; next leets three, and chooses the dean of guild; and last two, and chooses the treasurer."

[100] It has been the practice of the burgh to follow the order here prescribed.

According to custom of the burgh, although there has been no re-election of councillors, those who are duly qualified continue in office during life.

At a meeting of the council on the 29th Sept. 1811, the minutes bear, that the following persons were present, viz. General A. Campbell, provost; W. Turnbull and Alex. Montgomery, bailies; J. Todd, dean of guild; Malcolm Brown, treasurer; Duncan Montgomery, W. Currie, J. Henderson, J. Adamson, Hugh Dawson, Will. Fulton, W. Lillie, D. Wishart, W. Ridley, Andrew Kirk, J. Barclay sen., J. Barclay jun., R. Angus, W. Bouthron, J. Gulland; and deacons J. Dove, D. Wishart, G. Grindlay, and R. Gowie.

At this meeting, after the ordinary forms of procedure were gone through, the council proceeded to the election of magistrates for the ensuing year; and, by a majority of twenty to four, re-elected Mr. Alexander Montgomery second bailie.

The following persons were also allowed to remain upon the roll of councillors:—Duncan Montgomery, John Gulland, William Fulton, David Wishart, Capt. John Montgomery, and John Muckersie.

A summary petition was presented to the Court of Session by the Appellants, in Nov. 1812, complaining of the proceedings at the then last Michaelmas election of magistrates and councillors of the Burgh; and praying the Court to find and declare,

"Primo, That the election of Alexander Montgomery, as bailie, was void and null, and also, that Alex. Montgomery had no right to continue [101] upon the roll of councillors of that burgh upon the 29th of September last, or to sit, act, or vote in that capacity, and ought to be struck out of the list of councillors.—Secundo, That Duncan Montgomery was also disqualified from acting as a councillor of the burgh, or continuing on the roll of councillors, and that he ought to be struck off the same. Tertio, That John Gulland, William Fulton, and David Wishart, were disqualified from being councillors of the burgh, and that they had no right to sit, act, or vote upon the 29th of September last, and ought to be struck off the roll of councillors.—Quarto, To find that Captain John Montgomery, a pretended councillor, is not qualified to sit, act, or vote in that capacity, and that he ought to be struck off the roll of councillors of the burgh.—Quinto, That John Muckersie, a pretended councillor, is not qualified to sit, act, or vote in that capacity, and that he ought to be struck off the roll of councillors of the burgh.—And lastly, To find the complainers entitled to full costs of suit; and find, decern, and declare accordingly."

This petition was founded on the 16 Geo. II. c. 11, s. 24, which provides, "That it shall and may be lawful to and for any constituent member, at any meeting for election of magistrates or councillors, or of any meetings previous to that for the election of magistrates and councillors respectively, who shall apprehend any wrong to have been done by the majority of such meeting, to apply to the Court of Session by a summary complaint, for rectifying such abuse; or for making void the whole election [102] made by the majority; or for declaring and ascertaining the election made by the minority, so as such complaint be presented to the Court of Session within two calendar months after the annual election of the magistrates and councillors; and the Court shall thereupon grant a warrant for summoning the magistrates and councillors elected by the majority, upon thirty days notice, and shall hear and determine the complaint summarily, without abiding the course of any roll; and shall allow to the party who shall prevail their full costs of suit."

Answers were given in to this petition and complaint on the part of Gen. A. Campbell, provost; W. Turnbull, and A. Montgomery, bailies; And. Kirk, dean of guild; and Malcolm Brown, treasurer; D. Montgomery, W. Bouthron, W. Fulton, J. Henderson, J. Adamson, D. Wishart, W. Lillie, J. Montgomery, J. Muckersie, H. Dawson, J. Gulland, and Major-General D. Ballingall, councillors; and J. Dove, deacon of the incorporation of bakers; and G. Grindlay, deacon of the incorporation of weavers; all of the said burgh, at Michaelmas 1812;—and replies were given in by the Appellants; on advising which papers, the Court appointed the Appellants "to lodge, print, and box, within eight days, a condescendence, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, of the facts and circumstances which they aver, and offer to prove in support of their several objections to the several councillors and others objected to."

In their condescendence, the Appellants averred that the parties to whom they objected were disqualified by non-residence.

[103] To this condescendence answers were given in for the respondents, and the other parties then defenders.

A proof was allowed to the parties; and after some further procedure, pending which A. Montgomery, one of the original defenders, died; and General Campbell petitioned the Court to allow his name to be withdrawn from the list of Respondents to the complaint, on the ground of his having, on the 17th December 1814, addressed a letter to the provost, magistrates and council of the burgh of Inverkeithing, in which he resigned then, and for ever, any right he might have to the office of councillor in the said burgh: the proof was reported.

Having heard counsel on the import of the evidence, the Court ordered memorials, on considering which, they pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Lords having advised the petition and complaint of R. Angus, J. Todd, and others, with the answers thereto, replies and duplies, depositions of witnesses adduced, and writs produced, and memorials for both parties; they find that the said complaint is competent against such of the Respondents as were continued on the roll of councillors of the burgh of Inverkeithing at Michaelmas 1812, in so far as they, or any of them, were by law disqualified from being so continued: Find, that by the set and constitution of the said burgh, the councillors thereof must be inhabitant burgesses, and, therefore, sustain the objections of non-inhabitancy made by the complainers against the continuance of the following persons on the said roll at Martinmas 1812, viz. J. Muckersie, J. Gulland, D. [104] Wishart, W.

Fulton, and Capt. J. Montgomery: Find, that the said persons, and each of them, were disqualified from being so continued, or from acting as councillors of the said burgh, and grant warrant to, and ordain the clerk of the said burgh to expunge their names from the said roll, and decern accordingly. Repel the whole objections to the continuance of D. Montgomery and Alex. Montgomery on the said roll of councillors at Michaelmas 1812; and also repel the whole objections to the election of Alexander Montgomery as a bailie of the burgh at Michaelmas 1812; and assoilzie them, and each of them, from the conclusions of the said complaint, and decern; but find none of the parties on either side entitled to expenses of process."

Against this interlocutor the Appellants presented a petition, praying the Court "to alter the interlocutor complained of, so far as regards Duncan and Alex. Montgomery; and to decern in terms of the petitioners complaint, and to find them entitled to expenses."

This petition was refused.

The Respondents also petitioned against the interlocutor, and prayed the Court "to alter the interlocutor complained of, to dismiss the complaint, and find the petitioners entitled to expenses; at least, to repel the objections to the qualifications of Capt. J. Montgomery, D. Wishart, and J. Gulland."

This Petition being answered by the Appellants, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

[105] "The Lords having resumed consideration of this petition, with the additional petition, answers thereto, and whole cause, they alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, and find the complaint incompetent, in as far as the same concludes against Capt. J. Montgomery, D. Wishart, and J. Gulland, in respect there was no special objection stated against them at the Michaelmas election 1812, no vote put upon such special objection, and consequently no wrong done by the magistrates at that election: therefore dismiss the said complaint, assoilzie the said Capt. J. Montgomery, D. Wishart, and J. Gulland, from the conclusions of the said complaint, and decern: Find the complainers liable in expenses, in as far as respects those incurred in discussing the point of competency: allow an account to be given in, and remit to the auditor to tax the same upon the principle above expressed, and to report."

A petition against this interlocutor on the part of the Appellants was refused; and the appeal was presented from these interlocutors.

For the Appellants: The Respondents having in the pleadings below joined issue on the question of residence, have thereby waived the objection to the competency. It is not an objection which nullifies the proceedings, or which the Court is bound to notice. The defenders having proceeded on the question of residence, it must be taken for granted that the special objection, if necessary, was taken at the election. As to the argument upon which the judgment below proceeds, it is [106] a fallacy. It has been decided* that persons not present at the election may complain of wrongs done by those who were present. If so, a specific objection to be made at the election cannot be necessary. In many cases† persons present, and not objecting, and even concurring in the proceedings at an election, have afterwards raised a complaint under the statute without objection. As to the argument that no wrong was done at that election, because the parties had been elected for life at former elections, the re-election or continuance of those persons as councillors is a wrong within the statutes, and the continuance is equivalent to a new election. If objection were necessary, the general protest made against illegal votes was sufficient. There was in fact an election of magistrates, and Wishart and Gulland, two of the persons against whom the complaint is made, did vote. The fallacy seems to have grown out of the misapplication of the statutory enactments in the case of freeholders of a county (16 Geo. II. c. 11. s. 1 to 21). But as to them, the statute has not said generally if any wrong be done it shall be competent to complain. The statute refers to the four cases of a claim rejected, an enrolment made, a continuance on the roll where there ought to have been a removal, and a removal where there ought to have been a continuance. It points out the mode of proceeding [107] in each of these cases. But there is no such provision in the case of burgh elections (16 Geo. II. c. 11, s. 22 and seq.). In one case as to a freeholder (Dempster v. Lyall, March 3, 1791. Dict. 8868), where he had altered his status by parting with his freehold qualification, the complaint against the continuance of a person on the roll was found competent, although no special objection had been made at the meeting.*

For the Respondents: The conclusion of the petition and complaint, so far as it complains of the continuance of Alexander Montgomery and the other persons mentioned on the roll as councillors, and prays that they may be struck off the roll, is incompetent.

This is a summary proceeding under the statute not according to the ordinary course of the Court.

[108] The proceeding intended by the Legislature is not one for determining a question of right. In such a case the party must be left to his remedy by the common course of the law, viz. to his action of declarator (Anderson, 7th Feb. 1749, Dict. 1812; Dunbar, 7th Jan. 1757; Dict. 1855).

The complaint admits that the parties were on the roll of councillors previous to the election complained of; and it admits, that by the set or custom of the burgh the councillors continue during life, without re-election. But it affirms, that if they cease to be inhabitants it is competent to object to them, and to apply to the Court to have them struck off; and it concludes accordingly, by praying the Court, upon the merits of the case, to find and declare as in a declaratory action.

A meeting which adopts a practice sanctioned by long usage have not committed a wrong for which an immediate remedy is necessary, and which, if they attempt to defend, they must be vi statuti liable in costs. The whole frame of the statute shows that it had in contemplation those acts of injustice, or of culpable mistake, which were plain, and which tended to produce immediate injury to the individual complainers, or to the community; a description which cannot apply to the boni fide continuance of an usage which has long subsisted.

There is no re-election, or act of continuance of the old councillors on the roll. No such act is necessary by the constitution of the borough. The wrong therefore complained of was at the election of Michaelmas 1812, and the statutes require the summary proceeding to be within two months.

[109] For the Appellants, The Attorney-General, and Mr. W. Adam.

For the Respondents, Mr. C. Warren, and Mr. J. P. Grant.

[In the course of the argument the following observations were made by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Redesdale.]

The discretion which the Court below has exercised on the subject of costs is not given by the act (16th Geo. II.), which provides that full costs of suit shall be given.

The 7th Geo. II. c. 16, s. 7, does not name and limit the parties to be summoned on the complaint given by that act. But the 16th Geo. II. c. 11, s. 21, requires that the magistrates and councillors elected by the majority should be summoned upon a warrant issued by the Court. It requires, therefore, expressly, that all of them should be parties. How the decisions are to be reconciled with the provisions of the act it is difficult to see. Suppose a man had been struck off the roll who had a vote, not being a magistrate or councillor, how could he be summoned under the act? Or where the election is for life, and the party has demitted his office, if he is struck off the roll, it

* Whether actual residence is essential, and whether councillors elected for life were removable upon ceasing to reside, were questions not much discussed upon the hearing of the appeal, which was decided upon a preliminary question of form. may be doubted, notwithstanding the decisions, whether the Court has jurisdiction to summon the party, much less to hear and decide the case. In these acts giving summary jurisdiction, the power must not be extended beyond the cases for which express provision is made. Where are the words of the act which give jurisdiction to strike off the Roll? [110] especially if the disqualification of non-inhabitaney may be purged by subsequent residence. That is a very important question. The 16th Geo. II. being an act to explain and amend the 7th Geo. II., they may be considered in many respects as one act. In the proceeding by action of declaratur before the act all persons interested were made parties. But as the act directs who are to be parties, that direction is conclusive. It has been argued that the proceedings being penal in their nature, cease as to Alexander Montgomery by his death. But it may be doubtful, under the requisition of the statute, whether it is not necessary to revive against the representatives in case of death; although in a case where no costs are given it might be difficult to assign any cause for the revivor.

According to the act, in these cases of summary complaint, the proceeding must be commenced two months after the election. How can that provision be applied to the case of an election which took place twenty years before? The act speaks of a wrong done by the majority. In this case, so far as concerns the act of continuing the councillors on the Roll, it must be considered unanimous; for it does not appear that there was any separation or dissent expressed. How can a party complain of a wrong, to which, by implication, he was accessory?

With respect to actions brought before the passing of the acts of Geo. II., it was not necessary that they should be brought within two months. Where is the authority for limiting that time in such actions since the statutes, which apply only to summary complaints? In the case* cited by Wight, who [111] is generally an accurate writer, it does not appear that in the House of Lords there was any question or decision as to the limitation of two months on such actions. It was an action of reduction at common law. The decision is in general terms, no special ground being stated.

In this case many of the councillors are not parties to the appeal. If they had been made parties, and the petition had prayed that they might answer, judgment would have been given against them by default if they had not appeared upon the usual summons. We can do nothing against them in their absence, if you have not, by your proceeding in the appeal, given them the opportunity of appearing. We can only give judgment against those who are before the House individually, or against the whole body who are not before the House.

The Lord Chancellor: I have looked anxiously into the statute and the authorities, and considering the circumstances of this case, I can only advise the House to affirm the judgment, taking care distinctly to express in the terms of the order, the grounds on which it is made.

2 March 1821. The Lords find, that in the circumstances of this case an application by summary complaint to the Court of Session of Scotland could not be sustained, with respect to the Respondents, now before this House. It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the appeal be dismissed, and the interlocutors complained of, so far as they relate to the Respondents now before this House, be affirmed.

IRELAND.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

JANE HIGGINS,—Appellant; LAURENCE Earl of ROSSE,—Respondent
[9th March 1821].

[Mews' Dig. viii. 822; x. 1636. As to building leases, see Settled Land Act 1882, ss. 8, 9. As to defective execution, see Farwell on Powers, 2nd Ed. pp. 356, 359.]

By a deed executed in 1708 lands were vested in A. for life, remainder to B. for life, remainder to the issue of B. in tail, remainder to the heirs male of A.

* Young v. Johnston, Wight, 339, in C. of Sess. Jan. 1766, in D. P. 1767.

remainder to the right heirs of A. with power to A. and B. successively to grant leases for lives of any part of the lands in settlement, renewable for ever, without fine to be taken for any such first lease; such lease not to be of more lands than six plantation acres, at the best rent, with covenants to be in such leases for building, etc."

In 1726 A. grants to P. (under whom the Appellant claims) three leases, the two first being of houses and gardens, together with six plantation acres to each; the third lease being of a house, garden, and three acres; and all three leases being for three lives, with a covenant for renewal on application within six months after the failure of each life, on paying £4, and in case of neglect to forfeit the right of renewal.

In 1730 a new settlement is made, by which the lands are limited to A. for life, remainder to C. the son of B. (deceased) for life, remainder to the issue of C. remainder to several brothers of C. for life, in succession, and their issue in tail, in strict settlement; remainder to the right heirs of C. with power to A. to grant leases for three lives, renewable for ever, of any house and garden in the town of B. with ten acres of land, etc., and a similar power to C. and his brothers in succession, to lease any plot for a house and garden, with ten acres, etc.

In 1735 the third of the leases granted in 1726 was renewed by A. according to the covenant. After the date of this renewal, fines of the lands were levied by C. being in possession upon the death of A. In 1751 a recovery was suffered to such uses as C. and W. his son, should appoint, and in default of appointment to C. for life, remainder to W. and his heirs.

[113] By articles in 1754, and an act of parliament in 1758, the lands were limited to C. for life, remainder to W. for life, remainder to the issue of W. in tail, remainder to the right heirs of C. The act of parliament in pursuance of the articles vested a power in C. and W. severally in succession, to grant leases for three lives renewable for ever, of any plot for a house and garden in, etc., and any quantity of land not exceeding ten acres.

In 1779, by deed and recovery, the lands were limited, in default of appointment, to W. for life, remainder to L. (the Respondent in the appeal) in fee.

In 1786, W. the tenant for life named in the preceding settlement, renewed all the leases by deeds purporting to be executed in pursuance of the covenant for renewal, reciting the original leases of 1726; and that the leases had been frequently renewed; and containing covenants for renewal as in the original leases.

Further renewals to the same effect, and in the same form, were executed by W. in 1790.

W. died in 1791, when the fee vested in the Respondent. It did not appear, by direct proof, or otherwise, than by the recitals in the deeds of 1786, that any renewal had been made between 1735 and 1786. The rents reserved upon the leases were from time to time, and up to 1807, paid to and received by the owners of the lands for the time being, including the Respondent. In 1807 two of the cestuy que vies being dead, application was made to the Respondent for renewal, and upon refusal a bill was filed in Chancery to compel a specific performance of the covenant to grant renewals. The Bill was dismissed without costs, and on appeal the judgment was affirmed, on the ground (scnb.) that the leases were not warranted by the power.

Where a lease not warranted by a power is granted by a tenant for life, containing a covenant for perpetual renewal, the reversioner, by accepting for many years after he comes into possession the rent reserved upon the lease, does not confirm it so far as to make the covenant for renewal binding upon him.

By marriage settlement bearing date the 15th of Oct. 1708, and made between Sir W. Parsons and [114] William his son, and M. Parsons, of the first part; and certain trustees of the second, third, and fourth parts; the manor, etc. of Parsons town were conveyed to the trustees of the second part, and their heirs, to the use of Sir W. for life; rem. to trustees to preserve, etc.; rem. to Will. Parsons for life, remainder to preserve, etc.; rem. to the issue of that or any future marriage of Will in tail male; rem. to the heirs male of Sir W. with remainder to his right heirs.

The deed contained a general leasing power to Sir W., and to Will. Parsons to lease, etc., for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, or three lives.

There was also a power to Sir W. Parsons during his life, and after his death for Will. Parsons, during his life, to make leases for lives renewable for ever, without fine, present, or income, to be taken for any such first lease of any part of Parsonstown, and the other lands contiguous thereto, (the mansion-house, etc. excepted,) such lease not to contain or be of or for more lands than six plantation acres, at the best improved rent, with covenants to be in such lease or leases for building and improvements, and the fine to be taken for such lease or leases to be renewed not to exceed half a year's rent, reserved on the lands so to be leased.

There was issue of the marriage, Laurence, the eldest son; Will. the father died in the lifetime of Sir W. the grandfather.

By lease bearing date the 11th of Feb. 1726, made between Sir W. Parsons, of the one part, and N. Pritchett, of the other part, Sir W. Parsons, in consideration of the rents and covenants, etc. demised to Nicholas the house wherein Philip Langton then dwelt, [115] situate in Parsonstown, together with six acres of land, plantation measure, to hold all and singular the said demised premises, with the appurtenances, to N. Pritchett, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the three persons therein named, and the survivors of them, and during the life and lives of such other person and persons as should for ever be added during the demise, at the yearly rent of £8 sterling, with clauses of distress and re-entry in case of non-payment.

The lease contained a covenant by Sir William Parsons for perpetual renewal, by adding new lives on payment of a small fine, such life to be renewed within six months after the falling of each life.

By another lease, bearing the same date, and made between the same parties, Sir William Parsons granted and demised to Nicholas Pritchett the house and garden wherein R. Gillespie of Parsonstown, saddler, dwelt, together with six acres of land, plantation measure, in Lough Guir, then or late in possession of Philip Langton, To hold for the three lives mentioned in the first lease, at the yearly rent of £4. This lease contained a covenant of renewal, upon payment of £2 as renewal fine, and clauses similar to those in the first lease.

By a third lease, bearing the same date, and made between the same parties, Sir William Parsons granted and demised to Nicholas Pritchett the house and garden in the Race Lane, near the town of Parsonstown, together with three acres of land, plantation measure, adjoining to the said house and garden, in possession of Philip Langton. To hold [116] for the same three lives as mentioned in the first and second leases, at the yearly rent of £2 sterling. This lease contained the covenant for renewal, and clauses similar to those in the two former leases. These leases do not appear to have been registered.

By a deed of settlement, bearing date the 1th of September 1730, made between Sir William Parsons and Laurence Parsons, his grandson and heir-apparent, of the first part; certain trustees of the second, third and fourth parts; and William Sprigge, and Mary Sprigge, his eldest daughter, of the fifth part, reciting certain articles of the 23d and 24th April 1683, and the settlement of 15th October 1708, and also reciting that a marriage was then shortly to be solemnized between Laurence Parsons and Mary Sprigge, Sir William and Laurence Parsons granted and conveyed the manor of Parsonstown, etc. to the trustees of the second part, and their heirs, upon trust, as to part of the lands to the use of Laurence for life, and as to the remainder (subject to a jointure) to the use of Sir William for life; remainder to Laurence Parsons for life; remainder to trustees to preserve, etc.; remainder to the first and every other son of the marriage in tail male; remainder in like manner to the first and every other son of Laurence by any after-taken wife in tail male; remainder to William Parsons, brother of Laurence, for life; remainder to trustees to preserve, etc.; remainder to the first and every other son of William in tail male; remainder in like manner to Pigott Parsons, George Parsons, and Thomas Parsons, brothers of Laurence; remainder to the right heirs of Laurence Parsons.

[117] This settlement also contained a general and a special leasing power in the words following:

"That it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Sir William Parsons to make leases for three lives, with renewals for ever, of any house and garden in Parsonstown, with ten acres of land, plantation measure, and no more, to be held therewith, lying within one mile of the said town, at the best improved rent that can be had for the same at the time of setting, reserving half a year's rent on every renewal, and to make leases of any part of the said lands of which the said Sir William is tenant for life, for the term of three lives, at the best improved rent that can be had for the same at the time of setting; provided always, that such powers shall not extend to any part of the mansion-house, gardens, orchards and demesne lands of Parsonstown; and it is further agreed, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Laurence Parsons, and for all and every of the brothers of Laurence, to make leases of all or any part of the said granted and released premises, as he or they shall be or come into possession, for the term of three lives, or thirty-one years in possession, and not in reversion, at the best improved rent, without fine or income, with renewals for ever, reserving half a year's rent on each renewal, of any plot for a house and garden in Parsonstown, and ten acres of land to be held therewith, the said land lying within one mile of the town, (the mansion-house, and the gardens, orchards and demesne lands thereof excepted)."

There was issue of this marriage only one son, [118] William, (afterwards Sir William,) the father of the Respondent.

In 1735 a renewal of the third of the leases granted by Sir W. Parsons appears to have been made by an instrument, in writing, annexed to that lease, as follows:

"Whereas the annexed deed of lease, bearing date the 14th of February 1726, hath since the perfection thereof, through Nicholas Pritchett, the original lessee, deceased, and Walter Pritchett, his son and heir, also deceased, come by mesne assignment into the hands of John Luther, as by an indorsement on the said deed of lease may appear: And whereas the said Walter Pritchett, one of the lives in the said lease mentioned, died on or about the 23d of August last; and the said John Luther, pursuant to the clause for renewal in the annexed deed of lease set forth, having this day nominated the life of William Jessop, to be added and inserted in the place and room of the said William Pritchett, deceased: Now I, Sir William Parsons, Bart. in consideration of £1 sterling, or half-yearly rent of the annexed premises, to me in hand paid by the said John Luther, and in order to supply and fill up the three lives according to the intent of the annexed lease, have added and inserted, and by these presents do add and insert, the life of the said William Jessop to the time and term of the said lease, in the place and stead of the said Walter Pritchett, deceased; and do by these presents demise, rebase and confirm unto the said John [119] Luther, the demised premises in the town of Parsonstown, his heirs and assigns, and for and during the natural lives of John Burke and John Langton, in the next indenture named; and for and during the natural life of William Jessop now inserted in the place and stead of Walter Pritchett, deceased, and the survivor and survivors of them; and for and during the natural lives of such other person, as by virtue of the clause and covenants in the said lease contained, shall from time to time for ever hereafter be added during the said lease or covenants in said lease mentioned, subject nevertheless unto the clauses and covenants in the annexed lease reserved and mentioned. In witness whereof, etc. 12th February 1735 William Parsons."

Sir William died in 1749, and between the date of this last renewal and the settlement next stated, it appears that some fines had been levied by Sir Laurence.

In Hilary term 1751, a recovery of the estates was suffered by Sir Laurence Parsons and William his son, and the uses thereof were, by deed dated 19th January 1751, declared to be to such uses as Sir Laurence and William should jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to Sir Laurence for life; remainder to the use of William and his heirs.

By articles dated 28th of June 1751, and made between Sir Laurence Parsons and William Parsons, of the first part; Margaret Cleare, mother and guardian of Mary Cleare, and the said Mary Cleare, [120] of the second part, and certain trustees of the third and fourth parts; Sir Laurence Parsons covenanted with Margaret Cleare, her executors, administrators and assigns, that within twelve months after Mary Cleare should obtain her full age of twenty one years, and should join William Parsons, her intended husband, in a fine or fines of the real estates therein mentioned, to enure to the uses and purposes therein mentioned. Sir Laurence and William Parsons should and would levy one or more fine or fines, and suffer one or more common recovery or recoveries, wherein all necessary parties should join; and by good and sufficient deed or deeds, conveyance or conveyances, limit and convey the manor, etc. of Parsonstown, with the several other towns and lands therein mentioned, the estates of Sir Laurence and William Parsons, or one of them, subject as therein mentioned, to the use of Sir Laurence Parsons for life; remainder to William Parsons for life; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders: remainder to the first and other sons of the marriage in tail male; with remainder to the right heirs of Sir Laurence Parsons.

By these articles it was agreed that a leasing power should be given to Sir Laurence Parsons and William Parsons, and Mary Cleare, and each and every of them respectively, when actually seised by virtue of the limitations, to lease the premises (except the mansion and demesne lands) for any term or terms not exceeding thirty-one years, or three lives, or any term for years determinable on one, two, or three lives in possession, and not in reversion, [121] for the best rent, etc.; and that Sir Laurence Parsons and William Parsons might also make leases for three lives, with renewals for ever, reserving half a year's rent as a fine on each renewal of any plot for a house and garden in the town of Birr, (Parsonstown,) and of any quantity of land not exceeding ten acres, English statute measure, to be held therewith, etc.

These articles were registered on the 2d July 1754, and carried into effect by a private act of Parliament, passed on the 29th of April 1758.

The Respondent is the eldest son of this marriage.

By deed, leading the uses of a recovery, which was suffered accordingly, dated 20th of October 1779, and made between Sir William Parsons and the Respondent, then Laurence Parsons, his eldest son, Thomas Dames, and Jonathan Darby, of the first part; Edward King of the second part; and Robert Close of the third part; the manor and lands were vested in Edward King, and his heirs and assigns, as tenant of the freehold, for the purpose of suffering a recovery, the uses of which are by the deed declared to be as follows:—To the use of such persons, and for such estates, as Sir William and Laurence Parsons, or the survivor, should in such form as therein specified declare, direct, limit or appoint; and for default of and until such declaration, direction, limitation and appointment, to the use of Sir William Parsons and his assigns, for and during the term of his natural life, without impeachment of waste, and with all such powers as he now has over the same, and from and immediately after [122] his decease, to the use and behoof of Laurence Parsons, his heirs and assigns.

By deed of renewal, bearing date the 30th day of August 1786, made between Sir William Parsons of the one part, and Philip Langton of the other part; reciting the original lease of the 11th day of February 1726, made between Sir William Parsons, deceased, the grandfather of Sir William, party thereto, and Nicholas Pritchett; and also reciting, that Philip Langton, by mesne assignments, or otherwise, was then become entitled to the benefit of the said lease and covenant for the renewal therein contained; and that the said lease had been frequently renewed: the deed witnessed, that Sir William Parsons, in pursuance and execution of the said covenant for renewal, did demise and grant unto Philip Langton, the house and garden wherein Robert Gillespie, formerly of Parsonstown, sadler, dwelt, together with the other houses thereunto belonging; as also six acres of land in Lough Guir, formerly in the possession of Philip Langton, deceased: To hold the same, with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever, for the lives of the three persons therein named, and for and during the natural life and lives of all such other person and persons as should from time to time, successively and for ever, be added by virtue of the covenant for perpetual renewal, contained in the said thereinbefore recited lease, subject to the yearly rent and renewal fines reserved and mentioned in the said second-mentioned original lease. This deed of renewal contained a covenant for renewal, similar to the one contained [123] in the original leases; and like renewals were also executed of the two other leases.

By deed, dated 23d December in the year 1790, and made between Sir William Parsons of the one part, and Philip Langton of the other part, reciting the original lease of 11th of February 1726 to Nicholas Pritchett, and reciting that the same was taken in trust for Philip Langton: the said indenture witnessed, that Sir William

Parsons, in pursuance and execution of the covenant of renewal in the said original lease, and in consideration of the rent and covenant in the same, demised and granted all the said lands and premises comprised in the said second mentioned original lease unto Philip Langton, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the three persons therein named, and the lives and life of all such other person and persons as should from time to time thereafter be added thereto by virtue of the covenant for perpetual renewal in the said indenture of lease contained, subject to the yearly rent, renewal fines, and covenants in the original lease.

This deed of renewal contained a covenant for perpetual renewal by Sir William Parsons to Philip Langton, in the ordinary form. Like renewals were executed of the two other leases. Sir W. Parsons died in 1791, no appointment having been made under the settlement, whereupon the remainder in fee, for default of appointment, vested in the Respondent.

It did not appear by any direct proof, or otherwise, than by the recital in the deed of 1786, and presumptions from that recital, that the leases, or any of them, had been renewed between the years [124] 1735 and 1786. The rents reserved upon these several leases were from time to time, up to the year 1807, paid to and received by the several persons successively becoming entitled to and seised of the reversion in the lands, including the Respondent.

After the renewals of 1790, two of the cestui que vies, named in the deeds of that date, had died, but at what particular time did not appear.

In the Appellant filed a bill in the court of Chancery in Ireland, alleging that he had not until lately received intelligence of the death of the cestui que vies; and stating the facts before mentioned, prayed that the Respondent might be compelled to grant renewals of the leases, on payment of the fines due, with interest, which had been already tendered. The Respondent by his answer insisted that the grantors of the leases having exceeded the power, the leases were void; whereupon the Appellant filed an amended bill, stating the acceptance of rent under the leases, the possession of the counter-parts by all the successive owners of the reversion, no one of whom had objected to the leases as violations of the power, and that valuable improvements had been made in the premises; under which circumstances the Appellant insisted upon a right accruing by long acquiescence. The answer to the amended bill admitted the fines, and the possession of the counter-parts, but contended that the leases were void on various grounds. The cause was heard before Lord C. Manners in 1811, when the bill was dismissed without costs. In 1815 the Plaintiff in the original bill died intestate, as to the right in the leases. In [125] 1816 the Appellant, as heir at law, revived the cause and brought this appeal.

For the Appellant:—

The case of the Appellant is entitled to particular favour, from an undisturbed and undisputed possession of eighty years under renewable leases; a title which has been termed, "the local law and the old equity of the kingdom of Ireland" (2. Ridgw. Parl. Ca. 405, 406), Mayor of Hull v. Horner (Cowper 192); Eldridge v. Knott (Id. 245); citing a case, where (it was said) an act of parliament was presumed (by Lord Mansfield. Quere).

Sir Laurence Parsons, the Respondent's grandfather, was tenant in tail male under the settlement of 21th of April 1683, on which, and the subsequent settlements, the Respondent rested his defence to the original and amended bill of Philip Langton, the complainant below: Sir Laurence Parsons levied a fine of all the property included in the leases; considering him to be tenant for life, his fine operated as a forfeiture of his life-estate, and gave him a base fee until ousted by entry or claim of a person having an adverse title, and there never was such person; all the subsequent owners received the rent upon the leases. If Sir Laurence executed any leases of the property, his fine necessarily had the effect of confirming or establishing them; if he did not execute any leases, but did any act which, in the contemplation of a court of equity, amounted to an agreement to confirm and establish the leases made by his ancestors or predecessors in title, his fine [126] would confirm and establish those leases in equity. Now, Mr. Langton's bills expressly charge, and the Respondent's answers do not deny, that Sir Laurence renewed the subsisting leases; the Respondent's answers also state and insist on Sir Laurence's right to receive the rents, and his actual receipt of them; but he could only have this right in consequence of either having executed, or having agreed to execute, a renewal; which ever it was it was necessarily established by the fine.—Goodright v. Mead and Shiloon (2 Burr. 705).

Sir William, the Respondent's father, died in 1791, and the Respondent himself received the rents from that time till 1807, when the complainant filed his bill, and all that time had the counter-parts of the leases in his possession; this amounts to an acquiescence in the leases, and an agreement to confirm and establish them.

Suppose that it was competent to the Respondent, when his title accrued, to dispute the lease, having suffered five years to elapse the right is gone. Long acquiescence applies equally to the right of renewal and to the lease.

If such leases or agreements are not to be judicially presumed, there has been an uniform possession by disseisin by the complainant below, and those through whom he derived his title, since the death of Sir William, the Respondent's great great grandfather, the original lessor: And thus the Respondent is reduced to the dilemma of either admitting the validity of the leases, and the clauses for renewal contained in them, or of admitting that a disseisin of the person under whom he claims was made [127] at a period of about seventy years preceding the filing of the bill in the Court below.

None of the Respondent's objections to the leases, on the ground of their not being warranted by the power of leasing contained in the settlements of 1708 and 1730, can be supported. The covenants for building, etc. apply only to a first lease, and after so great a lapse of time it must be presumed that this is not a first lease, but a confirmation of some prior lease, which probably conformed to the settlement. Besides, the houses having been in fact built as if the covenant had been inserted, the reversioner is not damaged, and equity will aid the defect. According to the argument of the Respondent, no leases could be made by any tenant for life where houses had been actually built, which is contrary to the principle of the decision in Shannon v. Bradstreet (1 S. and L. 60). That the leases are, at all events, conformable to the power in the deed of 1730, which extends to a house and garden, with ten acres, and requires no covenant for building to be inserted. There have been grants under that power, and even where two powers exist, and one is recited in exercising the power; if the act is void under that power, it may be held good under the power not recited. This, in effect and principle, was decided in the case of Tomlinson v. Dighton (1 P. W. 149, 10 Mod. 31 and 71), where the question was, whether it was a conveyance of an interest by a tenant for life, or the execution of a power not recited.

The Respondent, according to his own argument, being a purchaser, is bound by a covenant, the [128] covenant for perpetual renewal, of which he had notice at the time of his purchase, although the covenantor had no power, Taylor v. Hibbert (2 Ves. j. 437). In this case the Respondent became a purchaser with notice. As to the rent reserved, it must now be presumed that it was the best that could be had. That the three leases are made to one person is not more injurious to the reversioner than if they had been made to three persons.

It was a fraud on Mr. Langton, the complainant below, to permit him to expend the considerable sums of money, proved in the cause to have been expended by him, from the year 1791 (when the Respondent's supposed title to the possession accrued) till 1807, when Mr. Langton filed his bill, in valuable and permanent improvements of the premises, without the Respondent's giving him notice of its being his intention to dispute the right of renewal.

If the Court of Exchequer were of opinion that the leases were void for informality, and that Mr. Langton was not entitled to the renewal prayed for in his bill, the Court ought to have decreed a renewal of the leases on such terms as the power warranted, and the equity of the case required.

For the Respondent: The leases in question appear to have been intended as an evasion of the limit of the leasing power, in point of extent of land to be demised, and were designed as a fraud upon it, these three leases being all made and dated on the same day, for the [129] same term, for the same lives, and to the same person, were manifestly a contrivance to let to one person one piece of ground, containing in all about fifteen plantation acres, but so let in three leases instead of one, merely to evade the settlements: they are therefore to be considered as one lease, and not as three distinct leases, and thus as demising a greater quantity of land Sir William, the lessor, was permitted by the said power so to let: It appears that the lessee and his family have ever since continued in the possession of the lands as if included in one single lease; and this attempt to evade the settlements, in taking three leases instead of one, clearly proves, that the lessee had full notice of the settlements, as such division could be for no other purpose than a fraudulent evasion of them.

The leases contain no covenant for building on the land not already built upon, nor for keeping in repair houses already built, for want of which the whole object and policy of the leasing power was liable to be defeated, the estate loaded with a perpetual lease, and the tenant at liberty either not to build or to let the houses fall, and convert the ground to other purposes quite foreign from the improvement of the town (Jones v. Verney, Willes, 169).

The attempt in the court below to sustain the renewals of 1786 and 1790, as substantive demises, to take effect under the then existing powers, was not warranted by the terms of those powers.

The articles of 1754, and act of Parliament, omit the power of leasing a house and garden for [130] ever, which was contained in the preceding settlement of 1730, and only authorize the leasing a plot for a house and garden, etc.

This omission must be considered as having been purposely made, and with the obvious intent in future of restraining the tenant for life from making a perpetual lease of a house, etc.; and it would appear that the reason of the family having thus by the subsequent settlement of 1754, left out the power of leasing a house, and confined and restricted the power of leasing to a plot for a house, arose from the experience they had, that the power of leasing a house already built did not promote sufficiently the object they had in view, namely, the improvement of the town of Parsonstown, and therefore they wisely confined the leasing power to a plot for a house.

The omission was evidently with a view that no lease with covenant for perpetual renewal should be from thenceforward, except of plots for houses, etc. and this intention could not have been effected without obliging the tenant to build; that is, all such leases should contain building covenants, for otherwise, without a covenant being imposed on the tenant to build, the plot might for ever remain unbuilt upon, and the intention of the parties be entirely defeated; and as those renewals, as well as the original leases, omit any covenants for building, they are on that score as objectionable as the original leases.

Neither a court of law nor equity would give so different an effect to the act of a tenant for life, intending merely to renew a lease which he con-[131]sidered valid, as to make it operate as an original substantive demise, when he must have supposed that he was only executing a renewal in virtue of a covenant supposed to attach on the estate. In the one case, the lessor makes no estimate of the present value, which in the other he does; and most certainly in 1786, when he executed the first renewal, Sir William, had he conceived that he was making an original lease, would have reserved more rent than was reserved in the original leases in 1726, upwards of 60 years before.

As to the points of acquiescence and improvements when investigated, there is nothing resulting from these considerations that could alter or affect the rights of the Respondent, or that ought in any manner to influence a court of equity on the subject, especially as the point was not raised by the pleadings, or made matter of argument in the court below.

As to the attempt made to support those leases, as a charge upon the ultimate reversion which was vested in the lessor in 1708, that question was not raised in the pleadings or arguments below; if it had been raised, it might easily have been answered. It will be found that that reversion has been long since barred and extinguished by the recoveries suffered in Hilary 1754 and Michaelmas 1779, of the intervening estates-tail, under which recoveries the Respondent claims.

These leases, having been executed by the tenant for life, can only take effect out of the powers annexed to his estate; but to do so they should have been made conformable to all the substantial conditions of those powers; and although they might charge [132] the ultimate reversion, had it come into possession, yet as the Respondent does not claim under that reversion, but as a purchaser under the estate-tail, (enlarged into a fee by the recovery of 1754,) there can be no ground at law or in equity to bind his estate by any leases not conformable to the leasing powers.

For the Appellants. The Attorney-General, Mr. Butler; (and Mr. Sugden, who replied in the absence of the Attorney-General.)

For the Respondents, Mr. Hart and Mr. Wetherell.

In the course of the argument upon the question, as to the effect of the fines levied by Sir Laurence, Lord Redesdale observed, that the deed of 1730 altered the state of the reversion, which, according to the limitations of that deed, was not in the person who levied the fines, so as to cause a merger. Upon the question as to the effect of the leases of 1786 and 1790, he observed that they purported to be renewals merely, and not original leases under a power.

Upon the conformity of the lease to the power the Lord Chancellor observed, that the power was to lease six acres, with covenants for building: That the leases were of houses and gardens, together with six acres of land, and containing no covenant for building.

Upon the question as to the effect of the lease of 1786, and the possibility of its operation under [133] the power in the deed of 1730, Lord Redesdale observed, that, when that lease was granted, Sir W. Parsons was bound by the articles of 1754, and the provisions of the act by which they were carried into effect; and with respect to the fines by Sir Laurence, (he again observed) that the settlement of 1730 had limited the reversion to several brothers in succession; that the immediate reversion had been taken out of Laurence by that deed; and that the ultimate reversion in fee to Laurence, limited by that deed, was not the immediate reversion expectant upon the estates-tail.

On the 9th of March 1821 the judgment was affirmed without further observation.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS ELIOTT, of Stobs, baronet.—Appellant; GEORGE POTT, Tacksman of the Farms of Langside and Penelrhise.—Respondent [14th March, 1821].

A deed, in the form of a bond of tailzie, declared in the prohibitory clause that it should not be lawful for the entailor, nor any of his heirs or successors, to sell; and he and they were thereby bound and obliged not to "sell, analzie, wadset, dispone, dilapidate, and put away the lands," etc. The irritant clause is thus expressed: "and if I, or any of the heirs, whether male or female successive, shall contraveen, etc. by the said heirs female, not using the surname, etc. or who, whether male or female, and I shall dispone the said lands, etc.; and if I, or any of the persons or heirs foresaid, whether male or female, shall infringe or alter the succession and substitution foresaid, all such deeds, etc. shall be void, etc."

One of the heirs of tailzie in possession granted a lease for 77 years, at a reduced rent, etc. upon a grassum: Held, that the irritant clause, though confused and ungrammatical, was intelligible; and having received a construction in judgment upon a former litigation, could not be held to be unintelligible. Held also, that the lease was an alienation within the meaning of the prohibitory clause, and that the word "dispone" in the irritant clause was equivalent to the word "alienate," [135] and rendered the prohibition effectual, and the act of contravention void, in a question between third parties as lessees, purchasers, or creditors.

By a deed in the form of a bond of tailzie, and executed in the year 1749, by Sir Gilbert Elliott, it is "declared that it shall not be leisome nor lawful to me the said Sir Gilbert Elliott, nor to any of my heirs and successors foresaid to sell, and I hereby bind and oblige me and them not to sell, analzie, wadset, dispone, dilapidate, and put away the said lands, baronies and estate, or any part or portion thereof, heritably and irredeemably, or under reversion, (except in so far as the faculties above written to extend), nor contract or ontake debts thereupon, or grant bonds or other securities therefor, nor do or commit any other facts, deeds or delicts, civil or criminal, whereby the said lands and estate may be anyways apprized, adjudged, forfeaulted, evicted or affected, nor to infringe, alter or innovate this present substitution and course of succession, in defraud and prejudice of the subsequent heirs of provision above mentioned, conform to the order and substitution above specified: neither shall it be lawful to me, nor to any of my heirs of provision foresaid, whether male or female, to suffer the said lands, baronies and estate, or any part thereof, to be adjudged or apprized for debts to be contracted, but shall be obliged to redeem the same within the space of eight years after deducing and leading any such diligence: And if I, or any of the said [136] heirs, whether male or female successive, shall contravene the premises, or do any fact or deed in prejudice hereof by the said heirs female, not using the surname of Elliott and my arms and title, or by the said unmarried heirs female not marrying a gentleman who, and their heirs, shall not use the same and my arms and title as above; or by the said heirs female, and they and their husbands and children not using the said surname, arms and title as aforesaid: or who, whether male or female, and I shall dispoise the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, or contract debts, or commit any other fact or deed during their respective marriages, or in favour of their respective husbands, wives and children (except in so far as is above provided,) whereby the said lands and estate may be evicted or affected in manner foresaid: or shall permit the same or any part thereof to be adjudged or apprized for any such debt and deeds, and not redeem the same within the limited time foresaid after leading thereof: and if I, or any of the persons and heirs foresaid, whether male or female, shall infringe or alter the succession and substitution foresaid: then and in any of these cases, not only shall all such deeds and contraventions to be done by me and the said heirs male and female, or any of them, during their respective marriages, so far as the same may burden and affect the said estate, and infringe or alter the succession, be ipso facto null, and of no effect by way of exception or reply, without any sentence and declarator to follow thereupon: but also I shall lose my right of life-rent, and the [137] other persons, doers of said deeds and committers of said contraventions or any of them, shall amit their right of succession, and be debarred from the said lands and estate; and all the infeftments and other rights thereof shall from thenceforth expire and become void as if they had never been granted: and the same shall accress to the next immediate person appointed to succeed to the said estate, and so forth, successive in case of divers contraventions: and that free of all debts, deeds, and delicts done, contracted, or committed by the contraveeners: and it shall be leisome to the next succeeding heirs to use and prosecute any legal way or method competent for establishing the right thereof in their persons, or in the persons of the remanent heirs of provision foresaid to succeed to them in manner above exprest."

Under this entail Sir William Elliott, father of the Appellant, entered into possession of the estate. In the year 1790 Sir William granted to Gideon Pott, father of the Respondent, a lease for nineteen years of the farms of Penchrise and Langside, part of the entailed estate, consisting of between 1000 and 5000 acres, at the rent of £281 8s. After possessing the farms four years upon this lease, a new transaction was entered into between the parties. On the 20th March 1794, Sir William granted a new lease of the same farms to Mr. Pott, at the rent of £285 for 77 years, on payment of a grassum, which amounted to £2904 15s. 9d.: and of the same date with the tack, Sir William Elliott granted a back-bond to the tenant, restricting the rent exigible during his life to £200. Sir William [138] died in May 1812, and was succeeded by the Appellant his son, who commenced the present action for reduction the lease, as an infringement of the restrictions of the entail.

The action having come before Lord Gillies, Ordinary, the Respondent by his defence maintained, in the first place, that the irritant and resolute clauses of the entail were so inaccurately and so incomprehensively worded, as to render the entail unavailable against third parties contracting with the heirs in possession of the estate; and secondly, that even supposing the irritant and resolute clauses to be effectual to the extent of the acts of contravention there enumerated, they could not invalidate the lease under discussion, because that enumeration, while it mentioned the act of disposing, omitted that of alienating, under which alone, in the absence of any express limitation of the power of leasing, the lease could be struck at as contrary to the restrictions of an entail.

On hearing parties the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor, dated the 27th January 1813, "repelled the reasons of reduction, and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action."

A short representation having been given in by the Appellant, and refused without answers, a second representation was given in, upon considering which, with answers, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered this representation, with the answers thereto, finds, that the lease in question having been granted in consideration of a grassum, and for a period of seventy-seven years, is to be considered [139] as an alienation; and finds that alienations are prohibited by the entail of the estate of Stobs. But finds that the irritant and resolute clauses in the same deed of entail contain no reference to the specific prohibition against alienating, such as is necessary to render the same effectual against third parties: therefore refuses the desire of the representation, and adheres," etc. The Appellant having submitted this judgment to the review of the Court, "they adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, but found the petitioner not liable in the expenses of process."

In pronouncing this interlocutor, the Court being influenced, as it appeared to the Appellant, chiefly by an opinion that the entail was unavailable against third parties, in consequence of the inaccuracy and obscurity of the irritant and resolute clauses, the Appellant presented a petition, in which his argument was principally directed to establish the general efficacy of the entail. But the Court, having heard this petition, adhered to their former interlocutor.

The Appellant, by his appeal to the House of Lords, complained of the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary of the 27th January and 19th February 1813, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 17th December 1813, in as far as the same finds that the irritant and resolute clauses in the deed of entail contain no reference to the specific prohibition against alienating such as is necessary to render the same effectual against third parties: and the interlocutors of the first division of the Lords of the 17th February and 10th March 1814, adhering to the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary complained [140] of. The Respondent also, by his cross-appeal, complained of the Interlocutors, in so far as they find that the lease in question having been granted in consideration of a grassum, and for a period of 77 years, is to be considered as an alienation; and that alienations are prohibited by the entail of the estate of Stobs, and find the Appellant not liable in the expenses of process.

For the Appellant, Mr. Brougham.

For the Respondent, The Attorney General.*

* This was the second argument. On the first point, the question as to the grammatical construction, no authorities were cited, except that it was urged by Mr. Brougham, that in the Roxburgh and Tillicoultry cases there were the same errors of grammar; but it was argued on general grounds, and the structure of the clauses, on the one hand, that they were unintelligible, on the other, that they were intelligible, though ungrammatical and perplexed, and that they had already received a construction judicially in Elliott v. Elliott, May 1803. On the other questions, whether by the word "disponere" alienation was prohibited, and whether a lease of 77 years with a grassum was an alienation, the argument was in substance and effect the same as on the similar points in the Queensberry leases, ante, vol. 1, p. 339. See the Lord Chancellor's speech in moving judgment.

For the Appellant the following authorities were cited:—Fac. Coll. 19 May 1803, Elliott v. Elliott: Spottiswoode's Practics, voce Revocation, p. 306. Voce Improbatur. 1d. p. 168. D. of Queensberry*, 12 Nov. 1812; Balfour's Prac. 171; Hope's Major Prac MS Reg. Maj. b. 2, c. 20 and 23; Ersk. b. 3, tit. 5, s. 1; Craig. Lib. 3, Diog. 4, s. 5, p. 479; and the dict. of Bailey and Jamieson. As to the form of the entail, Jurid. Styles, vol. 1, p. 202.

For the Respondent the following authorities were cited:—Case of Viscount Stormont, Feb. 26, 1662, Stair's Decis.; Mackenzie on Tailzies, v. 2, p. 187; Stair, b.

[141] The Lord Chancellor, after having stated the facts and pleadings, and the points at issue in the cause, proceeded as follows:— It is unnecessary for me to state, that in order to make the prohibition effectual against third parties there must be not only a clause prohibiting the thing to be done, but a clause rendering it null and void, and a clause [142] resolute in its nature, so that all the three clauses must strike at the act complained of; and if the one does strike at the act complained of, and the others do not, it would not be effectual as against third parties.

Two appeals have been presented, one of them against that part of the interlocutor which represented the lease in question as an alienation having been granted in consideration of a grassum, and for a period of seventy-seven years; of that appeal it appears now unnecessary to take much notice, because, by many late decisions, such a lease has been considered in this House an alienation; and therefore, if the prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses are sufficient to prohibit alienation, they must now, under the effect of those decisions, be taken to prohibit such a lease as an alienation. With respect to the other appeal, the substance of it is, that the Court ought not to have held the bond of tailzie to be unintelligible; or if they held it to be intelligible, but that the act which is to be taken as the alienation was not struck at by all the irritant and resolute clauses, that they erred in so considering it, because the word disposing being in the other clauses, while the word alienate is in the prohibitory clause, that the word disposing is in law a word which includes in it all that would be expressed by alienating; that it is not to be understood as technically meaning merely disposition, but that it will include alienation; and therefore, if a lease for seventy-seven years with a grassum, is an alienation, such an alienation is struck at by the word [143] dispose, as much as it would be struck at by the word alienate, if the word alienate had been in all the clauses.

This case has been twice decided by the Court of Session. In the year 1803 there was a cause in the Court of Session, Sir William Elliott against the heirs of entail of Stobs; it was a question inter hueredes, and not a question between strangers, but that does not make any difference as to the point, whether the deed of tailzie is intelligible; it may make a difference as to the other question in this appeal. The case, after stating the deed of entail of the 17th of September 1718, which is the deed of restriction now under consideration, stated that Sir Gilbert made up new titles to his estate, on the footing of his entail, in 1719 and 1720, upon which he and his eldest son were infeft. The entail was recorded in 1721, and Sir Gilbert possessed the lands upon these titles till his death in 1764. He was then succeeded by his eldest son Sir John, who possessed the estate upon the titles made up in his father's lifetime, and died in 1767, being succeeded by his eldest son Sir Francis, who also made up titles in terms of the entail; and, upon his death in 1791, Sir William succeeded, and made up his titles under the entail as his predecessors had done, on which titles he has ever since possessed the estate. In the year 1801 Sir William entered into a minute of sale with Mr. Joseph Gillon, writer in Edinburgh, of a part of the estate. Mr. Gillon suspended the payment of the price, on this ground, that Sir William had no power to implement the minute of sale on his part, being restricted from selling by the [144] entail of Stobs. The bill of suspension was passed of consent. Then there arose another cause. Sir William brought actions of reduction and declarator of the tailzie and subsequent investitures, calling as defenders all the heirs of entail in existence. There is a mode of proceeding in Scotland which we do not adopt in this part of the kingdom, that is, that where persons conceive themselves entitled to certain estates, they bring an action of declarator, when no persons dispute it, against all those who may choose to oppose their claim; and there certainly is great convenience in this practice. The Courts of Scotland are very much attached to this mode of proceeding; whereas our courts of justice are very much in the habit, when they find that the proceeding is to settle a question which cannot be said strictly to have arisen between the parties, to refuse to give any decision whatever upon it. Within my own recollection in practice this House has been called upon to decide, and has occasionally decided in similar cases. Formerly contracts used to be made for sales of estates. Bills were filed in the Court of Chancery for the specific performance of the contracts, the intention and ultimate object being to bring the question before the House of Lords to get their decision, which could not bind others, though it would be a great authority as to whether the party had or not the right to sell. This appears to have been put an end to by another mode of proceeding, which began about the time of Shapland v. Smith (1 Brown's C. C. 74), in which case Lord Thurlow decided, [145] that if there was considerable doubt with respect to a title, he would not compel the purchaser to take. Mr. Baron Eyre, (afterwards Lord Chief Baron, and Lord Chief Justice Eyre.) I remember, was a good deal shocked, because he was of opinion there could be no such thing as uncertainty in the law; and he did not approve of that decision. But it has since been taken for granted, that if there is serious doubt of the title, whatever might be the law before, the Court will not compel the party to take the title, and so that mode of proceeding appears to have been very much discussed in the courts of justice in England.

In the result of this action of declarator, Sir William maintained this separate plea, "that the entail was ineffectual to prevent a sale, being defective in its various clauses, in support of which he maintained that the limitations of an entail are not to be extended by inference or implication beyond what is expressed in the entail itself (a proposition to which full assent will be given); and wherever these limitations are directed against third parties, as in the case of a prohibition to sell or contract debt, in order to render these effectual against purchasers or creditors, it is necessary that the prohibitory and irritant clauses should be accompanied by a resolute clause making void the right of the contravener." Then cases are mentioned. "The irritant and resolute clauses, besides, must be precisely applicable to the act of contravention, in order to be effectual against third parties," and Bruce of Tillycultry's case is cited.

[146] In this case it is said "the irritant and resolute clauses, instead of bearing in general that all the acts of contravention contained in the prohibitory clause shall be void and null, or shall subject the heir to a forfeiture, especially enumerate the various cases to which they are meant to apply." That would be more accurately put if it was stated that after the declaration, that they are not to contravene in any respect the provisions contained in the instrument, it enumerates various cases to which such contravention would extend. They say further, "That in order to render void an act of contravention it must be done by Sir Gilbert and the heirs,—it must be done by the heirs during their respective marriages,—and it must be such as to burden or affect the estate, and infringe or alter the succession. But to enter into a minute of sale does not fall under any of the cases enumerated as qualified and explained by the irritant clause, in which cases alone contravention of the entail can be effectual against third parties. The prohibition to sell, analzie, wadset, dispone, dilapidate, and put away the said lands, is most ample; but in the irritant and resolute clauses there is not one word about selling, nor any thing which in sound legal construction can be held to be equivalent to it." (Whether there is any thing which can be held to be equivalent to it is precisely the question.) "The only words having the least reference to this prohibition are those in the irritant and resolute clauses, 'or who, whether male or female, and I shall dispone the said lands and estate, or any part thereof.' Now, the relative who refers to the nearest antecedent clause, heirs-[147]- female, their husbands and children, none of which Sir William is; at least, if it does not, this clause is so uncertain as to be insufficient for imposing fetters, which can only be done by clear expression to affect the rights of purchasers and creditors. Again, the disposition must be granted in concurrence with Sir Gilbert himself, 'who, whether male or female, and I;' and it can only take place in case they concur to dispose the estate, but does not take place in any of the other ways by which the estate may be alienated; e.g. by a minute of sale. The statute 1685 distinguishes between selling, analzieing, and disposing, as being different modes of affecting property. Selling or analzieing, therefore, by a minute of sale, is different from disposing, and the minute of sale may be completed by the purchaser adjudging in implement." I read this, because it appears to me that the substance and marrow of the argument is contained in these pleadings.

On the other hand, the answer appears to me to contain the substance of all that has been stated at the bar on the other side. The act of 1685, permitting proprietors to entail their property, has prescribed no form of words which shall be essential for carrying the entailor's intention into effect, nor have the decisions of the Court as yet supplied the deficiency. It is only necessary that the clauses should be clearly and distinctly expressed, so that the meaning of the entailor may be carried into effect, without resorting to any constrained or violent construction of the words.

In Bruce v. Bruce (15 Jan. 1799. Dict. 15539), the entail of Tillycoultry, [148] among other prohibitions, contained one directed against selling, analzieing, dilapidating, or putting away the foresaid lands or estate. The resolute clause did not contain a general reference merely to the various prohibitions as the irritant clause did, but proceeded to a special enumeration of the acts of contravention, which would forfeit the contravener's right, thus limiting and circumscribing the effects of the general reference. Among those acts of contravention the whole clause de non alienando was omitted, and no words which could apply to it were inserted. The strict interpretation of entails will probably not be carried farther than it was there. The present question, however, is one very different. On examining the enumeration of cases to which the irritant and resolute clauses of the estate of Stobs are meant to apply, the first part of them refers to the prohibitions with regard to the entailor's surname, title, and arms, and with regard to the heirs female and their husbands and children using the same surname, title, and arms. Then, as the heirs of entail, as well as the entailor, were prohibited from alienating, contracting debt, or altering the succession, the next part of the clause, "quite distinct and independent of the former, and beginning, " or who, whether male or female, and I shall dispose the said lands," ---relates to these last prohibitions. The irritant clause begins with the words, "And if I or any of the said heirs, whether male or female, successive, shall contravene the premises;" and the remainder is merely a continuation of that sentence. The pronoun who, therefore, applies to any of the said heirs; and particularly [149] when connected with the words, "whether male or female, and I shall dispose," it can relate to no others than the heirs of entail, as the heirs of entail, male and female, and the entailor himself, had been prohibited from alienation. Nor is the irritancy confined to a deed of an heir, in concurrence with the entailor; that depends certainly upon the whole extent and meaning and construction of the clause. The entailor, by the construction of the tailzie, became a life-renter, and no prohibition against him was necessary; and if he had not, he could not have irritated his own deed, or deprived his creditors of the means of attaching his estate, so long as he continued proprietor of it, so that the addition and I to the various clauses is unnecessary, and should be held pro non scripto. The intention of the entailor is obvious. The clause itself begins thus, "If I, or any of the said heirs." Afterwards, when and is used, it is used as being synonymous with or, which, in common language, it frequently is. Again, the irritancy is applicable to a sale of the estate, as disposing is one of the acts specially enumerated, making this case thus far different from the case of Tillycoultry. Selling, however, it is said, is not included under the general term to dispose. But these words are synonymous; they are different modes of expressing the same act, and, together with analzie, are so used by the statute of 1685. Perhaps, of all the terms, sell, analzie, wadset, dispose, dilapidate, and put away, used in the prohibitory clause, dispose is the most general, and it is therefore used as an equivalent to them. What this House has found in other cases as to the effect [150] of the word dispose I need not remind you. The question which arises is not whether in many cases the meaning of the word dispone may not be to sell, but whether it is so in this case, taken in the way in which it stands here. The irritant clause continues, "Then, and in any of these cases, not only shall all such deeds and contraventions to be done by me and the said heirs male or female,"—this first part applying to such prohibitions as are directed against the entailor or the heirs of entail; and then proceeds,—“or any of them, during their respective marriages,” comprehending the other class of contraventions as to the name, arms, and title which are to be borne by the heirs-female and their husbands, and which prohibitions are contradistinguished throughout every clause in the entail. All these are irritated, so far as they burden and affect the estate, which last term is sufficient to include the sale in question.

Mr. Solicitor-General Blair and Mr. Ross were concerned as counsel in this cause; and the Court of Session were of opinion, which they expressed on the 19th of May 1803, both that this clause was intelligible, and that the word dispone in the irritant and resolute clause was quite sufficient to support the entail. But it has been intimated to us, that we are to consider this a case of collusion. Now I do not see how that is made out; for unless the Judges were colluding, I must look at it as containing their opinions in 1803. It is said this is not a res judicata between the parties. I agree that it is not a res judicata with respect to the Respondent at the bar; but still it is the opinion of the Court of [151] Session upon precisely the same points; and if they were of opinion that a man cannot sell, they must be of opinion a man cannot buy. The question, therefore, upon the whole, appears to be this, whether the opinion of the Court of Session in 1803, or the opinion of the Court of Session in the present case, is the better opinion? It appears to me to be reduced to two points; namely, whether this deed is intelligible; and if this deed be intelligible, what is the effect of it with respect to the sufficiency of the three respective clauses. Now it is a very dangerous thing to come to a decision that an instrument is not intelligible which has been so far the subject of judgment: and though one cannot help seeing that almost every rule of grammar is sacrificed in this deed, yet, if we were to hold this to be unintelligible, I cannot conceive how it can be said to have been satisfactorily determined unless it was understood. I am of opinion this instrument is an instrument capable of being understood, and that reduces it to the question, What is the effect of the word dispone, regard being had to the whole context of this instrument? After the decisions which have been come to upon the word dispone, and after (what is of infinitely more weight) the great authority to be found in the law of Scotland, antecedent to any such decision, as to the effect of the word dispone, I cannot help stating it, after much consideration of the case, as my judgment, that this word dispone in these other clauses is quite sufficient for the purpose of protecting this entail; and unless any of your Lordships are of a different opinion, it appears to me that this judgment must be reversed.

14 March 1821.

Ordered and adjudged, That the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 27th of January and the 19th of February 1813, complained of in the said appeal, be and the same are hereby reversed: Further ordered and adjudged, that the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 17th December 1813, also complained of, be and the same is hereby reversed: except so much thereof as finds that the case in question having been granted in consideration of a grassum for a period of 77 years, was to be considered as an alienation: and as finds that alienations were prohibited by the entail of the estate of Stobs: Further ordered and adjudged, that the said interlocutors of the Lords of Session, of the 1st division of the 17th of February and 10th of March 1814, also complained of in the said appeal, be and the same are hereby reversed: and the Lords find, that according to the true construction of the deed of entail of the estate, the prohibition to dispose extends to the lease in question, and that the irritant and resolute clauses in the same deed of entail do so refer to the specific prohibition to dispose, as to render the same effectual against third parties, and therefore sustain the reasons of reduction of the lease in question: Further ordered and adjudged, that the said cross-appeal be dismissed this house: Further ordered, that the said cause be remitted back to the court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be consistent with this judgment, and as shall be just.

ENGLAND.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

The UNITED COMPANY of MERCHANTS of ENGLAND, TRADING to the EAST INDIES,—Appellants; ROGER KYNASTON, Esq.,—Respondent * [9th March 1821]

[Mews' Dig. xi. 402. Commented on in Smith v. Peters 1875, L.R. 20 Eq. 513; and see A.G. v. Chambers 1849, 12 Beav. 159; Ennor v. Barwell 1860, 4 De G. F. and J. 529; *Bennitt v. As to observations of Lord Redesdale (3 Bli. 161) as to sheriff breaking open doors, see note to Burdett v. Abbot 1817, 5 Dow. 165.]

The Respondent, an inappropriate rector, having by a decree of the Court of Chancery been found to be entitled (under the decree made in pursuance of the act 37 Henry VIII.) to the tithes, according to the value, of warehouses in London, occupied by the Appellants, and which never had been rented, the Court has jurisdiction to make an order upon the Appellants to permit inspection, for the purpose of ascertaining the value.

Such an order cannot be executed by force, but operates only on the person, as a foundation for process of contempt, and to take the Bill, pro confesso, if necessary.

The Respondent, the impropriator or inappropriate rector of the parish of St. Botolph without Aldgate, part whereof lies within the city of London, or the liberties thereof, being entitled to the tithes of that parish, in the month of July 1801, filed his bill of complaint in Chancery against the Appellants, who were in possession, as the owners and occupiers of certain warehouses and other premises situate in Gravel-lane, Petticoat-lane, Harrow-alley, Cutler's-street, and Parker's-gardens, within that [154] part of the parish lying within the city of London. The bill prayed that an account might be taken of the several sums of money due and owing to the Respondent from the Appellants, in respect of the tithes, rates for tithes, sums or customary payments, or other duties in lieu of tithes, on account of the warehouses and other premises held or occupied by them within such part of the rectory or parish of St. Botolph as aforesaid, or the titheable places thereof, in each year since the said month of May 1801, and that the Appellants might pay to the Respondent the money which should be so found due from them on the taking of such account. The Respondent, by the bill, setting forth a certain decree duly enrolled in the said Court of Chancery, bearing date on the 23d of February 1515, and made by Thomas, then Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, and others, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the 37th year of the reign of Henry VIII, intituled, "An Act for Tithes in London," and charging that the tithes payable by the Appellants in respect of their premises, and the amount of the several sums to be paid by them, ought to be computed after the rate and in the manner directed by the decree, in proportion to the then or improved or last rent or value of the premises; and insisted upon his right to the tithes after such mode of computation. The Appellants, by their answer, stated "that all the warehouses and dwellinghouses situate in the places specified in the bill, were built by them; that having built, and being themselves the owners of the warehouses and dwelling-houses, they did not then, nor ever did, hold the same or [155] any part thereof under any yearly or other rent, or for any consideration in the nature or in lieu of rent, and that no yearly or other rent had at any time been paid for the said warehouses or ground. That as to all the warehouses then in the occupation of them the Appellants, (except some warehouses called Rumball's, about which at present there is no question,) theretofore mentioned to be situate within that part of the said rectory or parish which is within the said city of London or the liberties thereof, the Appellants never having held the same at or subject to any rent,

* See this case upon the hearing in the Court below, 3 Swan. 248 and no part thereof having been let since they were built, they the Appellants were unable to set forth as to their knowledge what was the then actual value thereof."

The bill was afterwards amended, and the Appellants put in a further answer, the Respondent replied thereto; and the cause, being at issue, came on to be heard on the 2d day of March 1818, before the Master of the Rolls, when his Honor declared, "That the Respondent was entitled, among other things, to tithes after the rate of two shillings and nine pence in the pound upon the annual value of all the messuages, warehouses, and other premises held or occupied by them (the Appellants) within the said parish of St. Botolph without Aldgate, in the city of London, except the said premises called Rumball's warehouses; and he did order and decree that it should be referred to Mr. Thompson, one of the Masters of the said Court of Chancery, to ascertain the value of the premises, except as aforesaid, and to [156] take an account of what was due to the Respondent for tithes at the rate aforesaid; and that the Appellants should pay to the Respondent, what should be reported due to him on taking of the said account, together with the costs of the said suit."

In pursuance of this decree, interrogatories on behalf of the Respondent were, in or about the month of November, carried into the office of the Master, for the examination of the Respondent's witnesses as to the value of the warehouses and other premises above mentioned, and three witnesses were then examined on his behalf, namely, Mr. James Burton, William Montague, and Joseph Kaye. In the course of the following December, interrogatories were carried into the Master's office on the part of the Appellants for the examination of witnesses on their behalf, upon which Mr. Dennis Chapman, Mr. John Shaw, Mr. William Pilkington, and Mr. S. P. Cockerell were examined.

All the persons who had been so examined on the part of the Respondent were surveyors or architects, and, together with those examined on the part of the Appellants, were not otherwise practically acquainted with the nature or value of the premises in question.

Under these circumstances, and upon the special ground, that where surveyors alone are examined upon the subject of the value of any particular premises, their several estimates usually differ so widely in amount that it is extremely difficult, and in some instances almost impossible, upon such testimony, to come to any just conclusion as to the value, the [157] Respondent laid before the Master, in addition to the evidence of the surveyors, the evidence of some experienced warehousemen and wharfingers, whose practical acquaintance with, and knowledge of, the value of premises similar to those, which were the subject of the above inquiry, might assist the Master in forming a judgment upon the matter referred to him.

With this view, the other depositions not having been published, publication was enlarged at the instance of the Respondent, and it was proposed on his behalf to examine two experienced warehousemen, who were stated to be peculiarly well qualified to furnish the Master with practical information; and in order that the testimony of those persons might be as full as possible, application was made on behalf of the Respondent to the Appellants, that those two witnesses might be permitted to inspect the interior of the warehouses in question, preparatory to their being examined.

With this application the Appellants refused to comply, although the other witnesses, who had before been examined, had been permitted to have an inspection of the premises previous to their examination; the Respondent therefore applied to the Court of Chancery for an order upon the Appellants to grant such inspection.

This application was made by motion before the Vice-Chancellor, on the 6th of February 1819, supported by the affidavit of Richard Grose Burfoot, the Respondent's solicitor, when his Honor ordered, "That it should be referred to Mr. Thompson, the same Master to whom the cause stood referred, to [158] inquire, and state to the Court whether an inspection of the several warehouses and premises before mentioned to be in the occupation of the Appellants in Gravel-lane, Petticoat-lane, Harrow-alley, Cutler's-street, and Parker's-gardens respectively, by the said Joseph Sills and Robert Smith, (in the said order, by mistake, called William Smith,) preparatory to their being examined as witnesses upon interrogatories carried into the said Master's office by the Respondent, in pursuance of the decree made on the hearing of the said cause, the 2d day of March 1818, (and which is the decree hereinbefore stated,) was necessary for the said Master to form his conclusion upon the matters thereby referred to him; and after the said Master should have made his report, such further order should be made as should be just."

The Appellants were dissatisfied with this order, and accordingly applied by motion to the Lord Chancellor to discharge it; but he being of opinion, after argument, that the order was right, refused the motion.

Pending these proceedings before the Lord Chancellor, the Master, in pursuance of the order of the 6th of February, made his report, bearing date the 24th day of March, whereby, after reciting the order, he certified that there had been laid before him the affidavits of Richard Grose Burfoot, Joseph Sills, wharfinger and warehouse-keeper, and Robert Smith, wharfinger and warehouse-keeper, and the further affidavit of the said Richard Grose Burfoot; and the said Master, after stating the purport and effect of those affidavits, "was, upon consideration [159] of the said affidavits, and of what had been alleged before him by the solicitors for the said parties, of opinion that an inspection of the several warehouses and premises hereinbefore mentioned to be in the occupation of the said Appellants, in Gravel-lane, Petticoat-lane, Harrow-alley, Cutler's-street, and Parker's-gardens respectively, by the said Joseph Sills and Robert Smith, preparatory to their being examined as witnesses upon the interrogatories exhibited by the said Respondent before him for the examination of witnesses, in respect of the matters referred to him by the said decree of the 2d of March 1818, was necessary for him to form a satisfactory conclusion upon the matters referred to him by the said decree."

This report having been filed, the Respondent preferred a petition unto the Lord Chancellor, praying that the report might be confirmed, and that the aforesaid Joseph Sills and Robert Smith might be at liberty forthwith to inspect the several warehouses and premises.

Upon the 7th of April 1819, this petition came on to be heard before the Vice-Chancellor, when counsel for the Respondent attending accordingly, and no one attending for the Appellants, although they had been duly served with a copy of the said petition, and his Lordship's order made thereon, as appeared by affidavit then produced and read, the Court ordered, "That the said Master's said report should be confirmed. And it was ordered that the said Appellants should permit the said Joseph Sills and Robert Smith to inspect the said several [160] warehouses and premises in Gravel-lane, Petticoat-lane, Harrow-alley, Cutler's-street, and Parker's-gardens respectively, preparatory to their being examined as witnesses upon such interrogatories as aforesaid."

The East India Company then presented a petition of Appeal to the Lord Chancellor, stating themselves to be aggrieved by the said two several orders of his Honor the Vice-Chancellor, bearing date the 6th day of February and 7th day of April, 1819, and by each of them, and praying that the same might be reversed.

On the 1th day of May 1819, upon the hearing of the petition, the Lord Chancellor affirmed the two orders of the Vice-Chancellor.

From these three orders, bearing date respectively the 6th day of February, 7th day of April, and 1th day of May 1819, the appeal to the House of Lords was presented.

For the Appellants: The occupiers of private dwelling houses, warehouses and premises, are by law entitled to the exclusive possession and enjoyment thereof, and the same cannot, against or without the consent of such occupiers, be lawfully entered by any person, under any pretence whatsoever, except by a lawful warrant or authority for that purpose:

The Court of Chancery has never been, and is not, possessed of any authority to order any subject of this realm to open his doors, and permit an inspection of the interior of his dwelling or premises for any purpose whatsoever; nor is it pretended [161] that any instance can be found; but, on the contrary, it is admitted that no instance can be found in which the Court of Chancery has ever heretofore assumed or exercised any such authority.

For the Respondents: It was competent to, and within the authority of the Court of Chancery, in such a case as the present, to require and compel the Appellants to allow the witnesses of the Respondent to survey and inspect the premises in question:

An inspection of the interior of the above-mentioned premises by Joseph Sills and Robert Smith, previous to their being examined, is necessary, in order that their evidence may be complete and satisfactory, and that the Court may have such full information as is essential to enable it to form a correct judgment, with respect to the true value of these premises:

It is apparent, that unless the witnesses on both sides, in cases like the present, are permitted to have such inspection as is here sought, the Court will in effect be obliged to determine all such cases upon evidence adduced on one side only, and by that party which is most materially interested in depreciating the premises, which are the subject of inquiry, below their real value.

For the Appellant, The Attorney General, Serjeant Bosanquet, (and Mr. Wyatt).

For the Respondent, Mr. Wetherell, Mr. Ralph Palmer *.

[162] The Lord Chancellor, in the course of the argument, asked whether, in case of an agreement between landlord and tenant, that the value of timber used in repairs should be allowed at the end of the lease, a right would not exist, and, as incident to the right, a power in a court of equity to compel inspection for the purpose of valuation: and it being observed, in answer to this question, that the right and power in the case supposed, would arise out of contract, he asked whether the act of Parliament was not a contract for all parties. The reason (he observed) why all these suits were brought into equity was, because the lord mayor's court was unable to deal with them.

Lord Redesdale, after stating the bill and answer, the order in question, and the proceedings upon it, made the following observations: The question is, whether the order of the 7th of April 1819 can be supported. The ground stated for the Appeal is, that this is a private dwelling-house, and that the occupier is entitled to exclusive possession,—that no adverse entry can be made but by lawful authority—and that the Court of Chancery has no authority to order that an entry should be allowed. As to the first ground of objection, it does not directly apply to the case, because the order is, not directly to compel, but, upon the party, that he shall permit inspection. The objection that the Court has no power, is the material ground of Appeal. If it be true that it has no such power, there are many cases in which there must be a total defect of justice. In this case the Master has re-[163]-ported his inability to form an opinion of the value of the premises, without such inspection as the order requires: and how otherwise is it possible to judge of the value? If there are no means to form any judgment upon this subject, the Court would have no power effectually to execute the decree which has been pronounced in the cause. The result of this state of things would be, that the East India Company would be their own valuers, and the question in the cause must be decided upon evidence furnished by one of the parties to the exclusion of the other. The objection, upon the face of it, appears to be unreasonable.

The arguments urged for the Appellants at the Bar are founded upon the supposition, that the Court has directed a forcible inspection. This is an erroneous view of the case. The order is to permit; and if the East India Company should refuse to permit inspection, they will be guilty of a contempt of the Court, in which case, being a corporation which cannot be affected by personal process, a sequestration issues against their goods, to compel obedience to the order, or, as a preliminary step, to authorize the Court to take the bill pro confesso. So it is in the case of insufficient answers, and other proceedings of a suit in equity. The bill cannot be taken pro confesso, until the process against the person for contempt has been exhausted. In this case therefore, if the order to permit inspection be erroneous, and not the subject of process for contempt in cases of disobedience, the bill cannot be taken pro confesso, and the justice of the Court is defeated. In the argument much reliance seems to [164] have been placed on Semayne's Case (5 Rep. 92), which may be considered as the foundation of the objection. But there the question was collateral. It was an action upon the case against a surviving partner, for obstructing the execution of a writ of extent, issued upon a recognizance in the nature of a statute-staple, by shutting the door of his house against the sheriff and jury, who came to extend the goods of the deceased partner. According to one of the resolutions in that case, the sheriff has not authority by law to break open doors to execute process at the suit of a subject, although request be made, and admission to the house refused: and the substance of the reason given for this resolution is, that it would be attended with danger to the public peace. Whether this reasoning stands on a solid ground may be questioned.

On process at the suit of the Crown, where goods are fraudulently removed, and in cases of replevin, the doors of a house may be broken by the sheriff after request and denial. In the latter case the power is given by statute. But how can that reasoning, though ever so well founded, impeach or affect the order made in this case? It is an order operating on the person requiring the defendants to permit inspection, not giving authority of force, or to break open the doors of their warehouse. The only consequence arising from the personal mandate is, that in case of refusal the process of contempt issues, and finally the bill is taken pro confesso. The reasoning, therefore, in Semayne's case is out of the question.

[165] It was suggested, in argument for the Respondent, that as courts of equity assist the courts of law to arrive at a judgment in a cause, so by analogy they might assist them in the execution of the judgment upon a fiery facias, or otherwise. But this notion is founded upon a mistaken view of the practice of equity. The assistance given to courts of law by courts of equity is to remove legal impediments, as a nominal title in a third person; and this interference is necessary, because the courts of law have no power to remove the impediment. To assist the execution of a writ of fiery facias would be to make a new law in courts of equity. They proceed always indirectly by process of contempt, in all cases except where the decision is upon a title to land, in which excepted case they decree possession, and direct the sheriff to execute the decree.

What was the origin of the power of the Court, it might be difficult to determine. It now stands upon usage, and is not confined to cases precisely similar to those which have preceded, but is adapted to emergencies to make the jurisdiction of the Court effectual.

Courts of equity giving judgment on the peculiar subject of their jurisdiction in cases of trust or fraud, or other cases, direct possession to be given, or direct tenants to attorn and pay rents, or compel the specific execution of agreements. In case of chattels, they frequently order specific delivery of the article demanded, but enforce their decrees and orders only by process of contempt. In the case of the silver altar (The Duke of Somerset v. Cookson, 3 P. W. 390), which depended on the peculiarity rather than [166] the intrinsic value of the thing, a jury could not have given an appropriate remedy in damages. In such cases courts of equity enforce obedience by process of contempt, and never, but in the excepted case of a decree for land in a judgment upon title, direct the sheriff to take and give possession by force.

In the case of realty, the Court orders the failing party to deliver possession. If he disobeys the order, the sheriff is directed to put the party in possession, for whom the decree is made. In the case of personal chattels, the Court operates on the person by process of contempt, and effects the end indirectly, which, according to their practice in such cases, is not permitted to be done per directum.

In this case the substantial question is, whether such a power in the Court is not necessary for the purposes of justice. It is objected that it is new practice, and that there is no case to be found which warrants it; but the case of Lord Lonsdale (see Notes at end of case) is directly in point, and much stronger than the case now before us for decision.

This is a case where a plaintiff has a claim for a payment out of property, according to its value; and the Court is unable to ascertain the value without inspection. To the extent of the value the plaintiff has an interest in the property of the defendant which is the subject of the order which was made after a decree.

In Lord Lonsdale's Case the order was made before the decree, and upon a question where the rights of the parties were uncertain. It might have turned out, after the order of inspection in that case, [167] that the plaintiff had no right. But in this case his right is ascertained. The only difference (which is immaterial) is, that in that case it was a mine, in this a house; but both are equally private property. In that case the result of the inspection was, a discovery that coal to the amount of £3000 had been taken away from Lord Lonsdale. If the practice of the Court had depended on the will of the party, the defendant in that cause would not have permitted inspection by any person but his own agents. Such an order was made in that case, and there was no appeal against it. So in the case of Lord Byron (1 B. C. C. 588. See also Lane v. Newdigate, 10 Ves. 192), the order was in effect mandatory. But if this had been the first instance, it would not be a substantial objection; for if so, every order made for the first time might be resisted on that ground.

The Lord Chancellor: This appeal is brought before the House, in consequence of a strong impression on the mind of Sir Arthur Pigott, who always misunderstood the order. After the Vice-Chancellor had referred it to the Master, to consider whether it was necessary that inspection should be had, and the motion was made before me to discharge that order, I suggested that the order should not be imperative to inspect, but on the defendants to permit inspection. That suggestion was adopted by the Vice-Chancellor in the order subsequently made, which is now the subject of appeal. This is necessary to be noticed, on account of the reasons appearing in the Respondent's case. That course, I apprehend, is at all events lawful. If the defendants refuse to permit inspection, the Court will then have [168] to consider what ought to be done: whether they will compel the inspection, and how. No such order has yet been made, but the Court can find the way to do complete justice. The time may come, when the defendants may be of opinion that the order is beneficial to them. I do not at present intimate what I mean; it is sufficient to say, that the means of enforcing what is due to justice can be found.

9th March, 1822. Ordered and adjudged, That the said Petition and Appeal be dismissed this House, and that the said orders therein complained of be confirmed.

THE memory of the case mentioned by Lord Redesdale in the text, p. 166, had almost perished in the Profession. The attorneys and agents of Lord Lonsdale in the cause were dead, and all the Counsel, except Lord Redesdale, to whose kind condescension the Reporter is indebted for furnishing a clue to obtain the following account of the case, extracted from the Register's Book.

The Earl of Lonsdale v. J. C. Curwen, Esq.

[Mews' Dig. xi. 402. Discussed in Bennett v. Whitehouse, 1860, 28 Beav. 119, at pp. 120, 121; observed in Bennett v. Griffiths, 1861, 3 E. and E. 467, at pp. 476-7.]

IN this case the Earl of Lonsdale had filed a Bill against J. C. Curwen, Esq. by which, and the affidavit of John Walker, it appeared that the Earl of Lonsdale was seised of the manors of Seaton and Stainburn, and certain closes called the Clossoks, lying on the south side of a rivulet called the Mill Race, near Workington, which divides the manors of Seaton and Workington; that there were mines of coal lying under the Clossoks, belonging to the Earl of Lonsdale, and that J. C. Curwen was seised of lands on the south side of the Mill Race, under which there were mines of coal: That John Walker (who made the affidavit,) had for several years been employed by Mr. Curwen as director of his collieries under ground, and in particular of that part of his collieries where his coals were raised at a colliery called John Pit, and from whence about five years previously, by the direction of Mr. Curwen, he had caused the working of the said pit [169] to be extended and carried into and under the closes called the Clossoks for the length and space of 40 yards and upwards; and also caused large quantities of coal to be dug out and taken from under the closes called the Clossoks, to the amount of 600 waggons, or 2100 tons, of about the value of £300 or upwards; that having been directed by Mr. Curwen to extend the workings farther under the Clossoks, he had remonstrated with Mr. Curwen against his doing so, on which Mr. Curwen had engaged one Edmund Bownass, who had the direction of the E. of L.'s collieries at Clifton, about two or three miles from Workington, to take the charge and direction of the working under the Clossoks: that E. B. afterwards proceeded to have the workings carried on under the said closes to the extent of about 212 yards in length, and in breadth to an average of about 105 yards, and that in consequence of such workings the greatest part of the coals which had been raised at the John Pit for the preceding two years had been dug out of and from under the Clossoks, amounting to 6000 waggons and upwards, of the value of £3000 and upwards, over and above the £300 before mentioned: that Mr. Curwen, about the 13th of Aug. then last, gave orders and directions to the workmen employed in the workings under the said closes to rob or take away several of the pillars which had been left for the carrying on the workings, and which they had ever since been and then were doing, by which means the workings would be destroyed, and it would be rendered impossible for any person to discover the extent of the workings, or the quality of the coals dug and taken away thereout: That Mr. Curwen, in a conversation with John Walker about taking away the coals under the said closes, and the danger of a discovery thereof, asked him whether he (Mr. Curwen) could not drown the workings by letting the water out of his own collieries into the workings, which would prevent any discovery thereof from ever being made, which deponent said he (Mr. Curwen) might do; on which Mr. Curwen directed him to go on: That Mr. Curwen, by letting the water out of his own collieries into the workings would ruin and destroy the workings of very large quantities of coal belonging to the E. of Lonsdale, to a very large and almost inestimable amount. It also [170] appeared by affidavit of J. B. Garforth, that the Plaintiff was seised, etc. and that the Defendant, without permission, was then digging, and carrying away coal from under the lands against the will of the Plaintiff.

The bill prayed an injunction to restrain the Defendant, his servants, etc. from digging or getting coal in or under any of the premises in question, or any part thereof, and particularly from robbing or taking away the pillars which had been left in the workings, and that the Plaintiff, his, etc. might be at liberty to inspect the workings of Defendant under, etc.

Upon a motion for the purpose expressed in the prayer of the bill, it was Ordered (10th April 1799), that an injunction should be awarded to restrain the Defendant, his servants, etc. from digging or getting coals in or under any of the premises in question, or any part thereof, and from carrying on any workings, and in particular from robbing or taking away the pillars which had been left in the workings under the Plaintiff's parcels of land in question, until the, etc. and that the Plaintiff, his servants, etc. should be at liberty to inspect the workings of the Defendant under the Plaintiff's inclosures called the Clossoks. Reg. Lib. A. 1798, p.

By an order, dated the 7th June 1799, reciting the foregoing order of the 20th April 1799, and that it was alleged that John Howard, etc. as agents on behalf of the Plaintiff, on the 29th of April, had proceeded to inspect the workings of the Defendant in, etc. but were prevented from completing such inspection, because the pipe or air-course which conveyed the pure air had been broken down or taken away, and certain earth, rubbish and other impediments, were lying at the ends, roads or passages leading to the workings; and that on the 3d of May, for the purpose of making a further inspection, the agents of the Plaintiff had made a demand in writing that the Defendant should remove all the obstructions and impediments, and also given notice to the Defendant that they should proceed further in the inspection on the 4th of May, but that the Defendant had refused to allow any further inspection of the workings by the plaintiff or his agents; and that it was the principal object of the suit to have the extent of Defendant's workings under the inclosures ascertained: [171] that it was prayed that the Plaintiff, his servants, etc. might be at liberty as often as should be necessary to make further other inspections into the workings of the Defendant, under, etc.; and that in order to enable the Plaintiff, his, etc. so to inspect the same, the Defendant might be directed to restore the several air-courses theretofore used, and existing within the colliery, and to remove the earth, etc. lying at the ends, roads and passages leading to the workings; and that the Plaintiff, his servants, etc. might also be at liberty to use all necessary means to ascertain the workings and the extent thereof: It was ordered that certain persons named in the order should be at liberty to view the mine, and that such persons as the viewers might think proper to appoint, should attend such viewing of the mine; that the Defendant should cause the obstructions to be removed, and open the air-courses as the viewers should think necessary for such inspection, and that the viewers, and such other persons as they should appoint, should be at liberty as often as should be necessary, to make from time to time inspections into the workings of the Defendant under the premises of the Plaintiff, so as to enable the viewers to make a perfect and complete report of the workings.

No further notice of this case occurs in the Register's Book: and according to information communicated by Lord Redesdale, the case was compromised by the payment of a large sum for the coals taken from under the grounds of Lord Lonsdale.

The practice in Courts of Equity of granting orders for inspection of mines, machines, etc. is well settled. But no notice has ever been taken of the point in the books of practice, and no authorities are to be found upon the subject in the Reports of Cases in Equity: except the case in the Court below, of Kynaston v. The East India Company, as reported 3 Swan, 248. and upon Appeal to the House of Lords, now reported in the text, and which case, as it relates to warehouses, is distinct from former authorities, and new in its kind. Two cases of orders for inspection extracted from the Register's Book are therefore subjoined.

Walker and others v. Fletcher and others.

[Mews' Dig. xi. 402. Observed on in Bennett v. Griffiths, 1861, 3 E. and E. 467, at pp. 476-7.]

IN this case it appeared from the allegations of the Bill, supported by affidavits, that the plaintiffs being possessed of divers mines of coal at, etc. which they had for a long time (then) past wrought in copartnership: and that John Harris then was seised in fee, in trust for all the plaintiffs, of a close of land (with the mines of coal under the same), which at the east end abutted on a certain close belonging to the defendant John Fletcher, called the Seggs, and on the south side on another close called Flowered Moss: and that the Defendants had begun to work the same: That there was under the close belonging to the Plaintiffs, called Flowered Moss, and the other closes, called Flowered Moss and the Seggs, a mine or vein of coal of very considerable value: and that the defendant John Fletcher, together with the Defendants Joseph Steel and John Wilson, then were, and for some time then past had been carrying on and working divers collieries and coal-mines in copartnership: and the Defendants as such copartners, or their servants and workmen, about three years before, had sunk a coal pit and erected a fire engine in the close of the Defendant John Fletcher, called the Seggs, at the distance of about 50 yards from the Plaintiff's close called the Flowered Moss, and had ever since worked the said colliery, and had carried on their works from the engine-pit to the rise of the colliery towards the Plaintiff's close: That the Defendants had driven and carried their works towards the south-east corner of the Plaintiff's close, and had caused a drift or course of great width to be dug from the south-east corner, under the Plaintiff's close, for the length of 70 yards: and had also driven four or more boards or drifts out of their colliery into the said drift or course, and had taken from under the Plaintiff's close very great quantities of coals belonging to the Plaintiffs, which was done unknown to the Plaintiffs, and without their privity or consent: That the Plaintiffs had (then) lately begun to sink a coal pit in their close called Flowered Moss, and had thereby or otherwise discovered that the Defendants, or their several workmen or [173] agents, had dug or taken such coals as aforesaid: That a few weeks after the sinking of the pit was begun by the Plaintiffs, the Defendant Steel was present, and declared that the Plaintiffs should never have a colliery or pit there, or to that purport or effect: That every means to prevent the same had since been used by the Defendants, and when the defendants found that such their workings under the Plaintiff's close had been discovered, they caused part of such workings which laid near the pit sunk by the Plaintiff to be filled up, and also plugged the bore hole, and made barriers and walls in their workings under the closes called the Seggs and Flowered Moss, or one of them, and had filled the same with wood, earth, clay and other materials, and thereby prevented the water flowing from the coal under the Plaintiff's close, in such manner as it had before done, and the pit which the Plaintiffs had begun to sink and dig was thereby overflowed with water to the depth of four or five yards, so that the Plaintiffs were prevented from working in and sinking the same; and the water also, by being so stopped, in part forced and extended itself to another colliery which the plaintiffs were working, and which was near a quarter of a mile from the Defendant's Seggs close, and was likely to extend much farther, and considerably to injure such last-mentioned colliery: That from the proceedings of the Defendants, which they still continued to pursue, and threatened to carry on to a much greater extent, unless such plugs, walls, dams and barriers were taken away, the plaintiffs were in great danger of losing the whole benefit and enjoyment of their mine or vein of coals under their close, and their workings in other places might and would be greatly damaged; and the defendants by continuing to carry on their workings under the plaintiffs close had taken and got from under the same great quantities of coals of great value: That in order to discover, and if possible to prevent the proceedings of the Defendants, and the injury done thereby to the Plaintiffs colliery, the Plaintiffs had caused to be sunk in their close, the pit before mentioned, which was of the width of five feet, and of the length of seven feet; that the nearest part of the pit was near six yards from the Defendants close called the Seggs; and that when it had been sunk to about the depth of 32 or 34 yards, the Plaintiffs caused a perpendi-[174]-cular hole to be bored down to the coal, which was at the depth of 35 fathoms, or thereabouts, from the surface, and they found the coals at the bottom of such bore-hole entire; but having had reason to suspect, from the proceedings of the Defendants, and the observations and threats used by them shortly after the Plaintiff's pit was first begun, that the coal had been wrought and taken away within a very short distance of such hole, Jeremiah Harris and Joseph Muncester, on behalf of the Plaintiff, requested leave of the Defendant John Fletcher, and also of the agents or workmen then attending the Defendant's colliery, that Jeremiah Harris, as coal agent of the Plaintiffs and other persons then present, and along with him, might be permitted to go down into the Defendant's coal mine and view the works, but the Defendant John Fletcher refused to comply with the application, unless Jeremiah Harris could show a legal authority to enable him to do so: That the Plaintiffs not being able to obtain a view of the Defendants colliery by means of such applications, the Plaintiffs caused an oblique hole to be bored in their pit, so as to strike the coal at a little distance from the perpendicular bore-hole, that the oblique bore-hole was made in the hollow works made by the Defendants under the Plaintiffs close called Flowered Moss, and was between five and six feet, or thereabouts, on the east side of such perpendicular hole, and when the boring rods in such oblique state had reached the depth of the coal, which happened on or about the 8th of September then last, the boring rods entered into the hollow working made by the Defendant under the Plaintiffs close, and four or five yards, or thereabouts, to the west of the boundary line between the Plaintiffs Flowered Moss close and the Defendants' Seggs close, from which workings the Defendants, their servants or workmen, or some of them, had taken or carried away the coal; and on further examination it had appeared that the Defendants, their servants and workmen, had taken and carried away the coal under the Plaintiffs close, to within 18 inches or two feet, or thereabouts, of the first perpendicular bore-hole; but the defendants having refused to permit the Plaintiffs or their agents to go into and examine their workings, the plaintiffs were not able more particularly to set forth the extent of the workings of [175] the defendants, nor the quantities of coal the Defendants had taken from under the same: That the Defendants had then blocked up their workings, or some of them, under the Plaintiffs Flowered Moss close, by placing framed walls, earth, rubbish, or other works or inventions, to prevent the Plaintiffs and their agents having any access to the same, or making any discovery of the injury done by the Defendants to the Plaintiffs; that the mine or vein of coal under the Defendants Seggs close, and part of Flowered Moss close, belonging to the Plaintiffs which adjoined thereto, dipped to the south, and therefore inclined from the place where the Plaintiffs had sunk the pit towards Seggs close; and that such vein of coal was covered with a bed of coal metal about eight yards thick, which was covered with a bed of stone about four yards thick, and beds of coal, metal and stone, also dipped in the same direction as the coal, and that the water flowed down sunk beds towards Seggs close. And that soon after the Plaintiff had bored the first-mentioned oblique bore-hole in the workings made by the defendants under the Plaintiffs Flowered Moss close, their servants or workmen, had put or caused to be put, a plug or plugs of wood and iron into such bore-hole; and also made or erected walls, fences or barriers in the drifts or workings, which they had filled with earth, clay, stones and other materials, with intent to make the same water-tight, and thereby prevent the water running down from the coal, and the water soon afterwards began to run, and did afterwards rise in the pit to the height of four or five yards, which was then dug down to just within the bed of stone only; that the Plaintiffs had since endeavoured to let the water pass the pit, and to sink the same to the coal, for which purpose the Plaintiffs had caused another oblique bore-hole to be bored near to the first-mentioned perpendicular hole; but when the boring-rods reached to the place where coal should have been, the Defendants, to prevent the Plaintiffs from drawing the rods, and in order to deprive the Plaintiffs of the use thereof, in sinking the pit deeper, fastened the end of the lowest rods used in boring the last-mentioned oblique hole with an iron fork or key, or other instrument or means, in the hollow works made by the Defendants under the pit so sinking by the Plaintiffs in their [176] close, and had actually prevented the Plaintiffs and their workmen from drawing the boring rods upwards, although a very considerable force had been applied for that purpose, and the boring-rods still remained, and were kept fastened by the defendants in the hole whereby the rods were wholly lost, and rendered useless to the Plaintiffs, and the Plaintiffs could therefore no longer work in or sink the pit as they had intended by the usual and ordinary means pursued by them; and the defendants and their workmen had very lately put and placed several wooden machines, inventions or contrivances, called framed dams, in the hollow works leading out of their coal mines to the colliery and mine under the Plaintiffs close, or communicating therewith, by means whereof the water was dammed or blocked up, so far as the said inventions were capable of doing: And the defendants absolutely refused to pull down the walls, framed dams and barriers, and to permit the water to run as it did before: that in order to deter the Plaintiffs from proceeding further in sinking the pit, J. Fletcher the younger, the son of the Defendant Fletcher, had given notice to the Deponent, who was then employed by the Plaintiffs in sinking the pit, that the Defendants framed dams were then closed, and that whoever should be at the bottom of the Plaintiffs pit would be in danger of being blown up, and that he came to give notice of the danger, that if care was not taken they must abide by the consequence after such notice: that by stopping the water from running off, the Plaintiffs had been hindered a very long time, and been put to a very great additional expense in endeavouring to sink their pit to the bottom, and that the water intended to have been stopped by the framed dams rendered such pit in a great measure useless, by means of the water standing at the bottom thereof, in the hollow works made by the Defendants under the Plaintiffs close: that the Plaintiffs, if the pit had been sunk to the bottom, could not win the residue of their colliery adjoining on account of the coal being laden with water, so stopped by the said framed dams: And the Defendant not only threatened, but actually continued and refused to move the same, and threatened that they would wholly prevent the Plaintiffs from working their colliery, and were endeavouring to make the framed [177] dams so tight by wedging as to drive the whole of the water back into the Plaintiffs colliery: and they also threatened and intended to prevent the Plaintiffs from working the coals under their close called Flowered Moss, or whereby the Plaintiffs might be enabled to convert the coals under their Flowered Moss close aforesaid to their own use. And in conformity with the declaration of the defendant Steel, the Defendants had endeavoured and were using and daily pursuing every means in their power to deprive the Plaintiffs from deriving any benefit from their colliery, or from any means of discovering the extent of the injury done to the Plaintiffs by the proceedings of the Defendants and their workmen.

The bill was filed in 1804, praying that the Defendants, their servants and workmen, might be restrained by the injunction of the Court from digging or getting any coals from under the Plaintiffs close, or in any manner digging under the same; and might be ordered to pull down the walls, dams or barriers which they had erected in their workings, whereby the water was prevented from flowing from the coals and colliery under the Flowered Moss close as it did before: And that the workings of the Defendant might be restored to the same state and condition as the same were in before the walls, dams or barriers were made: And that the Defendants, their servants and workmen might be restrained by injunction from making any such erections, or stopping up their works, or otherwise preventing the water from flowing from the beds and veins of coal, and other beds and veins under the said close; and that proper persons to be appointed by the Plaintiffs might be allowed, on reasonable notice being given for that purpose to the Defendants, to inspect the workings of the Defendants under the close called Seggs close, or under or near to the close called Flowered Moss close.

On the 14th of December 1801, a motion was made to the effect of the prayer of the bill: upon hearing which, it was ordered, "That an injunction should be awarded against the Defendants, to restrain them, their servants, workmen and agents, from digging or getting any coals from under the Plaintiffs close in the pleadings mentioned, called Flowered Moss close, or in any manner digging under the same, until the Defendants should fully answer the Plaintiffs bill; and this Court should make another order to the contrary; and the Defendants were to be at liberty to view or inspect the Plaintiffs Agill pit, Walker pit, and the pit in the plaintiffs said close, called the Flowered Moss, in the division of the Defendants lands, on giving a fortnight's notice in writing to the plaintiffs, or one of them, with the name and description of the person to view and inspect on the Defendants part. And it was ordered, that the Plaintiffs should be also at liberty to view and inspect the Defendants pit mentioned in the pleadings, on giving the like notice in writing to the Defendants, or one of them, with the name and description of the person to view and inspect on the part of the Plaintiff. And it was ordered, that the Defendant should remove the framed dams or barriers in their works, as the viewers should direct, who were to cause the same to be removed unless they should be of opinion that the colliery would be thereby destroyed. And it was ordered, that the viewers or inspectors should be at liberty to replace such frames, dams or barriers, if they should think proper, without prejudice to any application the Plaintiffs might thereafter make, to remove them. And it was ordered that no alterations should be made by the Plaintiffs or Defendants in their respective works till after the first view or inspection; but so as not to prevent the regular working of their respective collieries or mines. And the Plaintiffs were to be at liberty to attend each view or inspection of the Defendant, with a viewer or inspector on their parts; and the Defendants were to have the same liberty of attending with a viewer or inspector each view or inspection of the Plaintiffs. And it was ordered, that all views or inspections subsequent to the first, by either the Plaintiffs or Defendants be, on giving a like notice in writing, with the name and description of the person to view or inspect on their parts respectively."

Brown and others v. Moore and others.

In this case it was alleged that the Plaintiff Brown had invented a machine to make bobbin or twist-net, resembling [179] the Buckinghamshire lace net, as made by hand with bobbins on pillows, and in April 1811, obtained letters patent for the exclusive enjoyment and use of his invention in England, for the term of 14 years: that suspecting the defendants, who were manufacturers at Nottingham, of pirating his invention, the Plaintiff bought a piece of their lace, which from the circumstances of the beam-thread traversing diagonally across the work, which was peculiar to the Plaintiff's machine, it was sworn by experienced workmen must have been manufactured by a frame essentially similar to the Plaintiff's, with which they were acquainted, and that the lace so purchased was in all essential particulars exactly resembling the lace made by the patent machine of the Plaintiff; that the bobbins or brass jacks of the Defendant's machine, which had been shown to a witness, were exactly similar to the Plaintiff's, which were also peculiar to his patent machine and never before used in other machines: that a quodam partner of the manufactory of the Defendants had explained to a witness the construction and working of their machine, which according to that description was in all essential points precisely similar in construction to the Plaintiff's machine. These facts being alleged by the bill, and supported by affidavits, an injunction was granted on motion to restrain the Defendants, etc., during the remainder of the term of the letters patent from using the invention of the Plaintiff. Lab. Reg. A. 1811, 1495.

Reg. Lib. A. 1816.

Upon application to dissolve the injunction, the defendants having put in their answer, an order was made, that the Plaintiff should bring such action as he should be advised, and that in the mean time the injunction should be continued. The action (it appears) was tried, and failed partly for want of sufficient proof of the resemblance of the machines. Whereupon an application was made for an issue to try whether the Plaintiff's machine was an original machine for making bobbin lace or twist-net, or only an improvement upon any prior existing machine, and if original, whether the net manufactured by the Defendants was a piracy, which was refused: but the Plaintiffs undertaking to bring an action against the Defendants for infringing the patent right, it was ordered [180] (on the undertaking of the Defendants) that they should admit on the trial, that since the trial of the former action they had made lace with the machines inspected by Mr. Bramah, etc.

It appears, therefore, that there had been an inspection of the Defendant's machine, and the solicitor for the Plaintiff has informed the reporter that such inspection was made under an order of the Court; but he has been unable to find it in the Register's Book. It appears by entries of two orders, on the 22d and 28th February 1817, that after the direction of the new trial, it was ordered on motion, that Mr. Millington, either alone, or in company with Mr. Bramah, on behalf of the Plaintiff, might inspect and see the model of the Plaintiff's machine, marked according to the specification inrolled by Plaintiff J. B. in pursuance of his patent previous to the ensuing trial in the Court of C.P. that Plaintiff should put the machine into a state to work, according to the specification inrolled, etc. and permit Mr. J. M. to see it work in that state on the succeeding morning.—Reg. Lib. A. 1816.

IRELAND.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

COLCLOUGH.—Appellant; STERUM and others,—Respondents [14 March 1821].

[Mews' Dig. i. 367; xiv. 1375, 1397, 1412, 1717. See Conveyancing Act 1881, s. 70. In re Hall Davie's Contract 1882, 21 Ch.D. 41; Jones v. Barnett (1899), 1 Ch. 611; affd. C.A. (1900), 1 Ch. 370.]

A person purchasing lands under a decree is bound to see that the directions of the decree are observed.

Lands in strict settlement, with a power to grant leases, being subject to prior incumbrances, are, by a decree in a suit instituted by the incumbrancers, directed to be sold subject to the charges prior to the deed of settlement. Pending the suit, the tenant for life under the settlement grants leases not authorized by the power, and raises money upon annuities for his life, which he charges upon the lands, and they are sold subject to those charges.

Held (reversing the decree of the Court below), on a suit by the remainder-man in tail, that the sale, subject to charges not warranted by the decree, is void.

Where considerable delay has occurred in the prosecution of a suit, costs are not to be given, although the decree is reversed.

Sir Vesey Colclough, upon his marriage in 1767, being tenant in tail of a manor and lands called Tintern, etc., subject to portions, etc., conveyed them by deeds of lease and release to a trustee in fee (subject to a term of one thousand years thereby created) to the use of himself for life, remainder to the sons of the marriage successively in strict settlement. The incumbrances then affecting the estates, according to a covenant in the settlement, did not exceed £14,000. The [182] term was created for the purpose of raising £3000 according to the appointment of Sir Vesey Colclough, and the trustees of the term had a discretion to raise a further sum of £3000 for the use of Sir Vesey by sale or mortgage; and it was provided, that the interest of the existing incumbrances, and of the two sums of £3000, when raised, should be paid out of the rents and profits of the estates by the trustees of the term, and that Sir Vesey and the successive owners of the freehold for the time being should receive the residue of the rents and profits. By the settlement, a power was given to Sir Vesey of leasing for three lives, or 31 years, in possession, etc. for the best rent without fine, etc.

In July 1767, the deed was registered, and a fine levied according to covenant. The Appellant was the eldest and only surviving son of the marriage. The two sums of £3000 were raised under the power, and paid to Sir Vesey; but the trustees of the term permitted Sir Vesey to receive all the rents of the estates, and omitted to pay the interest upon any of the incumbrances affecting the estate.

In 1772 a bill was filed in Chancery in Ireland by the husband of one of the daughters of Caesar Colclough, the grandfather of Sir Vesey, and others, who were entitled to prior incumbrances affecting the lands in settlement, praying that the debts owing to them, and charged on the lands, might be raised by a sale.

In 1778 a decree was made in the cause, referring it to the Master to take an account of the incumbrances affecting the lands comprised in (and prior to the registry of) the settlement of 1767, of [183] the yearly value of the lands, and the parts most proper to be sold. The incumbrances were accordingly ascertained; but the yearly value of the lands, and what parts were most fit to be sold, were not stated in the report.

In August 1778 Caesar Colclough was appointed receiver, in the suit instituted as before mentioned, to raise the sums charged upon the lands.

In 1780, by the final decree in the cause, the incumbrances mentioned in the report, amounting to £25,000, great part of which was an accumulation of interest, were declared to be charges on the estates comprised in the settlement of 1767, which settlement was recited in the decree; and it was decreed that those incumbrances should be paid, or that the lands should be sold for payment. Pending the suit to raise the prior incumbrances, annuities charged on the lands for the life of Sir Vesey, and leases not authorised by the power, were granted by Sir Vesey to Caesar Colclough, the receiver in the suit.

In 1781 the lands were set up to sale in the Master's office, subject to the annuities, and the leases, and were purchased by Thomas Richards. The deed by which the lands were conveyed to him recited the grants of the annuities, and that the lands were sold subject to them.

At the date of these transactions the Appellant was an infant. Sir Vesey, his father, had been appointed and acted as his guardian, and among other things signed, in his name, the deed of conveyance to the purchaser under the decree. Sir Vesey died in 1794, leaving the Appellant, his [184] eldest son, who, under the limitations of the settlement of 1767, became entitled to an estate tail in the lands, subject to a jointure and portion.

At the time of his father's death the Appellant was a prisoner in France, and so remained until the year 1805.

In 1802 a notice was served upon the Respondents, who were the co-heiresses of Thomas Richards, the purchaser, and their then intended husbands, that it was the intention of the Appellant to impeach the purchase made under the decree.

The bill in the cause, which was the subject of appeal, was filed against the Respondents in 1805, praying that the deeds of conveyance to Richards might be declared fraudulent, and void, that possession of the lands might be restored to the Appellant; and that the Respondents should account for the rents, etc., the Appellant offering to pay the purchase-money, with interest.

The cause was heard in 1811 on pleadings and proofs, when the bill was dismissed. The appeal was against the decree dismissing the bill.

For the Appellant, Mr. Agar, Mr. Shadwell, (Mr. Seton.)

For the Respondents, Mr. Wetherell, Mr. Lovat.

Lord Redesdale, after stating the facts of the case, proceeded to the following effect:—It is to be observed, that according to the express declaration of the decree, all the debts and incumbrances subsequent to the registry of the deed of 1767, were [185] excluded, for the estate was thereby directed to be sold for payment of incumbrances prior to the registry of that deed. That Vesey Colclough was no distress is evident. The lands were under the dominion of a receiver; annuities had been granted, by which they were improperly burdened; and it was under these circumstances that the auction took place. Part of these transactions has been the subject of another suit (Colclough v. Bolger, 28 June 1816, MS.; and Dow, v. p. 54), in which the decree of the court below was reversed on grounds and under circumstances in some respects, but not altogether, similar to the present case. It appears that from the death of the father in 1794, the Appellant was a prisoner in France till October 1805. A part of this estate was sold to a Mr. Richards, and the transaction is impeached on the ground of fraud: the purchaser having obtained the estate at an under-value was held a party to the fraud, whether personally, or by the medium of an agent, is immaterial. The estate was put up to sale subject to two annuities granted by Sir Vesey Colclough to Caesar Colclough, for the life of Sir Vesey. It is clear that such a sale was not warranted by the decree, which included only incumbrances prior to the settlement of 1767, rejecting those which were subsequent. It appears to me that the Appellant was injured by the sale subject to those annuities during the life of his father, which reduced the value of the estate to that extent, and which induced the party to buy the annuities at a sum greater than was advanced to Sir Vesey Colclough. To the [186] extent of those sums at least the estate was injured in value.

It is argued that persons purchasing under the authority of a decree ought to be safe; but it is a settled maxim of equity, that persons purchasing under decrees of the court are bound to see that the sale is made according to the decree. In a case, the name of which I do not at this moment recollect, it was laid down by Lord Hardwicke, that it was the business of a purchaser to see that the persons who had the right to convey were before the court. If he takes a title which a decree in an imperfect suit does not protect, he must abide the consequence (see Giffard v. Hart, 1 Scho. and Lef. 386. Hamilton v. Houghton [2 Bli. 169]). On these principles the Appellant has a right to impeach the transaction. The decree protects parties only according to its terms. The provision of the decree was, that the estate was to be sold, subject to incumbrances prior but not subsequent to the settlement of 1767. And as to these latter incumbrances, the decree directed that the estate should be free from them. On this account the judgment is erroneous, and the purchase is with notice, because the title is founded on the decree: the purchaser had, moreover, full notice of the settlement, because it is recited in his conveyance. Such a sale, therefore, cannot be protected by the decree. Another objection to the proceeding is, that the estate was sold subject to leases which had been granted under pretence of the power, but were in fact contrary to it. It is probable, from circumstances established in evidence [187], that the leases were fraudulently granted by Sir Vesey Colclough; that the purchaser had notice of the undervalue there is strong circumstantial proof, sufficient to impeach the transaction on that ground. It is not, however, necessary to resort to the ground of fraud; and without resting my opinion at all on that circumstance, but confining my view solely to the fact that this sale was made subject to the annuities, I think the decree is wrong: that is a clear ground: the other might require further investigation. Instead of dismissing the bill, the Court below ought to have granted relief. The consequence, if the sale is to be impeached, will be that the estate must be held by the trustees only as a security for the money paid into Court upon the purchase, with interest. The purchasers must, under the circumstances, be answerable for the rents of the estate from the death of Sir V. Colclough, not at an earlier period, though Sir V. Colclough was bound to keep down the interest of incumbrances. The rents and profits must be set against the principal and interest, and the balance paid into Court. The estate must be re-conveyed to the Appellant under the settlement of 1767. As to the lease subsequently granted by Sir V. Colclough being without consideration, and charged to have been fraudulently done by the aid of the receiver, the estate must be relieved from that incumbrance. As to the other leases, if they can be impeached, he may, as tenant in tail, try that question in a Court of law. The decree must be reversed, with a direction that the Respondent is liable for the rents, but that the purchase-money is a lien upon [188] the estate. The rent to be charged ought not to be higher than what is reserved upon the lease. On payment of the balance (if any) of the purchase-money above the rent, the Respondent must re-convey the estate to the Appellant, in tail, with remainders, according to the settlement.

The Lord Chancellor: If this decree is to be reversed it may be expedient to delay the final settlement of the order, that the parties may have the opportunity of suggesting any correction of the minutes, or supplying any defects.

The reversal of the decree may be a hardship upon the present Respondent; but if justice requires such a measure, the consideration of hardship must be disregarded. The decree cannot be supported unless the doctrines of Equity in Ireland differ from those in England. Sales under decrees are entitled to protection when they are conformable to the decree, but not otherwise. It might be consonant to moral justice to set a value upon the annuities, and add that value to the purchase-money; but where parties have made a purchase contrary to the authority of the decree they cannot be permitted afterwards to conform for the purpose of taking the benefit of the decree. As to the lease, the main defect is the under-value. In other respects there is strong ground for suspicion, but that is not a safe ground for decision. Judicial acts, in cases of fraud, must rest on clear evidence. By the decree, the Master was directed to inquire what parts of the estate were most fit to be sold. No report was made on that point: but whether that defect [189] ought to affect the purchaser may be questionable, since the Court itself ought to have noticed that defect in their proceedings. But the decree reciting the settlement directs a sale of the estates subject to incumbrances of a particular period. The estates are in part sold subject to after incumbrances, in which the purchasers had an interest, and directly contrary to the decree. The loan of money—the purchase of the annuities—the leases at undervalue, and other circumstances appearing on probable evidence, furnish grounds of suspicion. But at all events it is clear that a decree not obeyed, but violated, cannot be a protection to a purchaser.

Lord Redesdale: The length of time which has occurred between the death of Sir Vesey Colclough and the filing of the bill is a reason why costs should not be given.

Die Merc, 14 Mar. 1821. Ordered and adjudged, That the said decree complained of in the said appeal be and the same is hereby reversed; and it is declared, That the sale of the lands of Curraghduffe, Cloneburne, and Ballycreene otherwise Ballyvoereene, in the pleadings mentioned, ought to be deemed fraudulent, and void as against the Appellant, and the several other persons claiming after him under the deeds of settlement of the 12th and 13th of June 1767, and ought to be set aside, so far as the same affected the interests of the Appellant, and the several persons claiming after him under such settlement: And it is further declared, That the deeds of conveyance of [190] the 7th and 8th of March 1782 of the said lands of Curraghduffe, Cloneburne, and Ballycreene otherwise Ballyvoereene, ought to stand as securities only from the death of Sir Vesey Colclough for the sums of money actually paid by the said Thomas Richards, deceased, for the purchase of the said lands, according to the orders of the said Court of Chancery, together with interest for such sums of money from the death of Sir Vesey Colclough: And it is further ordered, That it be referred to one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery to take an account of the sums of money so paid by the said Thomas Richards, in pursuance of the orders of the said Court, and to compute interest thereon from the death of the said Sir Vesey Colclough; and also to take an account of the rents and profits of the said lands, which accrued after the death of the said Sir Vesey Colclough, received by the said Thomas Richards in his lifetime, or by the Respondents, or any of them, after his death, or which, without their wilful default, might have been received; in taking which account the said Master is not to charge the estate of the said Thomas Richards, or the Respondents, with any greater rent for the lands subject to the leases in question granted by the said Sir Vesey Colclough, than the rents reserved by such leases, without prejudice to the question whether such leases were void against the appellant, or those claiming under him, under the said settlement of the 12th and 13th of June 1767; but the said Master is not to consider the said lands as subject to any other lease, or any other charge or incumbrance thereon made or created subsequent to the registry of the said settlement, and not warranted by the powers contained in such settlement, and particularly is not subject to any lease or incumbrance made or created by the said Thomas Richards, or any person or persons claiming under him: And it is further ordered, That the said Master do apply such rents and profits, in the first place, in or towards discharge ing [191] the interest accrued after the death of the said Sir Vesey Coleclough, on the sums of money paid by the said Thomas Richards as aforesaid: and in case the same shall appear to have exceeded such interest, then that the said Master do apply the same in reduction of the principal sum: And it is further ordered, That the said Master do thereupon ascertain the balance: and upon payment of any sum remaining due for principal and interest upon balance of such account, or in case such principal and interest shall appear to have been satisfied by the application of such rents and profits as aforesaid, it is further ordered, That all proper parties do join in a re-conveyance of the said lands to the Appellant, according to his rights and interests in the said lands, under the said indentures of lease and release of the 12th and 13th of June 1767, and to the uses of such settlement now capable of taking effect, freed and discharged from any lease or incumbrance made by the said Thomas Richards, or any person or persons claiming under him: and in case, on taking such account as aforesaid, such principal and interest as aforesaid shall be, or appear to have been, overpaid by the application of such rents and profits, it is further ordered and adjudged, That the balance of such account shall be paid to the Appellant by the person or persons from whom such balance shall appear to be due: And it is further ordered and adjudged, That in case it shall appear that the Respondents cannot perfect the conveyance hereby directed to be made, free from incumbrances made by the said Thomas Richards, the Appellant, and the persons claiming after him, under the said settlement of the 12th and 13th June 1767, are entitled to satisfaction for the value of such incumbrances out of the assets of the said Thomas Richards: and that the said Court of Chancery do give all necessary directions for such purpose, but without prejudice to any question between the Appellant and those claiming after him under the said settlement of the, etc. and [192] any person or persons not a party or parties to this suit: And it is further ordered and adjudged, That, as between the several parties to this suit, the Lords do not think fit to give any costs of this suit to this time, but that all subsequent costs be reserved for the consideration of the said Court of Chancery, who shall make such order touching the same as shall be just: and it is further ordered, That the said Court of Chancery do give all necessary directions for carrying this judgment into execution.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

Mrs. JANE LINWOOD, Widow of JOHN LINWOOD, late Farmer at Freugh, and her Six Children, ELIZABETH, JANE, HANNAH, JOHN, THOMAS, and GEORGE LINWOOD, lawful Children of the said JOHN LINWOOD, Paupers.—Appellants: VANS HATHORN, Esq. of Garthland, Writer to the Signet, and others.—Respondents [19th March 1821].

[3 Scots R. R. 333: Discussed in Mackintosh v. Mackintosh, 1864, 2 Macph. 1357, at pp. 1361, 1364.]

An appeal, in which the essential parties are not served with the peremptory order to answer, and do not appear at the hearing, cannot proceed as against one of the Respondents.

Whether according to the practice of the House the hearing of the cause may be adjourned for the purpose of serving the absent parties, on payment of the ordinary costs.—Quære.

Agents and servants acting under general orders, but without the special direction of their master, having cut a tree on the side of a public road, which in falling killed a passenger, the widow and children of the person killed brought an action for damages against the master and the servants, in which action there was a judgment for the defendants. On appeal against this judgment, the agents and servants, as well as the master, were named as parties in the appeal, but were not served with the peremptory order to answer the appeal, nor brought before the House as parties at the hearing. The proceeding was held defective on this ground, as it would deprive the master of the remedy over or relief against the agents and servants, in case of a reversal of the judgment as against the master alone.

Semb. that under the circumstances of the case, if there had been no such defect of parties, damages ought not to have been given.

[194] This action was instituted in the Court of Session in Scotland, by the Appellants, in order to obtain an assythment or reparation for the loss which she and her children have sustained by the death of John Linwood, which was occasioned by the fall of a tree cut down upon the estate of Garthland, belonging to the Respondent, Mr. Vans Hathorn.

The tree was about eighteen inches diameter, and situated on a part of the property of Garthland, only a few feet removed from the public highway leading from the Mull of Galloway to the market-town of Stranraer. It was cut on the 27th November 1812, which happened to be a market-day at Stranraer. Mr. Linwood was riding along the road about mid-day on his way to the market, in company with three neighbouring farmers. No person was placed upon the road, or elsewhere, to give notice of danger, and no rope or other instrument employed to direct the fall of the tree: M Kie and Graham were in the act of cutting it, and a strong wind was blowing from the east, on which side of the road the tree was standing, when Mr. Linwood and his companions rode up: the tree giving way at the moment when he was passing, fell upon him and bruised him so severely, that he expired in less than an hour after the accident.

The Appellants, the widow and children of Mr. Linwood, instituted an action, in which they called as defenders Mr. Vans Hathorn, the proprietor, together with John Hathorn, William Reid, Peter McKie and John Graham, who, as the Appellants [195] alleged, were all concerned in the transactions as the agents and servants of Mr. Hathorn.

The summons concluded, that these several persons "ought and should be decreed and ordained to make payment, conjunctly and severally, to the pursuers, of the sum of £2000 sterling as a reparation to them of the great loss and damage which they have sustained, and will sustain, by the said John Linwood being deprived of his life in manner aforesaid," besides expenses of process, and of extracting the decree.

Parties having been heard, and the Appellants having put in a condescendence by appointment, which was followed with answers, Lord Craigie, (Ordinary) allowed them a proof of their allegations. Accordingly a proof was led as to the facts founded on in support of the action.

The proof given on the part of the pursuers related, 1. To the situation, and the fact of cutting the tree: the improvident manner in which it was done, and the accident consequent upon it. 2. That the other parties acted under the orders of Mr. Vans Hathorn. On this point the proof did not go to any particular order as to the tree in question, but only as to general agency and management. 3. As to the situation, character and circumstances of Mr. Linwood, as a foundation to estimate the damages sustained. This part of the proof consisted chiefly of his skill as a farmer: his age: the duration of an unexpired lease, and his average farming profits.

Distinct from the pecuniary damage, the Appellants claimed consideration of a solatium due to the family for the loss of a husband and parent.

[196] The proof having been concluded, and the term for proving circumduced, the Lord Ordinary appointed the parties to prepare memorials upon the whole cause, and thereafter he pronounced the following interlocutor: "Having considered the memorial for the pursuers, also the memorial for the defender, Mr. Vans Hathorn, separate memorial for William Reid, another of the defenders (no memorial having been given in for Peter McKie and Matthew Graham, also defenders, nor for John Hathorn, who is now dead), with the proofs brought by the parties, writings produced, and former proceedings, appoints the parties to prepare, print, and box informations, betwixt and the first sederunt day in February next, and makes avizandum with the cause to the Lords of the Second Division of the Court: and at the same time appoints the proofs and writings founded on by the parties, to be printed and annexed to the information for the pursuers, the expense of printing the proofs and writings founded on, in the meanwhile, to be defrayed equally by the parties.*

Informations were prepared in obedience to appointment; and thereafter the following interlocutor was pronounced: "The Lords, on report of Lord Craigie, and having advised the informations for the parties, sustain the defence, assoilzie the defenders, and decern."

The Appellants submitted the case to the review [197] of the Court in a reclaiming petition, which was appointed to be answered, but "The Lords having advised this petition, with the answers thereto, for the defenders, adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refused the desire of the petitioners."

The Appellants, conceiving themselves to be aggrieved, appealed against the above-recited interlocutors.

For the Appellants, the following authorities were cited, on the general liability for direct or consequential damage arising from negligence:—Inst. lib. 4, tit. 3, s. 5. Bankton, B. 1, tit. 10, s. 41. Stair's Inst. 1, 9, 7. Balfour's Pract. 516. Fountainhall's Decis. Index. Ersk. b. 4, t. 4, s. 105. M'Ine*, 8 March, 1810. Elch. Dec. 218, and in D. P. (Laugher v. Pointer, K. B. Trin. Term, 1826; a case not reported).

For the Respondents were cited, on the general question of responsibility, the exception to the rule [198] stated from the Digest, for the Appellants, viz. the casus fortuitus, as a sudden gust of wind, which was stated to be the cause of the accident in this case.—Dig. lib. 9, tit. 2, l. 30, s. 3. That assytlment is only due upon the crime, and when that is established in a competent court, and cannot therefore be due after an acquittal.—Hume on Crimes, vol. 1, p. 448. No. 25, Act. 1593, c. 174.

For the Appellants, Mr. Wetherell, Mr. Oliphant.

For the Respondents, The Attorney-General, Mr. C. Warren.

All the parties in the suit below were named in the petition of appeal; but none of them had been served with an effectual order to answer the appeal; and on the hearing of the appeal Vans Hathorn only appeared. There was, therefore, no effective appeal against the other Respondents: Graham, the party immediately concerned in the act, was one of them. In this state of things it was urged, on the [199] behalf of the Appellants, that the condition of the summons being joint and several, relief might be had against any one or more.

[During the argument, the Lord Chancellor made the following observations.]

The case must be considered as heard ex parte against all the parties but Vans Hathorn. With respect to the other parties, the peremptory order has not been served or applied for; they are not before the House, and the Appellants are not entitled to be heard as against them. The summons says that Graham was acting for the behoof or under the directions of Vans Hathorn, or John Hathorn, or W. Reid, or P. McKie: of such an allegation the sufficiency might be questioned. Proof that Vans Hathorn gave authority to any of them makes a different case. Where a judgment is given against several defendants, the plaintiff may take execution against one, and for the one who pays the damages the judgment itself and the fact of payment is evidence against the others for the purposes of contribution; but where there is a judgment of acquittal, the difficulty is great. The Master, in such a case, could never proceed against a servant who has been absolved by verdict. The conclusion of the summons is joint and several. But suppose an action against a coachmaster and a coachman, and an acquittal by verdict, could the master afterwards proceed against the servant? There is another way of viewing the case: if Vans Hathorn is liable, Graham also may be liable to him, and he might recover over against [200] Graham; if, therefore, the appeal is given up as against Graham, how can it proceed against Vans Hathorn?

A question then arose, Whether the Appellants paying the costs of the hearing should have liberty to bring all the parties before the House? The Respondent's counsel, the question being put to them by the Lord Chancellor, were not willing to assent to this proposal, and the cause having been fully argued, stood over for consideration.

The Lord Chancellor: In the course of hearing this cause a question presented itself, Whether it was possible that we could proceed to determine it without bringing before the Court third persons who were not effective parties to the appeal at the time when the cause was heard at the Bar? It was at first thought by the House that the cause might stand over, with liberty for the solicitor to apply for leave to bring those parties before the House; that suggestion being made without prejudice to the question, Whether, according to the course of practice of the House, such a petition could now be available? Upon further consideration, however, it seemed expedient to go on to the extent to which the argument could go at the Bar, as it might turn out that the opinion of the House might be, that if those parties had been here the judgment could not be reversed. Having attended to all the circumstances of the case, with all the feeling which belongs to it, and the consequences to the Appellant of the unfortunate accident out of which the cause [201] arises, it does not appear to me that there is sufficient reason to advise the House to reverse the judgment; and I think we may venture to proceed in the present state of the cause, in respect of parties. It would probably have made no difference, as to the result, if the other parties had been here; because, in the circumstances of the case, it appears to me that the same judgment would have followed. The ordinary question being put, that the judgment should be reversed, I must humbly express my opinion that it ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

Messrs. DENNISTOUN, BUCHANAN and Company, Merchants in Glasgow.

Appellants: DAVID LILLIE and others, Underwriters in Glasgow. Respondents [5th April 1821].

[Mews' Dig. xiii. 1166, 1196; 3 Scots R. R. 636.]

Agents of the owners of a ship, by a letter, saying, "The Brilliant will sail from Nassau for Clyde on the 1st of May, a running ship," instruct their correspondents to effect an insurance on the ship, which is done accordingly by them, showing this letter to the underwriters. There being a favourable opportunity of convoy, the ship sailed on the 23d of April. On the 11th of May she was captured. Held, in the court below, and on appeal, that the expression of the letter was positive, and not the statement of an expectation, and that the exhibition of the letter being a representation material to the risk covered by the policy, which was not true in fact or in the event, vitiated the policy.

Upon the 17th of June 1811 the Appellants, Messrs. Dennistoun, Buchanan and Company, merchants in Glasgow, received a letter of advice from Messrs. William Doul and Company, their correspondents at New Providence, dated 2d April 1814, containing copies of their letters to the Appellants of the 19th and 24th of March preceding.

The following are extracts of such parts of the letters as relate to the subject of insurance. By the [203] letter of the 19th March the Appellants are informed thus: "At a prize sale of a South Sea whaler and her cargo of oil, that took place here yesterday, we purchased on your account about 40,000 gallons of spermaceti oil, at 3s. 9½d. sterling per gallon; 14,000 gallons of which we intend to ship upon that remarkable fast-sailing schooner Brilliant, of 157 tons burthen, mounting six nine-pounders, to sail, with or without convoy, about the first of May; and on the value of which shipment you will please to make insurance. Messrs. Seton and Elliot will ship on board the Jessie 60,000 lbs. St. Domingo coffee, which they wish you to have insurance done for at 50s. per 100 lbs., and 17,000 lbs. Cuba coffee, at 60s. per 100 lbs. They also wish you to have insurance effected on the Brilliant from hence to Greenock, valuing her at £1400 sterling; to all of which we beg your attention." The letter of the 24th says, that the Brilliant would be cleared out as bound to Greenock and a port on the Continent. And in the letter of 2d April Messrs. Duff and Company state, towards the conclusion of the letter, which relates to a variety of other matters, "The Brilliant will sail on the 1st of May, a running vessel, in which the writer of this will take his passage."

Upon these advices an insurance was effected, on ship and goods, on the 18th of June, being the day after receiving the letters above quoted, although the contract or policy bears date on the 21st of June, three days later. At the time of entering into the contract the letters of advice were shown to the Respondents, who were some of the under-[204]-writers at Glasgow, with whom the insurance was effected.

The terms of the policy were, "From Nassau to Clyde, with leave to call at all ports and places whatsoever, for convoy, or for any other purpose whatever, without being deemed a deviation; and with or without letters of marque, leave to chase, capture, man and convoy, or send into port or ports, any vessel or vessels."

The insurance was done at the rate of six guineas per cent., to return three pounds per cent. "for convoy for the voyage, or two pounds per cent. for partial convoy and arrival."

About the 20th of April His Majesty's ship Martin came into the harbour of Nassau, and being bound for Halifax, the commander offered to take the Brilliant under his protection. This being considered a great advantage, as the risk of capture between Nassau and Halifax was imminent, extraordinary exertions were used to complete the loading of the Brilliant, and she sailed under convoy of the Martin on the 23d of April, being about eight days earlier than the date of sailing proposed in the foregoing letters.

Upon the 11th of May the Brilliant was captured by an American privateer, and carried into Boston.

When the intelligence of the capture arrived, the Appellants applied to the underwriters, and many of them settled the loss. But the Respondents resisted payment: whereupon the Appellants brought an action before the Court of Admiralty, concluding for payment of the sums respectively underwritten for them; and, after the usual pleading, the Judge Admiral pronounced the following interlocutor:— [205] "The Judge Admiral, having advised the libel, defences, answers, replies, and writings produced, finds, that by a letter, dated the 19th of March 1814, from William Duff and Company, the correspondents of the pursuers, of New Providence, to them, they mentioned the ship Brilliant, a remarkable fast-sailing schooner, was to sail, with or without convoy, about the 1st of May; and that by an after letter dated the 2d of April last, 1814, the incorrectness of the word 'about,' as applicable to the 1st of May, was explained by the same correspondents informing the pursuers that the Brilliant was to sail for New Providence on the 1st of May, a running vessel, and in which the writer of this (William Duff) will take his passage: Finds it admitted, that these letters were communicated to the defenders, whereby they saw that the vessel was positively intended to remain in New Providence, and not to sail therefrom till the 1st of May last, and under this impression subscribed the policy in question: Finds, that the Brilliant sailed on the 23d of April from New Providence, and, for any thing known, may have been captured before the 1st day of May, when she was held forth to the defenders as remaining in the harbour: Finds, therefore, that although the representation made by the pursuers was absolutely innocent on their part, the fact stated by them to the defenders was not verified, and a material change was thereby made in the risk undertaken by the latter; and therefore assilizes the defenders, and finds them entitled to expenses."

[206] The Appellants brought the foregoing interlocutor under review of the Judge Admiral, by petition, and the interlocutor thereon was, "The Judge Admiral having advised this petition, and another dated 23d February last, with the writings produced, remains of the same opinion, that the risk which the underwriters undertook, being confessedly that on a vessel to sail on the 1st of May, was perfectly different from one on a vessel which sailed on the 23d April, inasmuch as the defenders undertook a risk on a vessel understood to be in the harbour, and safe on the 1st of May, when in fact she had been eight days at sea. Refuses this petition, and adheres to the interlocutor complained of."

"Note.—The petitioners do not seem to dispute, that if the vessel had been taken before the 1st of May they would have had no argument. They however state that the vessel was not captured till 11th May. This, in real reasoning, makes no difference, since it is a thousand chances to one that if she had not sailed till 1st May she would not have fallen in with the vessel which took her. The case of a vessel sailing the day before she is represented to sail is quite different from that of a ship being detained by unavoidable accidents beyond that day. In fact, it is an insurance on a vessel in jeopardy, when she is represented to be comparatively safe." And on the 19th of April 1815, the Judge Admiral modified the defenders account of expenses to £10 1s. 1½d., and decreed against the Appellants for payment of the same, and for the fees of extracting the decree.

[207] The Appellants pursued an action of reduction before the Lords of Council and Session of the foregoing interlocutors pronounced by the Judge Admiral. This action was discussed before Lord Pitmilly, Ordinary, who pronounced an interlocutor, repelling the reasons of reduction, etc.

The Appellants submitted the question to review in a representation, to which answers were given in; but the Lord Ordinary adhered to the interlocutor.

The Appellants then brought these interlocutors under review of the Second Division of the Court of Session by a petition. The Lords adhered to the interlocutors complained of, etc.

The appeal was against the foregoing interlocutors.

On the part of the Appellants distinctions were taken between a warranty and a representation,* and it was contended that the letters exhibited did not amount to a warranty, or any thing more than a representation, which was not material; and that the statement of a future event, as an intended day of sailing, can be no more than an expectation.—Boorden v. Vaughan (10 East, 445); Hubbard v. Glover (3 Camp. N. P. C. 313); Barber v. Fletcher (Doug. 305. In this case the word expected was used); Bice v. Fletcher (Doug. 271. See also Park, p. [313, 479].) It was [203] further argued, that the representation not being made malis fide, the policy was not vitiated by such a misrepresentation.

For the Respondents it was contended, 1. That the day of sailing was a fact material to the risk, and being within the control of the Appellants, a statement of intention was equivalent to a statement of fact. 2. That the vessel having sailed on the 23d of April, was, at the time when the insurance was effected, what is termed "a missing ship."—Ratliffe v. Shonlired (Park, 180; Marshall, 1, 168); Talbot v. Bratton (Park, 182; Marshall, 167).

For the Appellants, The Attorney General, Mr. Abercrombie.

For the Respondents, Mr. Wetherell, Mr. Denman.

[In the course, and at the conclusion of the argument, the Lord Chancellor made the following observations.]

The second letter, in which it is expressed that the vessel will sail on the 1st of May, was shown to the underwriters, and is it not the same thing whether the party means to misrepresent, or whether the thing actually communicated is a misrepres-

* Pawson v. Watson, Cowper, 790; Park on Insur. c. 10, 203, 205, c. 48, pp. 321, 322; Marsh on Insur. c. 9, s. 2, p. 312.

sensation? The authorities turn upon the difference between expectation and representation. In the case of Barber v. Fletcher the representation is, that the ship is expected to sail. If the accuracy of a representation as to time is to be given up, that doctrine must apply equally to the question [209] of place. The letter of the 2d of April speaks in terms of uncertainty as to the sailing of the Dart and the Jessie, but as to the Brilliant the statement is positive. Do the Appellants carry their arguments so far as to assert, that in cases which go beyond expectation, where there is a misrepresentation of a material fact, without a warranty or malâ fides, the policy, according to the authorities, is not vacated? In the case of such a misrepresentation, malâ fides is not necessary to render the contract inoperative. The principle of the judgment is the same in all the cases, although we cannot agree in all the decisions. The principle, and the application of the principle, are different things. To maintain the argument for the Appellant it is necessary to contend, that if the vessel had been captured on the 2th of April the underwriters would have been liable.

The Lord Chancellor: This case resolves itself into two questions:—First, whether the representation was made, of which there is no doubt: and secondly, whether it is a representation of an expectation, or a statement as of a past fact, which is material to the risk.

I have formed an opinion upon the subject, but wish to give it further consideration: and this is the more necessary, as this branch of law is not well understood in Scotland. The case is to be determined upon a consideration of the facts, as a jury would decide under the direction of a judge as to the law applicable to those facts. The question for a jury would be, Was there in this case a misrepresentation of a material fact affecting the risk covered by the policy.*

The Lord Chancellor: In the absence of the noble Lord (Redesdale), who was present at the hearing of this appeal, and by his desire, I suggest, that upon inspection of the policy of insurance (which is not sufficiently stated in the printed cases), it appears to be a policy upon the ship, as well as goods. It is not therefore like the case of Borden v. Vaughan, which was cited on the argument. In that case the policy was effected by the owner of goods, and on goods only. If there should be any desire to make further observations on the matter of the policy, they may be suggested at the meeting of the House on Wednesday.

The Lord Chancellor (after stating the question on the appeal): There is a difference between the representation of an expectation and the representation of a fact. The former is immaterial: but the latter avoids the policy if the fact misrepresented be material to the risk. After the most attentive consideration of the case it appears to me that the judgment of the court below is right.

Judgment affirmed.

ENGLAND.

(ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

CONINGSBY NORBURY, Esq.—Appellant: The Honourable and Reverend PEARCE MEADE, and ELIZABETH his Wife, and SAMUEL STED, Esquire.—Respondents [9th April, 1821].

[Mews' Dig. i. 330, 364; viii. 724. Discussed in Andrews v. Dwyer, 1833, 2 Cl. and F. 332.]

A Plaintiff in equity must state his title in his bill, and, unless it is admitted by the Defendant, must prove it.

In suits for tithes, the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity is limited to discovery and account. The title to tithes, as of other real property, is a question of a legal right upon which a Court of Equity has no jurisdiction: and if the title is disputed and doubtful, the Court has no right to make a decree.

* Before the motion for judgment was finally made, the Lord Chancellor intimated that the House would (if desired) hear a further argument on the terms of the policy: but the proposal was declined by the agents.

A person suing as lay impropriator, for the tithes of a parish in which there has been within living memory a parish church and a burial ground, in order to establish his title, must show that there has been an appropriation, and when it was made; because if it was not prior to the 15th Ric. II. c. 6. it is further necessary, according to that statute, that an endowment of a vicarage should be shown, and if the Plaintiff does not allege and prove either that the appropriation was before the 15th Ric. II. or that a vicar has been endowed, prima facie the appropriation is invalid.

Lands which had belonged to one of the lesser monasteries were not exempted as such from the payment of tithes in the hands of the grantees of the Crown, under the stat. 27 H. VIII. c. 20. At common law it has been held, that if such lands were otherwise discharged of tithes the discharge being terminated by the dissolution of the monastery, the right of the ecclesiastical rector revived: but as between two monasteries, the one holding an impropriate rectory, and the other lands within the rectory, whether the same doctrine is applicable. —Quære. Semb. that the case is not similar to a claim of exemption, as derived from a religious order, nor from unity of possession, but both bodies being capable of making an alienation, the monastery [212] having the impropriate rectory might convey the tithes to the other body holding the lands. It is the case of a right of exemption by conveyance, and semble, that it is a title which admits of proof by presumption.

Upon a lease of tithes, by a lay impropriator, if the tithes of particular lands are excepted, it might admit of the construction that the lessor is entitled to that which he excepts. But if a former owner of the tithes upon a lease has made a parol declaration that he is not entitled to the tithes of those lands, that declaration is in itself important evidence, and gives a construction to the exception in the lease.

The original Bill filed in this cause in Easter Term 1810 stated that the then Complainant, the Bishop of Dromore, in Ireland, was seised of the impropriate Rectory and Parsonage of the parish of St. Nicholas, in Droitwich (Worcestershire), and thereby entitled to the great and small tithes arising within the parish. That from the time of Plaintiff's seisin the Defendant held and occupied a certain farm in the parish, for which he had paid tithe by an annual composition till Michaelmas 1807, but that since that time he had refused to pay the Plaintiff such composition for the small tithes; and that besides the said lands, the Defendant occupied other lands, called the Lower Friars (about seven acres), on which he had reaped and mown grain, pulse, hay and clover, and had agisted barren cattle, the tithe of which he had not paid. Upon this statement the bill prayed an account and de rec for the single value, &c.

The Defendant by his answer denied the title of the Plaintiff to all tithes as impropriate Rector; admitted his possession of the lands mentioned in the Bill; but contended, as to the farm before mentioned, that the composition which had hitherto [213] been paid was in satisfaction to Plaintiff, or his agents, for the great tithes only, and denied that he was entitled to small tithes; and he alleged, that in case any small tithes were payable, the Rector would be bound to contribute to the repair of the church, and to provide some ecclesiastical person to perform the duties within the parish, to whom such small tithes would have been payable if due at all; and that as no such person had been provided within memory, there must, therefore, at some former period have been an agreement between the then impropriate Rector and the parishioners, that in consideration of his foregoing the small tithes in the parish he should be relieved from the duty of serving and repairing the church: in proof of which, (the answer alleged) there had been no service performed in the church in the memory of any person living, except in two instances, within the last thirty years, of two persons having been buried in the churchyard; that the church itself was dilapidated, and that the tower, with a bell therein, and the outside walls of the old church, were standing till within a few years; but that the walls and bell had lately been pulled down by the orders of the Plaintiff for the purpose of disposing of them for his benefit, and that the parsonage-house had, till about ten years previously, been standing, and was inhabited, but that one of the late lessees of the tithes had since pulled it down, and disposed of the materials: and that in further evidence of such agreement there had never been any small tithes in kind, or any composition in lieu thereof, paid in the memory of any person living, except that two of the late lessees had demanded and received from some cottagers or [214] small householders a trifling composition in lieu of vegetables growing in their gardens: and submitted, that the Plaintiff was not, under the circumstances, entitled to any small tithes, or that if he were, it was his duty to procure the parish church to be served, and contribute to its repairs, and rebuild the parsonage house.

The Appellant also in his answer admitted his occupation, and having had titheable articles upon the lands called the Lower Friars, without paying or making any satisfaction for the tithes: and stated that he occupied those lands by virtue of a lease granted by the Marquis of Exeter, then deceased, and his wife, formerly Emma Vernon, the then owners of the land: and that he believed the lands called the Lower Friars were part of the possessions of the dissolved Priory of the Friars Augustines, in Droitwich, commonly called the Augustine Friars, and were granted by letters patent, bearing date the 24th of February, in the 34th year of the reign of King Henry VIII. to John Pye and Robert Were alias Browne, in fee: and the same were afterwards, by bargain and sale, bearing date the 2d of February, in the 2d year of the reign of King Edward VI. duly conveyed to Sir John Packington, knight, his heirs and assigns, who at that time, as the Appellant had been informed, was, or claimed to be, entitled to the tithes of the lands. The Appellant, by his answer, further stated, that he believed that the lands and the tithes thereof (in case the said Sir John Packington were entitled thereto), were afterwards duly conveyed and granted by divers mesne conveyances to several persons, and at length were conveyed and granted to, and had been vested in, an ancestor of Emma Vernon, one of the lessors [215] under whom the Appellant was in possession, and through which ancestor, the Marquis of Exeter, and his then wife, derived title. And further stating, that by such means, or otherwise, the tithes of the said lands had been duly granted, and legally passed to, and became vested in, the owners of the land, and had descended upon, and became vested in, Emma Vernon, and by means thereof, or otherwise, the lands were exempt from the payment of tithes in kind, or any satisfaction in lieu thereof, and that no tithes in kind, nor any satisfaction in lieu thereof, had ever, within the memory of any person living, or since the lands were, as before stated, conveyed to Sir John Packington, been paid for the lands in question. But on the contrary, such lands had always been deemed, and reputed to be, tithe-free, and no demand had ever been made upon any owner or occupier of such lands for any tithes in kind, or any satisfaction in lieu thereof, until the exhibiting of the Plaintiff's original Bill.

The cause being at issue, witnesses were examined on the part of the Plaintiff in the suit, but not on the part of the Appellant. The parol evidence on the part of the Plaintiff, who deduced his title to the impropriate Rectory by descent from Sir John Packington, tended principally to show that both the great and small tithes had been always considered as included in the composition which had been paid to the Plaintiff, and as due to him in quality of lay impropriator, and not as vicar, or to any other ecclesiastical person, there having been no such person within memory: and that no claim to any of the small tithes had ever been set up by any other person: and several old leases of the great and small tithes by Plaintiff's predecessors were produced.

The cause came on to be heard and was argued [216] upon the 29th January, 3d and 6th of May 1816. On the part of the Plaintiff, conveyances, leases, a will, and other assurances, commencing as far back as the year 1670, were read to show that the impropriate rectory, and all tithes within the parish of St. Nicholas, in Droitwich, had been conveyed, demised, and disposed of as lay property. In one of the leases, dated the 10th of August 1801, from the Plaintiff in the original Bill to one Richard Smith, the demise is of all tithes in the said parish, except the tithes of the Lower Friars: and the depositions of several witnesses were read to show that the Plaintiff in the original Bill, and those under whom he derived title, had been in perception of the tithes in the said parish: but none of them proved that any tithes had ever been paid, or satisfaction in lieu of tithes made for the Lower Friars: on the contrary, Richard Smith deposed on the part of the Plaintiff, that William Clive-land, a former proprietor of the tithes as lay-rector, under whom the Plaintiff in the original Bill derived title, was in possession of the tithes of the said parish.

except of certain lands in the said parish, a part of which were called the Upper and Lower Friars. On the part of the Appellant, various grants, proceedings and written documents, were produced to show that the Lower Friars had been as early as the 34th Henry VIII., granted out by the Crown, and vested in grantees, some or one of whom (particularly Sir John Packington) was at the same time proprietor, not only of the land, but also of the rectory and tithes, and while he was proprietor of both, granted and conveyed away the land, (but no deed mentioning tithes was produced;) and that by mesne conveyances, descent, or otherwise, the Lower Friars came to the [217] present owners, under whom the Appellant held them as lessee. On the part of the Appellant, also were produced in evidence, three leases, dated the 10th January 1783, 21st March 1786, and 10th March 1788, from William Clieveland to George Bedford, of all the tithes in the parish. The deposition of Richard Smith, read for the Plaintiff, was likewise read for the Appellant, as was also the deposition of George Bedford, (the lessee in the leases before mentioned from William Clieveland,) a witness examined for the Plaintiff, in which he stated, that in the year 1780 William Clieveland, his lessor, set the tithes in the parish of St. Nicholas, which were then in the possession of witness, and which he continued to enjoy till the death of William Clieveland, except the tithes of lands in the said parish called the Upper and Lower Friars, and a meadow called the Vines, comprising, amongst others, the lands in question, which William Clieveland informed the witness were tithe-free.

The cause stood adjourned from the 6th to the 20th day of May 1816, on which latter day the Court (Dissentiente, Wood, B. See 2 Price, p. 338) below delivered their opinions, seriatim, and ordered and decreed, that an account should be taken of the tithes demanded by the original Bill against the Appellant, with costs.

The Appellants, at the hearing, proposed to read a conveyance from Sir John to Thomas Packington, and the will of Thomas, devising the rectory to Mary Packington, through whom the Respondents claimed*; but the Court intimated that such evidence [218] would be useless without showing an express grant of the tithes of the Lower Friars; and as to the other land occupied by the Appellant, it was admitted they had no defence; if the Court were of opinion that the plaintiff had proved his title, which appearing to be the opinion of the Court, the defence was confined to the claim of the tithes of the Lower Friars.

The Respondents became entitled, and were made parties to the suit by a supplemental bill, as the devisees and representatives of the Bishop of Dromore, who died pending the original suit.

The Appellant in the session 1817 presented a petition against this decree, in so far, as an account was thereby directed of the tithes of the Lower Friars, praying that so much of the decree might be altogether reversed, or that a trial at law might be directed upon the legal right before any account should be decreed.

For the Appellant, it was argued that tithes in the hands of laymen are now of a different nature from what they were at common law while they constituted the revenues of ecclesiastics; for by the several statutes respecting the dissolution of monasteries and religious houses, they were made and declared, in the hands of laymen, as temporal inheritances and lay-fees; and more particularly by the statute of 32d Henry VIII. c. 7, that lay persons shall have the like remedies for recovery of tithes in temporal Courts, and, consequently, subject to the like limitations and restrictions as are applicable for lands and other hereditaments. Tithes are thereby also declared to be the subject of, and pass by, the like conveyances and assurances as other temporal possessions; and at this day tithes have all [219] other incidents belonging to temporal inheritances. Since grants of tithes are now capable of being made, and liable to be lost, the same evidence ought to be allowed from whence they are to be presumed, and the want of them supplied, as would suffice in regard to lands and other hereditaments; and the like bar, by adverse possession and length of time, by analogy, ought to be interposed against the remedy for recovery of tithes.

In favour of Holy Church, the policy of the law was that laymen should not prescribe in non decimando, thereby spoiling spiritual persons of their revenues. When tithes were converted into lay-fees the maxims referrible to presumed grants, descents, discontinuances, non-claims, etc. necessarily follow, which were nothing more than the wise arts and inventions of the law to protect and quiet the possession, and strengthen the right of purchasers. The fact of long and uninterrupted retention of the tithes in question creates a legal right, which ought to be tried at law: a Court of Equity has no right to decree upon depositions against it. The adverse claim is against long and quiet possession and enjoyment, and to overturn property in which the owners have thought themselves secure, now beyond all memory of writing, or man. A Court of Equity cannot set aside or decide against the consequences of this legal right; it would be determining a right against constant possession, and constant usage and enjoyment. There is nothing a Court of Equity cannot presume in favour of possession. Possession is every thing; estates are bought by it, and held upon the faith of it; a claim against long possession is always reprobated; and here a Court of Equity, on a question arising on a legal right, ought not, at least in the first instance, and without a previous trial at law, to have determined and made a decree.

* It appears that these documents were entered as read. See the addit. Appx. II.L. iv. 585. 194

The circumstances of this case amount to a long and uniform non-payment and retention of the tithes by the owners and occupiers of the land in question; and not merely a non-claim, but positive disclaimer on the part of one or more of the improPRIATORS, particularly William Cleveland, under whom the Respondents derive title, making several leases of the tithes, with an exception of the tithes from the lands in question, accompanied at the same time by a declaration from the lessor to the tenants that such exception was inserted because the lands were tithe free.

It is true the property in question is small, but the principle to be established by this decision confessedly great. Prescription has no place here; presumed grant is the basis upon which the Appellant rests his defence; arguments of inconvenience deserve attention; tithes of great value in this kingdom are enjoyed under titles similar. The consequence of removing land-marks is dangerous; and why, in the legal code, are tithes to present an anomaly? Why are ingredients which strengthen the title and secure the possession, with reference to other property, to weaken and destroy in this? Why furnish a precedent to shake and render doubtful those rights which length of time and quiet enjoyment had taught the possessors to believe irrevocably fixed in them? A precedent which will encourage innovating speculators to set up new tithe-claims, disturbing the peace of their neighbours in many [221] parishes, and possibly spoil the ancient possessors of their acknowledged rights.

For the Respondents, the case was put upon the ground of the maxim, supported by a long series of uniform decisions, that there can be no prescription in non decimando.

An objection * being suggested for want of proof of the appropriation before the 15 Ric. II. or the endowment of a vicarage, an observation, said to have been made by Lord Chief Baron Thomson (and not noticed in the report of the case,) "that as there was a place of worship there might have been a vicarage endowed," was cited for the Respondents, to which Lord Redesdale replied, that there could be no parish without a church, and that there might be a chapel also; that the original appropriation of tithes was to the incumbent of the church of the parish, and prima facie belonging to him; but that this had been modified, and certain portions of the tithes might be vested in other persons; but it was an exception to the general law.

Upon the objection as to the deficiency of proof of title * in the Plaintiffs, it was urged that the property was conveyed as a rectory in 1642, and devised as such in 1663; that the documents showing title in the Plaintiffs were produced and relied upon by the Defendants; that a grant from the Crown was the best but not the only mode of proof, and the fact being admitted by the Defendants, that there was no need of proof.

It was further urged on behalf of the Respondents [222] that the defence raised by the answer, consisting of title and exemption, was double, uncertain, and inconsistent, which had been held not to be allowable; Ward v. Shepherd (3 Price, 528). That the lands and the rectory being in the same person furnished no ground to presume a release of tithes; that in the cases † where the Courts of Equity had refused to interfere on behalf of a lay-impropriator against the occupier of lands, to enforce tithes, they did so on the ground of long adverse possession and colour of title, supported by documentary proof: that the tithes in question in those cases had been from time to time, for a long series of years, conveyed and dealt with as matter of property. In this case no such proof existed, and as the lands in question belonged to one of the lesser monasteries that furnished no ground to presume an exemption.

On behalf of the Appellants, in reply, upon the objection as to the double pleading of the answer, it was urged that such pleading was allowed in the case of Jennings v. Lettice (3 Gwill. 952); that the words "or otherwise," which seemed indefinite, might refer to conveyances under the statute of Henry VIII. or other modes of conveyance which might be presumed in favour of the Defendant.

For the Appellants, The Attorney-General, and Mr. H. Martin.

For the Respondents, Mr. Wetherell, and Mr. Roupell.

[223] Lord Redesdale *: It may be important to consider how unity of possession may affect the right to tithes. Suppose I had a rectory impropriate, and lands within the rectory which I had leased exempt from tithes, and then conveyed the reversion of the lands as I held them, that would be exempt from tithes. The rectory and the lands having been both in the Crown it is important to inquire whether the rectory or the land were first conveyed. Suppose the grant, and the record of the rectory and of the lands, to have been lost, would not the actual state of things, the enjoyment, furnish a presumption of title?

The Lord Chancellor: In Scott v. Avery (3 Gwill. qua supra) it was decided that a Court of Equity in such a case would not interfere. In one of the cases Baron Eyre said if these doctrines were to be maintained the Courts had gone presumption-mad.

The question is, whether in the face of enjoyment we can interfere; whether we must not leave it to law? The Court of Exchequer, in those cases in which they refused to act did not intend to determine whether there was or was not a title to the tithes, but merely that there was not sufficient ground to warrant a Court of Equity in disturbing the possession.

Lord Redesdale: The real question in Scott v. Avery was, whether there was not evidence of [224] a portion of tithes within the rectory. A portion could not be in lay hands unless it had come through the Crown by grant.

The Lord Chancellor: In the case of a spiritual rector it has been held that there can be no prescription in non decimando. If non-payment of tithes is a different thing, and sufficient to ground a presumption, a title may always be made out; for you may presume first a portion of tithes, and then the loss of a grant.†

Two preliminary questions may be raised in this case, the first, whether the title of the Plaintiff is sufficiently set out in the bill, and supported by proof in the cause? Secondly, whether the points of defence raised by the answer are sustainable?

Lord Redesdale: According to ancient practice, in suits by lay impropriators, the production of the original grant, and a regular deduction of the title by the necessary documents, was required. That practice was altered in consideration of the frequent loss of the instruments of title; but it is still necessary to produce the original grant, and to prove a possession corresponding with the title. If the impropriation has taken place since the 15 R. II. an endowment of a vicarage by tithes, salary, glebe, or otherwise, must also be proved.

[225] The Lord Chancellor: A lay impropriator must claim under his deeds. If he shows uniform exclusive possession, that may raise a presumption in the absence of deeds; but here, neither the title by deed, nor the perception of the tithes, is shown; and yet it is required of the Defendants, if they claim by title, that they should give that strict proof which the Plaintiffs fail to give. The question is, whether they have evidence equivalent to the production of deeds? They claim contrary to the common law. They must show a legal commencement of their title. They must show an impropriation before the 15 Richard II. or the 4 Henry IV., or they must show the endowment of a vicarage. The first of those statutes enacts, that there shall be no impropriation without such an endowment. The second requires that a vicar should be canonically instituted. There is no such vicar in this parish; and the title of the Plaintiff by deed or possession is not clearly made out: the deduction of title in the Plaintiff may be material to the defence. The decision of this case has proceeded on the single ground, that a prescription in non decimando is illegal; but if that is alleged as matter of title it may raise a different question.

At the conclusion of the argument, The Lord Chancellor made the following observations:—

This being the first case involving the particular point, which is of great consequence, and a noble and learned Lord,* who has given particular attention to the subject, being absent, the House ought not to [226] proceed to judgment at present. There is also another circumstance requiring great consideration, provided the case ought to be decided upon the evidence which has been adduced at the bar, attending to the special circumstances under which it is represented this case has come before us. I am sure the House will feel the importance of considering, with great diligence and attention, what they will or will not do after there has been, as represented, a long course of uniform decision in the Courts below; for it will be impossible to give a judgment on the general ground without affecting many decisions which have been made in the Courts below, and probably disturbing considerable property which is at present held under those decisions. If this case, on the one hand, is to proceed on the special evidence to which I have alluded, it ought to be understood that it does proceed on that specialty which occurs in this case; or, on the other hand, if the judgment of the House is intended to reverse all the decisions to which I have alluded, it is fit that question should not be left in the same state of doubt in which it has been represented to exist. It seems necessary, therefore, that you should have some further time for consideration; I wish also to see a copy of the answer, for all the rules of pleading which used to be adopted when I practised in the Court of Exchequer seem to have been lost sight of. In making this observation I do not mean to reflect upon the memory of that respectable gentleman (Mr. Hall), whom I well knew when living, and who drew the answer; but I take it from the answer itself, that he found he had a very difficult case to [227] deal with, and that he felt he must deal with it in the best way he could.

It appears to me that this is a case extremely simple, for the words stand thus (in the Appellant's printed case): "That the Appellant, soon after filing the same original bill, put in his answer thereto, declaring his ignorance of the Plaintiff's alleged title, but admitting the Appellant's occupation, and having had titheable articles upon the lands in question, without paying any satisfaction for or in respect of the tithes; and stating that he was in the occupation of the lands in question by virtue of a lease granted thereof by the late Marquis of Exeter, then deceased, and his wife, formerly Emma Vernon, the then owners of the land, and that he believed the lands," (not the lands and the tithes, but "the lands) called the Lower Friars, were part of the possessions of the dissolved priory of the Friars Augustines in Droitwich, commonly called the Augustine Friars, and were granted by letters patent, bearing date the 24th February, in the 34th year of the reign of King Henry VIII., to John Pye, and Robert Were alias Browne, in fee, and the same " (that is, the lands) " were afterwards, by bargain and sale, bearing date the 2d of February, in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI., duly conveyed to Sir John Packington, knight, his heirs and assigns," (and then, with respect to the title to the tithes, all he says is this,) " who at that time, as he had been informed, was, or claimed to be, entitled to the tithes of the lands:" under what sort of claim, or how [228] entitled, this pleading does not in any manner point out. The words in which it is set forth merely state some unspecified claim to the tithes: then it goes on to say, " that he believed that the said lands and the tithes thereof (in case the said Sir John Packington were entitled thereto)." Now if the declaration of Clieveland, that these estates were tithe-free, is a declaration of any importance, I think we may say this qualifying parenthesis brings down a little the value of the assertion. " he believed that the said lands and the tithes thereof (in case Sir John Packington were entitled thereto) were afterwards duly conveyed and granted, by divers mesne conveyances, to several persons, and at length were conveyed and granted to, and had been vested in, an ancestor of the said Emma Vernon, one of the lessors, under whom he was in possession, and through which ancestor the said late marquis and his then wife derived title thereto: and further stating, that by such means, or otherwise," (and here it occurs to me, which it did not at first, that these words "or otherwise" are put in with great caution and with great propriety, considering there was the parenthesis going before, "in case Sir John Packington were entitled thereto:") "and further stating, that by such means, or otherwise, the tithes of the said lands had been duly granted and legally passed to and became vested in the owners of the land, and had descended upon and become vested in the same Emma Vernon, and by means thereof, or otherwise, the said lands were exempt from the payment of tithes in kind, or any satisfaction in lieu [229] thereof, and that no tithes in kind, nor any satisfaction in lieu thereof, had ever within the memory of any person living, or since the said lands were, as before stated, conveyed to the said Sir John Packington, been paid for the lands in question, but on the contrary such lands had always been deemed and reputed to be tithe-free." This pleading, therefore, simply brings the title down to Sir John Packington. This lessee does not pretend to be the lessee of the tithes, but only the lessee of the lands, which shows the distinction between enjoyment and possession of tithes as a separate inheritance, and leads to the understanding of that principle, whether good or bad, on which the courts have hitherto proceeded: for if Sir John Packington let him the lands, he cannot say he let him the tithes; if he pays a rent for the lands, he enjoys the lands for the payment of the rent; and Sir John Packington has the use and enjoyment of the lands by the payment to him of the rent, but neither he nor the other is in the enjoyment of the tithes; that principle being felt, they found it necessary to go on and lay hold of another defence, and say the lands were exempt from the payment of tithes: that they had always been deemed and reputed to be tithe-free. I do not know in what way at the present day the Court of Exchequer call upon parties to plead; but I think it would not be deemed sufficient simply to aver that the lands were exempt from the payment of tithes, and had always been deemed and reputed to be tithe-free; or on the other hand, if the plea be good as to the exemption from the payment of the tithes, then the question will [230] be, whether there is not a double plea under the title of freedom from the payment of tithes; if you could not make out the freedom from the payment of tithes simply by the party talking with the owner, the Court would never apply that as positive evidence to warrant the taking of tithes in pernaney: it appears to me that this raises very great difficulty in the case, if we are to get at the great point of the case without evidence. I address myself without prejudice, speaking according to my impression of the law, being bound so to state it under the sanction of the cases (a); and according to (unless I greatly misunderstand it) the doctrine which has been laid down by men of talents and knowledge, to which, whether taken collectively or singly, I cannot pretend. The principle they have gone upon is this, that there is a very considerable difference (the grounds of which you may have hereafter to explain) between a mere detainer of tithes, and where tithes have been detained under what is called a colourable title: and it will be found, when you come to discuss that matter, that it is not quite so clear that evidence may be so fabricated at the back of the rector as not to shut it out from being received. Supposing the Court to be bound by that, still you have a long course of decisions which must be considered with all that attention which belongs to principles involving the security of property, and which decisions have been acquiesced in for a long period of time.

This is certainly an important case, and for these [231] reasons, and others which might be stated, I should feel more satisfied in having some time to review my present opinion, and to see whether my recollection is right as to the doctrines of law which I have now stated. It will afford me an opportunity to rectify and correct any errors I may have fallen into, by consulting with a noble and learned person not now present, who has paid great attention to this subject.

(a) Charlton v. Charlton, 4 Will. 705; Ald. etc. of Bury v. Evans, id. 757; Fanshaw v. Moore, id. 780; Jennings v. Lettis, id. 954

The Lord Chancellor: Upon looking to the pleadings and proofs of this cause, I mean to propose that one counsel on each side should be heard upon two points; the first is, the title of the Plaintiff not being admitted by the answer, whether it is sufficiently proved by the evidence; and the other is, supposing the title to be sufficiently proved, whether the pleading, on the part of the Defendants, is the proper pleading to bring forward the points on which the Defendant relies. I propose this course because it is highly expedient that when you are deciding a question of so much importance as the principal point in this cause, care should be taken that the proceeding of the House should not be represented hereafter as a proceeding not quite clear in point of pleading.

It was thereupon ordered, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor, that one counsel on each side be heard upon the question whether the title of the Plaintiff is sufficiently set out and proved; and supposing it to be so, whether the points insisted upon by the Defendant at the hearing are properly pleaded.

[232] Mr. Martin and Mr. Wetherell accordingly argued these points before the House, and the cause then stood over for judgment.

The Lord Chancellor: In the case of Norbury v. Meade, if it should appear to those who are to advise the House, that it is necessary to make any alteration in the judgment, it cannot be proposed without addressing your Lordships at very considerable length upon the doctrines with reference to cases of that nature. It is, therefore, necessary to ask of your Lordships for some further time to consider the proposed judgment.

Lord Redesdale: The question in this cause was considered as principally depending upon this, whether a grant of tithes, from a lay impropriator to the owner of certain lands in the parish of St. Nicholas in Droitwich, ought to be presumed or not; and the arguments principally went originally upon that ground. A doubt was then stated whether the Plaintiffs in the suit, who are the Respondents in this Appeal, had or had not sufficiently shown their title, so as to give them a right to demand of the Court a decree in their favour. The Court of Exchequer have, upon the hearing of the cause, made a general decree with respect to certain lands, as to all tithes, great or small, with respect to which the defence was of a different description. As to the lands which are the subject of this Appeal, they have also made a similar decree, being founded upon the supposition that the defence set up by the Defendants was insufficient, who insisted [233] that under the circumstances of the case those lands ought, in some manner or other, to be presumed to be discharged from the payment of tithes. The defence was not very precise; but upon looking into the case, the title set out by the Plaintiffs was certainly greatly deficient, because the Plaintiffs in that suit claimed as being entitled to an impropriate rectory; but they did not show how they were entitled; and they did not state, in their bill, or produce in evidence before the Court, any thing clearly to show that title.

The Plaintiff in this suit must recover by force of his title; and supposing the defence to be ever so defective, if the Plaintiff does not show a title the Court has no right to make a decree in his favour unless that title is clearly admitted by the Defendant; but here the Defendant unquestionably disputed the title. The consequence was, therefore, that the Plaintiff was bound to prove his title.

The claim was of all tithes, great and small, within this parish; and it appears from the evidence that there was a parish church, and a burial ground appertaining to that church, and therefore that there had been at some time a rector of that church, in whom all the rights of that church were vested. Undoubtedly there might have been an appropriation of that church, but it was very material to ascertain when that appropriation was made, because if the appropriation was made subsequent to the 15th of Rich. II. it could be no lawful appropriation without the endowment of a vicar; and if there was no vicar endowed the appropriation was [234] not good; therefore it was important to make out the title of the Plaintiffs in that suit, that they should have shown, or given some species of evidence to show, that it was an appropriation prior to the 15th of Rich. II., or to show that there was an endowed vicar. They have shown neither, and therefore, primâ facie, the appropriation under which they claim is not a good appropriation, because if it was not prior to the 15th of Richard II., and therefore an appropriation capable of being made without the endowment of a vicar, the consequence was, that being subsequent to the 15th of Richard II. it was not a good appropriation, because the law has expressly forbidden such an appropriation without the endowment of a vicar.

By some means, however, this appropriation was in the hands of one of the monasteries which were dissolved in the reign of Henry VIII.; and there was also in the hands of another monastery a property of land, including the lands which are the subject of this Appeal. The claim set up by the Plaintiffs in this suit was to the whole of the tithes, great and small, of these lands. It is clear from the evidence that the Plaintiffs were not in possession of these tithes, and that the persons, the owners of these lands, and these tenants have constantly insisted that these lands were not liable to pay tithes to the persons who claimed the impropriation.

It appeared that the claim to the impropriation was at one time in the same family in which the lands, now the subject of litigation, were also vested, under the statute of Henry VIII., which had trans-[235]ferred the right both of the impropriation and the lands, if properly vested in the respective monasteries. They are both by grants of the Crown, as it was to be presumed, in one case shown, in the other case not; but they were to be presumed to be vested in the person who set up these different claims. If the Plaintiffs in the suit could not show a distinct title to demand all the tithes, great and small, the Defendants ought not to have been called upon for their defence. The Court, however, seems to have proceeded upon this ground: they assume the right of the impropriation, and then assuming that right, they seem to have conceived that the Defendant must make out his title to hold these lands exempt from the payment of tithes. He could not claim that exemption in right of the monastery from which he derived his title under the statute of Henry VIII., because it was one of the smaller monasteries, with respect to which the exemptions to which they had been entitled were not preserved by the statute. But even here, as I apprehend, the Court made a mistake, because all that has been decided upon that subject amounts only to this: if the monastery which claimed to hold discharged from the payment of tithes, claimed to hold so discharged against an ecclesiastical rector, there the common law said, that the discharge being put an end to, the right of the ecclesiastical rector remained. It may have been, but I cannot find that it has been, decided, that the same thing holds between two monasteries, one claiming an impropriation, and the other claiming land, because both those bodies were capable of making a complete [236] alienation. The monastery which held the impropriation could make an alienation to another monastery of the tithes which were due from the lands of that monastery; and it was not an exemption claimed by a religious order, but a title derived from persons capable of making a title; exemption by the unity of possession is a totally different thing; but this is a case in which their right may be an exemption from the payment of tithes by actual conveyance from one monastery to the other. That such things exist, I know. The conveyance of tithes is capable at least of a species of proof. One monastery having lands, and another monastery having an impropriate rectory, they came to an agreement, the monastery who had the impropriation discharging the other monastery from the payment of tithes on those particular lands. I do not conceive that there was any thing illegal in that, and therefore that is a species of title that was capable of being shown even by presumption.

But the Plaintiffs in the suit, according to what has been offered in the Court below, must found their claims upon presumption. They show no title directly: it can only be raised upon a presumption derived from their receipt of some species of tithes that they claim a right to, the receipt of all the tithes within the parish. The evidence of title on the part of the Respondents is only the evidence of a qualified possession; and being so, it raises clearly a presumption of title, but it does not show how it commenced. The title, so far as they do show a title, or that from which a title may be presumed, does not include the lands in question, [237] for they show no possession of the tithes of those lands. On the contrary, it appears there was a constant denial of their title to the tithes of those particular lands, together with something very like a disclaimer on the part of the person who claimed the impropriation, of a right to the tithes of those particular lands.

The Court below seem to have proceeded upon the general ground, which is applicable, unquestionably, to the case of an ecclesiastical rector, that a prescription in non decimando is purely illegal; that there can be no such prescription. There might, it was admitted, be a right by grant, but then that grant must be shown: There might be a right under a reservation by the statute of Henry VIII. dissolving the greater monasteries, but that circumstance does not apply to this case; and the Court proceeded to take it for granted that the Plaintiffs in this case had the rectory, and having the rectory, that a prescription in non decimando was a thing purely illegal against an impropriator as well as against an ecclesiastical rector.

Now what is the ground of that doctrine in respect to tithes? Before the Reformation, if land was within a parish, the incumbent, the rector of that parish, must be entitled to the tithes of that land, or to some compensation for those tithes, by modus or composition real, which comes to the same thing, unless the lands for which the exemption was claimed were lands that were vested in a monastery claiming an exemption, under certain circumstances, from the payment of tithes. The ground of this was, that though the rector, under certain circum-[238]-stances, or the vicar, if there was an endowed vicar, might take a compensation; he could not alienate the tithes without compensation.

After the Reformation a number of rectories and lands vested in monasteries were vested in the Crown by the two Acts of Parliament of the 27th and 31st of Henry VIII., the latter reserving to the lands of a monastery discharged from tithes at the time of the Dissolution the same discharge in the hands of the Crown, or the grantee of the Crown, the former statute not containing that provision. But no title to discharge could be set up under the monastery through which the lands in question were taken, against a person clearly entitled to the rectory of that parish, neither before nor subsequent to the Dissolution, because if there had existed such a right prior to the Dissolution, as to the lesser monasteries not being reserved, that right could not prevail.

The lands and the rectory were united in the Crown by different titles: this appears clearly with respect to the land, and it must be to a certain degree presumed with respect to the rectory, because the persons who claim the rectory as a rectory impropriate cannot claim that but by a grant of the Crown; and though there is no evidence whatsoever with respect to the grant of the rectory, yet as they must claim under a grant of the Crown, they cannot pretend to say that their title may not be affected by that circumstance, because the lands, when they were in the hands of the Crown, might be occupied by the lessee of the Crown, discharged of tithes by the unity of possession in the Crown: [239] and if discharged of tithes by unity of possession in the Crown, and the Crown made a grant of those lands, having itself the rectory, and made the grant in such terms as would convey the lands to the grantee, precisely as the lessee of those lands held them, the consequence seems to me to be that the grant of the Crown would convey the tithes of those lands. The Crown was capable by its grant of discharging these lands from the payment of tithes, that is, by conveying a right to the tithes, and consequently of discharging the lands. I cannot see why a presumption of that kind is incapable of being maintained. It seems to me to be a title capable of a legal beginning; and the ground upon which it is held, that there can be no presumption against an ecclesiastical rector or vicar of this description is, that there can be no legal beginning of such a title.

If the Respondent in this case had shown that the King demised the lands separately, and the rectory, including the tithes of the land in question, had also been demised separately, so that there was a separate grantee of the tithes at the time of the grant of the lands by the Crown, that would tend to rebut such a presumption: but there is not the slightest evidence of that description. The Respondents have not done what they ought to have done, and what the Court ought to have called upon them to do before they proceeded farther in the cause; they ought to have called upon them in the first instance to have shown the grant of the Crown under which they claim, for they could have no title except under a grant of the Crown; and therefore, unless the Defendant fully admitted the right of the Plaintiff, [240] and so dispensed with the production of his title, in all cases of this description the person claiming an impropriate rectory must produce the grant of the Crown. I admit, that it is now held that it is not necessary for an impropriate rector, in such case, to deduce his title from one person to another, after a grant from the Crown has been shown. Why? because the Courts are aware that deeds of that description may be lost; and therefore, if the grant of the Crown is shown, and if a recent title, or possession according to that title, is shown, then the Court will admit a presumption that the title has been properly deduced.

But why is there to be a presumption on one side, and no presumption on the other? It seems to me extraordinary that a Court of Equity should hold that there may be a presumption in favour of a rectory impropriate, but that there can be no presumption against a rectory impropriate. What difference is there between the title of a lay rector impropriate to the tithes of land, and the title of the other person who holds the lands from which the tithes are claimed? They are both equally fees; both equally capable of alienation; and why there should be a presumption in favour of a lay rector, and no presumption in favour of the occupier of the lands, I must confess I cannot conceive. In both cases it must be founded upon the very probable supposition of the loss of instruments. I believe it will be found that the titles to half the estates in the kingdom would be held to be bad if there was no presumption of the loss of instruments. In the case of rectories impropriate very few persons would be [241] able to deduce their titles correctly from the grant of the Crown; they must deduce their titles from circumstances arising in past times. In this case it appears to me that there is such ground of presumption; and I cannot conceive how a Court of Equity should imagine that, upon the ground upon which a Court of Equity is to deal with such a case, they could make the decree they have made.

It appeared from the evidence that both the rectory and the lands came to Sir John Packington, and that Sir John Packington having the rectory granted the lands. When he conveyed the lands, could he not convey them as he held them? Is it probable that he conveyed them subject to tithes, holding them himself not subject to tithes, though he might, if he thought fit, have made a separate demise of the tithes and of the land. That circumstance alone seems to afford ground of presumption, and a very strong ground of presumption, especially coupled with this, that there is no evidence of the persons, who afterwards derived title from Sir John Packington to the rectory impropriate, having ever received or ever claimed tithes of these lands; but on the contrary, that the person under whom Mrs. Meade now claims had in effect said that he was not entitled to the tithes of these lands; that these lands were discharged from tithes. That disclaimer on the part of an ecclesiastical rector would not operate much, but a disclaimer on the part of a lay rector ought to operate in the same way as if a man seised of lands at this day had a right of way or any easement over the lands of another; I cannot distinguish between them. In the case of a right of way over [242] the lands of other persons, being an easement belonging to lands, if the owner chooses to say I have no right of way over those lands, that is disclaiming that right of way; and though the previous title might be shown, a subsequent release of the right might be presumed. What is the difference between that case and this? I conceive that a lay rector may release the tithes, and the consequence would be, that the lands would be discharged; but the Court of Exchequer has said, unless you can produce the deed by which that release is made, the tithes, though not paid for a hundred years, must now be paid, because you cannot produce that deed. Then the Court of Exchequer will presume a loss of deeds in favour of an impropriate rector, but not in favour of the owner of the land: that seems so unlike equal justice that I cannot conceive how it could ever have been adopted.

All the circumstances of this case afford strong grounds for presuming that if the lands were subject to the payment of tithes after the Dissolution of the Monasteries, and if the title to the rectory and the title to the lands had passed to distinct owners, and never had been united in one person, that the person who had the impropriate rectory had, in some way or other, discharged those lands from the payment of tithes, that is, conveyed the right to the tithes, that is the nature of a discharge. If a deed were executed which said no more than "I discharge these lands of tithes," it would operate, because no person claiming under the party discharging could claim in opposition to his deed, he having a right to discharge them; and although [243] he had not used the proper form of release, yet if he used word of release it would be the same thing as in a right of way, or any other right; but where the fact is, that the lands and the tithes, as in this case, were at the same time in the same person, and that the lands were conveyed by that person, and conveyed before the rectory was conveyed, there is the strongest ground for presuming that the lands were so conveyed as discharged from tithes.

Either Sir John Packington must, after he conveyed the lands, have continued to receive the tithes, notwithstanding his grant of the lands, or he did not continue to receive the tithes; if he continued to receive the tithes, then that must, in some way, have been capable of proof by evidence, that is, if the same receipt of tithes (which probably would have been the case) had been continued down to a late period; whereas the evidence is the other way, that never, at any time, were tithes of these lands demanded by the person claiming the impropriate rectory under Sir John Packington. This is a circumstance very strong to show that either the lands were considered by Sir John Packington as discharged from the payment of tithes by some prior deed, and therefore conveyed by him as so discharged; or, that if they were not so discharged prior, yet when he conveyed the lands he conveyed them as he held them, not subject to the payment of tithes.

If he made such a conveyance his subsequent conveyance of the rectory would not carry these tithes, because he had abandoned his title to them; he had no right to convey them, and this makes it [244] extremely important in this case to call on the Respondents for the production of their own title, that it may appear whether Sir John Packington, after he had conveyed the lands, did or did not convey the tithes of those lands: the presumption must be, that he did not convey the tithes, unless the contrary is clearly proved; the production of that conveyance might not indeed decide the question, because it might be conceived, in general words; it might convey the property to another part of his family, and possibly without exception of incumbrances, etc.

The Court of Exchequer seems to have proceeded upon the ground that they were only to look at the defence, that they had no occasion to look at the title of the Plaintiffs, and looking at the defence alone, on that they proceeded; and they held that that defence was not good, and why? because it would not be good against an ecclesiastical rector. Now I apprehend that there is such a clear distinction between an ecclesiastical rector and a lay impropriator, that reasoning applicable to the case of an ecclesiastical rector is not applicable to the case of a lay impropriator, unless it can be shown that it is so applicable. The ecclesiastical rector is incapable of alienating; the lay impropriator is capable of alienating; and from the time of the dissolution of the monasteries the lay impropriations, as vested in the Crown, became as much lay-fees as the lands out of which the tithes issue, and therefore I cannot conceive upon what ground there can be a distinction between the case of a person claiming a lay impropriation, and the case of a person [245] claiming lands: the title is one and the same; of the same description; and particularly in the case of a person claiming any thing to be received out of the lands, or profit of any kind to be taken out of the lands. If a profit of any kind that is to be taken out of lands has not been taken for a vast number of years, and the lands have been enjoyed without yielding that profit to a third person, the consequence is, that the title to that profit shall be presumed to be discharged whatever is the nature of that profit. And what is the distinction between that case and the case of an impropriate rector claiming tithes? I can perceive none; and it seems, therefore, to me, that in this case, when all the circumstances are considered, even upon the defence, it would be impossible to hold that a Court of Equity had a right to make the decree which the Court of Exchequer has made.

The decision of the Court of Exchequer in this case is upon a legal right; they have said that the Plaintiffs in the suit in the Exchequer have a legal right to these tithes, unless the Defendant can show that they have it not. Now in what case is a Court of Equity authorized to decide on a legal right? There is no equity in the case of tithes; it is merely an incident to a right to an account. The person who claims in a Court of Equity a right to a decree for tithes, generally speaking, claims it merely as incident to a right to have an account of what the tithes are, or discovery from the Defendant of the tithes that have arisen from his lands, and then to an account of the tithes which have so arisen; and the equitable remedy is merely an [246] incident to a right of discovery and account. In tithes there is no equitable right to sue for, any more than in any other species of real property. It is merely incidental, and arising from the nature of the particular thing that is demanded. It is not an original jurisdiction to decide a question of right; the Court of Exchequer had no right to decide the question: it is a legal question, which ought to be decided in a Court of Law, if there really is a question of right.

The Court of Exchequer, in this case, assumed the legal right, and entered simply into the question whether the Defendant has shown a ground to controvert that legal right. Now in this case the Plaintiffs not having shown a clear legal right, the Court of Exchequer had no right, as a Court of Equity, to decree the account as incident to a discovery of the quantity of tithes subtracted, which is the ground of the decree of a Court of Equity on this subject.

The equity in a case of tithes arising therefore only, as I conceive, incidentally from a clear legal title, where a clear legal defence is made in opposition to that title, the Court had no right upon the title shown to pronounce the decree they have pronounced. The Court ought not to have pronounced any decree in this case in respect to the tithes of these lands; and with respect to the decree actually made in this case, I do not see how the Court could have decreed an account of all tithes, both great and small, there being nothing in this case to show that the Plaintiffs have a good title to all tithes, great and small.

[247] In the first place, I apprehend there never was a time when an impropriation could be made without providing, in some way, for the service of the church. After the 15th of Richard II. there must be an endowment of a vicar. Before the 15th of Richard II. there ought to have been either a vicar endowed, or the service of the church performed by a curate. Now what is the case here? There is no service; the church itself has fallen totally to decay; a great part of it has tumbled down, and the remainder of it was removed by the late impropriator. There must be, therefore, something with respect to this title which does not appear to the Court. There must have been, at some time, service performed at that church; even within memory burials have been performed; even within these twenty years persons have been buried in the churchyard in a parish, where, the Court say, the Plaintiffs in this case are entitled to all tithes, great and small. If there was an endowed vicar he must have something out of the rectory; and it is incumbent on the rector to show what that endowment was, and how it was limited. It is true that the vicar might not be endowed with tithes; he might be endowed with land, or with an annual payment; but the endowment, whatever it might be, ought to have been shown, in order to entitle the impropriate rector to all the tithes. If the impropriation was before the statute of endowments it was not absolutely imperative by law to endow a vicar, yet there ought to have been some evidence given of the impropriation, because all, except, perhaps, very ancient impropriations, at least, I believe all the impropriations in the [248] time of Edward the first had a vicar endowed. A great many of the Pope's bulls for the purpose of impropriation expressly required that there should be a vicar endowed; because it was a subject of great clamour in the church that tithes were appropriated to monasteries, and no provision made for the due service of the church; and therefore it was frequently in bulls provided that there should be a vicar endowed. It is therefore extremely important that the actual impropriation should be shown, or that it should be shown that that impropriation took place before the time of legal memory. Before the Court decreed the payment of tithes, both great and small, some such proof of title ought to have been given. It is important with a view to the church itself. By proceeding without such proof of title in the case of a rectory impropriate, the protection which ought to be afforded to the church is disregarded. Some evidence should be shown to the Court that the rector impropriate is entitled to all the tithes, both great and small. The grant of the rectory impropriate is not conclusive as to the right, since there may be a vicar endowed; and unless the impropriation was prior to the 15th of Richard II. there must be a vicar endowed; and as prior to that time there generally was a vicar endowed, or some provision made for the service of the church, the Court of Exchequer has proceeded against what we may call common right on this subject, on common law, in making a decree, directing an account of all tithes, both great and small, arising on the lands in question.

With respect to that part of the case which is not [249] before the House on appeal nothing can be done. With respect to that which is before the House the Plaintiffs have not shown their title, and it is not admitted. They produce no evidence whatsoever of the fact of their title. They produce no evidence of possession according to their claim: on the contrary, the evidence is directly against them upon the fact of possession. The evidence is also strongly against their right; on the point of presumption they show no title by possession; and upon a circumstance, which is considered slight, but which I hold to be important, a disclaimer by the impropriate rector of these tithes, the presumption is against the title.

Under these circumstances, therefore, the Court of Exchequer ought to have dismissed this Bill with respect to these lands, and directed that the Plaintiffs, the Respondents here, should file a new Bill, if they thought fit, stating their title, and proving it by the production of those documents which the Court ought to have required to be produced, and by showing how it has happened that there is not in this parish a vicar endowed, or a person acting as curate, or in a capacity of that description, for the service of the church, so that the church itself is now gone into decay, and this parish is loaded with the payment of tithes, having no church-duty performed in it, for which tithes were given: under these circumstances the claim of the Respondents requires to be supported by the strongest and clearest evidence; and here there is an absence of all evidence, and the title is denied on the part of the Defendant. I think the proper way to dispose of [250] this case will be to reverse the decree pronounced, so far as relates to these lands, and to dismiss the Bill so far as relates to these lands, leaving it to the Respondents to file a new Bill, with a direction that this decision shall not be pleaded in bar of the Plaintiff's title.

The Lord Chancellor: In this case I withhold my final opinion till Monday morning, because I look upon it as a case of great importance, though it relates to a property of small value; yet in my view it may not be of so much consequence as it appeared to be when the learned Counsel first addressed your Lordships. It had escaped me, till I looked over the papers this morning, that the appeal was not against the whole of the decree: that the Defendant's appeal is only against so much of this decree as relates to the tithes of the lands called Great Friars. The appeal is brought here for the purpose of controverting a doctrine (which has been understood as hitherto unsanctioned,) by arguments not affecting any decision of the House of Lords, but the doctrine of the Courts of Exchequer and Chancery, both acting as Courts of Equity, affecting the practice of those Courts in matters of tithes, where the title of a lay impropriator is in question.

The points principally argued at the Bar were, that in this case the Court of Exchequer ought not to have decreed as they have, because it should have been presumed that there was a title in the Defendant. Now if I understand the decisions that have been made in the Courts below, they authorize me to say, that in the cases to which I have been [251] alluding they did not mean to decide the point whether there was or was not a title in the Defendants, where they have refused to make a decree at the instance of the Plaintiff; and the principle applies not only to suits by lay impropriators, but also to suits by clerical persons. What they have said, as I understand them, in the case of Scott v. Airey, and other cases referred to at the bar, is this, that if a person shows that he has had a pernaney or enjoyment of tithes; that he had not paid them to the rector, whether the lay rector, or the ecclesiastical rector; and can show by his title deeds that the tithes of his land have been made the subject of conveyances, to which, neither the lay rector nor the ecclesiastical rector, was (the latter could not, be) a party; the circumstance of the rector not demanding, whether a lay rector or an ecclesiastical rector, and the land owner asserting in his deeds a title to that which he was not only withholding, but enjoying, in cases attended with these circumstances, as I understand them, it has been determined by the Courts of Equity that it is not fit that they, being Courts of Equity, should make a decree, or interfere, but leave the party claiming to make out a title at law. On the other hand, with respect to a lay rector, where, unquestionably, it must be admitted that the claim is of what may be called a temporal inheritance, altogether different from the claim of an ecclesiastical rector; and when tithes in his hands having become lay property generally, are to be looked at as governed by the same principles as [252] other property; it has been decided, that if the occupier of land can do no more than show that he has not paid tithes to the lay rector, the doctrine, that he shall not prescribe in non decimando, applies equally as in the case of an ecclesiastical rector. If he cannot show some title, or some enjoyment of the tithes, which connect the title in him to tithes with that enjoyment, in that case he shall account for the tithes to a lay as well as to an ecclesiastical rector. This is the doctrine which was chiefly discussed and assailed at the Bar; and I believe that this appeal was brought with a view to overturn it; but it seems to me, that in looking at that great point they have overlooked the true point of the case; because, whether Courts of Equity have been right or wrong in the establishment of these doctrines, I apprehend that we are bound to suppose that in all cases in which they have applied them the Plaintiff has made out his title. The Plaintiff can only recover by force of his own title; and I agree with what has been stated by my noble friend on the other side of the House, that the Court ought not to call on the Defendant to enter on his defence at all till the Plaintiff has shown his title.

In the present case the Bill is brought for the payment of tithes of all the lands occupied by the Defendant, including the lands called the Lower Friars, which formerly belonged to a monastery, the rectory at the same time belonging to another monastery. The Defendant not admitting the Plaintiff's title he must show, by evidence, that he has a title; and upon [253] reading the evidence it does not appear to me that he has made out his title by proof.

But here we have an embarrassment, for the Defendant does not appeal against that part of the decree which directs an account of the small tithes, generally, which according to the whole evidence the rector never enjoyed; but submitting to account for the tithes of other lands, which is, pro tanto, admitting the rector's title, he does not submit to account for the tithes of the Lower Friars, which form the subject of the present dispute. I was startled when I first found that, because it struck me, as raising the question, whether he had not admitted the rector's title, but that opinion is much too strong if the justice of the case does not require me to give it.

The question then is, Has the Respondent shown a title so as to bring himself within the cases, and to make it necessary to discuss, for the first time, a case of this kind which has come to the House of Lords? Has he so proved a title as to make it necessary for us to discuss whether the species of decisions to which I have been alluding have been right or wrong? Now I apprehend the nature of the title he has proved is neither more nor less than this: the proof applies to enjoyment, and it applies also to the contents of certain instruments which are produced. With respect to enjoyment, he never enjoyed the tithes of this parcel of land which, as well as the rectory, belonged to a monastery. I take that to be material; and it is likewise in evidence that he did not enjoy the small tithes.

There is a statement in the answer which is not [254] proved, but for which we cannot help conjecturing there must have been some foundation. It is supposed that this impropriate rector, (who was the impropriate rector of a parish in which there was a church; in which, to this hour, there are the remains of a church; in which, to this hour, there is a burial place, and where, though the inhabitants can have no spiritual food in their lives, they may have rest when they are dead,) made a bargain with the parishioners, that if they would free him from the necessity of procuring service to be done at the church, he would make them a present of their small tithes. I do not know that there is distinct evidence of the fact, but there has been no service; and what the noble Lord has said is extremely important, with respect to the duty which attaches on the impropriator to provide for the religious service of the parish, both before and after that statute of the 15th of Richard II. Something, therefore, may be conjectured upon that ground, there having been no such enjoyment.

But it is said, although there has been no such enjoyment, here is the character of impropriate rector vested in the plaintiff. Now it must depend upon the evidence whether the character of impropriate rector is vested in this plaintiff so as to bring him within those decisions, be they right or wrong, to which I have been alluding. How does that stand? He does not produce any grant from the Crown; he does not account for the circumstance that no grant is produced; he does not advert to the fact that the property both of the one nature and of [255] the other were vested in ecclesiastical bodies, who might deal with each other in the manner which the learned Lord has pointed out; he gives no account whatever what became of this property from the time of the dissolution of the monastery till that deed, which, if I recollect rightly, is in the year 1612, a conveyance from Sir John to Thomas Packington; wherein it is described as the Rectory of St. Nicholas in Droitwich. But in the will of Thomas Packington how is that property described, which was taken under the deed? He devises it to his wife, together with all the tithes of corn, grain, and hay; why then, if previous to the dissolution of the monasteries these monasteries might have so dealt with each other as that tithes should not be demandable out of the estate, that might be so, but if that were not so, if the rectory was conveyed to Thomas Packington by Sir John Packington, and if Thomas Packington devises to his wife the rectory, that is, tithes of corn, grain and hay, and if from that day to this day the tithes of corn, grain and hay, that is, the great tithes, upon the whole of the evidence taken together were the tithes that were collected, I say, the person who claims under her must take as she claimed under her husband, and that the enjoyment is an enjoyment showing that she was entitled to the tithes of corn, grain and hay, but to nothing else.

I concur with the noble Lord in his statement, that after it has been shown that the Crown has granted the rectory, if there is possession and enjoyment on the one side, and on the other hand nothing to qualify or limit that possession [256] and enjoyment, a presumption arises that deeds have been lost, and that the connection cannot be made out. But here, looking to the first written evidence of title, it is an instrument between the Packingtons, which shows that the rectory, with all profits that would belong to the rectory, great tithes and small tithes, and so on, were not the subjects to be taken under that deed.

After this conveyance I do not recollect a conventional deed of any kind being proved, and then you come to the enjoyment of Mr. Clivecland, who appears to have been the impropiator. Leases granted by him are in evidence, expressed in terms equivocal and ambiguous; but it is proved that he made a declaration, which has been treated as a matter of little importance, not only in the argument here, but in the judgment of the Court below. But to me it appears a declaration of very considerable consequence, because, if both as against an ecclesiastical rector and a lay rector, by asserting a title to tithes, in title-deeds and otherwise, the relief in equity for those tithes is prevented, what is that but a declaration made behind the back of the rector, and received behind his back? Is that much stronger than the express declaration of a man who would be entitled to all the tithes, that he is not entitled to the tithes of such particular land? It seems to me an extremely strong thing; but it does not rest there, because this bill, being filed in 1810 by a lay person for an ecclesiastical right, in the last lease made in 1801 the tithes of these lands are excepted. I am aware that where a person makes a demise, and excepts something, it may be [257] taken as evidence that he had that which he excepts; but you must look at the circumstances of each case to know whether that was the meaning of it, and if you find he succeeded a person who declared he had not these tithes, you account for the exception, and remove the matter of doubt.

The inclination of my opinion is, that as this case stands before us, we have enough, without entering into the great questions that have been argued at the bar, to enable us to say that the Plaintiff has not made out a case to recover; that he has not gone far enough to raise the necessity of agitating the questions discussed at the bar, but that you may safely say his bill ought to be dismissed, without prejudice to any other bill being filed; and that notwithstanding the embarrassment arising from the Defendant's submitting to another part of the decree. I cannot at present foresee, even with the anxiety I have and profess to have not to disturb other cases, that I am likely, by reconsideration, to alter the opinion which I have now expressed.

The Lord Chancellor: In this case I propose to adopt the following judgment, because it appears to me that the circumstances of the case make it altogether unnecessary to examine, either by way of confirming or by way of weakening the doctrine of any of the cases that have been cited at the bar; I mean as to what is to be done in cases either of lay impropiators or ecclesiastical rectors, with respect to tithes of particular lands which have not been retained or enjoyed in pernaney under colour of title. In this case the Plaintiff's title [258] was not admitted by the defendant; and the question is, Has the Plaintiff's case in this cause been so proved, not being admitted, as clearly to raise the question upon a colour of title in the cases to which I have been alluding? It appears to me, by examination of the evidence, that it certainly has not, and consequently it will be sufficient to reverse the decree, taking care, nevertheless, in the terms in which you give the judgment that the reversal of the decree shall not operate to the prejudice or the affirmance of any of the decisions which have been mentioned in the course of the argument at the bar.

The manner, therefore, in which you should proceed should be, "to reverse the decree of the Court of Exchequer, so far as the same is complained of by the petition of appeal." You will recollect that the Appellant submits to the decree as far as the tithes of other lands, including the small tithes, are concerned; and I mention the circumstance in order that it may be observed that we have not overlooked it, because it would be very difficult to account for this reversal of ours without affecting the decree for the small tithes, as well as the decree for the lands in question, if it had not been that the Appeal is confined to the latter, and therefore cannot touch the former. "The House may further order, that the original bill in the Court of Exchequer, so far as the tithes of the lands called the Lower Friars, in the occupation of the Appellant, are claimed thereby, be dismissed." If the reversal stopped here it might be understood to have an effect with respect to for-[259]-mer decisions, against which I am extremely anxious this judgment should not operate at all; it ought therefore to be added, "but without prejudice to the Respondents demanding the said tithes in any other suit;" and therefore, if in any other suit, either by the admission of the defendant, or by the proofs in the suit, he shall so establish his title as to authorize him to insist, as far as he can insist, on a decree of the same nature, and on the same principles which have been adopted in the cases to which I allude, this reversal will not prevent his doing so; and of consequence this reversal so qualified will not prejudice those cases at all, at least it is not intended by this judgment either to prejudice or to give more effect to those decisions than they ought to have.

Die Lunae, 9 Aprilis 1821. After hearing counsel as well on Friday the 9th and Wednesday the 11th days of February, as Friday the 16th day of March last, upon the Petition and Appeal of Coningsby Norbury, Esq., complaining of a decree of the Court of Exchequer, of the 20th day of May 1816, made in two certain causes, in the first of which the Right Reverend Thomas Percy, Doctor in Divinity, deceased, was Plaintiff, and Coningsby Norbury, Esq. Defendant, by original Bill, and in the other the Right Honourable and Reverend Pierce Meade and Elizabeth his wife, and Samuel Isted, Esq., were Plaintiffs, and the said Coningsby Norbury was Defendant, by Bill of revivor, and praying that the said decree might be reversed, in so far as the same directs an account to be taken of the tithes which arose upon and from the lands called the Lower Friars, or that the Appellant might have such other relief in the premises as to this House, [260] in their Lordships great wisdom, should seem meet; as also upon the Answer of the Honourable and Reverend Pierce Meade and Elizabeth his wife, and Samuel Isted, Esq., put in to the said Appeal; and due consideration being had on Wednesday the 21st day of February last, and on Friday last, and this day, of what was offered on either side in this cause, It is ordered and adjudged, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said decree, so far as the same is complained of in the said Appeal, be and the same is hereby reversed. And it is further ordered and adjudged, That the original Bill in the said Court of Exchequer, so far as the tithes of the lands called the Lower Friars, in the occupation of the Appellant, are claimed thereby, be dismissed, but without prejudice to the Respondents demanding the same tithes in any other suit.

ENGLAND.

(COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

NORBURY,—Appellant; MEADE and others. Respondents [19th May 1825].*

A decree having been made upon a bill in Equity by a lay-impropriator for an account of tithes, the Defendant in the suit appeals against so much of the decree as relates to part of the lands made subject to the account. The decree is reversed, upon the ground that the Plaintiff in the suit has not proved his title: whereupon the Defendant in the suit presents a new appeal against the remainder of the decree: held that a second appeal in such a suit cannot be maintained. Whether such an appeal would be entertained in a suit where the question of title is in issue. Quære.

A party having appealed against one part of a decree, in a suit where the title is not in issue, thereby virtually submits to rest of it, and cannot afterwards present a new appeal against other parts of the same decree. When such an appeal is presented the party served with it ought not to answer, but to present a counter petition to have it dismissed. If he treats it as an effective appeal by answering, and suffering it to proceed before he presents a counter petition, he will not be entitled to costs.

In consequence of the opinion expressed in moving the judgment in the case last reported, the Appellant, on the 31st May 1821, petitioned the House of Peers for permission to present, during the then session of Parliament, a petition of appeal against so much of the decree as was not appealed against by the former appeal. The House, on the report of the committee, rejected that petition, but without prejudice to the Appellant presenting a petition in due time in the next session of Parliament.

[262] On the 21st January 1822, the Appellant served notice on the Respondent's solicitors, of his intention to present a petition of appeal in the current session against so much of the decree as directs an account and payment by the Appellant of the small tithes in the decree mentioned, and of the costs of the suit.

A petition of appeal was accordingly presented, and, on the 15th February 1822, the House made an order that the Respondents should have a copy of the appeal, and put in their answer.

The Appellant entered into the usual recognizance for prosecuting his appeal, and on the 10th May 1822 the Respondents put in their answer to the appeal.

The Appellant then printed and delivered copies of his case, as required by the order of the House, and also delivered copies to the agents for the Respondents, and set his appeal down in the paper for hearing.

In the mean time the Court of Exchequer had virtually suspended proceedings under the decree, so far as related to the account thereby directed to be taken, and the payment of the costs taxed, until the House should have decided the second appeal: for the Respondents, on the 28th of December 1820, before the House had decided on the first appeal, applied by motion to the Court that it might be referred back to the deputy remembrancer, to apportion the costs taxed in respect of so much of the suit as was not the subject of appeal, which motion was opposed by the Appellant, and refused, with costs: and on the 28th of July 1821, after the judgment on the first appeal, the Respondents having again moved for a similar order, it was again refused.

After these proceedings the Respondents presented [263] a petition to the House, praying that the second appeal might be dismissed, with costs, on the ground, that the Appellant having by his former petition appealed against a part of the decree only, he had thereby submitted to the other part of such decree, and ought not therefore to be permitted now to appeal against the same. The Appellant insisted that he had not by his former appeal submitted in any respect to the decree, and that the Respondents had not taken this objection by proper averments in their answer to the Appellants second petition of appeal, as they ought to have done if they meant to rest their case upon any such alleged submission.

The Appellant further insisted, that if he had in any respect submitted to the decree, that upon discovery of any error in the judgment of the Court, he was at any time at liberty to appeal against the same, provided he presented such appeal within the time limited by the general order of the House, which had been done in the present appeal.

On these grounds the Appellant presented a counter-petition, praying that the petition of the Respondents might be dismissed, and that he might be heard at the bar by his counsel upon the matter of the second appeal.

The petitions in the usual course were referred to the appeal Committee, but the question of practice arising upon them being new, and of great importance, the matter of the petitions was appointed to be heard before the House by counsel, and accordingly came on to be argued at the bar.

The Solicitor General, and Mr. Roupell, for the original petition.

[264] Mr. H. Martin, and Mr. Simpkinson, for the counter petition.

For the first petition.—There is no instance of a petition of appeal to the House of Peers against part of a decree at first, and afterwards against the remainder of the decree; if such a practice could be permitted, the principle would extend to the admission of any number of successive appeals against the same decree, as where a number of moduses are pleaded, which would be dangerous and inconvenient in practice, and oppressively injurious to parties litigant. The grounds of objection in the new appeal and the old are precisely similar. The ground on defence, the defect of proof of title as impropiator, was apparent on the record, and open to the cognizance of the defendant at the time of the original appeal: If the practice of splitting appeals has existed, instances might be produced, and the absence of precedent is proof against the existence of the practice. If such a doctrine were established by the decision in this case it would lead to great oppression, delay and vexation.

Against the petition.—There is no positive rule or standing order of the House to prevent appeals against decrees in parts: The Appellants were taken by surprise, as to the ground of objection to the decree, which had not been adverted to by the counsel or the Judges in the court below; viz. the defect of proof of title in the plaintiff, which distinguishes this from the case of splitting appeals upon a decree respecting distinct moduses; the object of the House is always to do substantial justice.

In one case (Roper v. Radcliffe, 5 B. P. C. 360) an appeal being against part of a [265] decree, it was reversed; and the House gave leave to the Appellant to apply to the court below to vary the other part of the decree. So in another case (Evelyn v. Evelyn, 6 B. P. C. 114) the House dismissed an appeal by consent of parties, declaring the order to be without prejudice to presenting a new appeal. If the House should reject the new appeal, there will be an inconsistency in the decree of the court below; as to one part, the account of titles will be refused, because the plaintiff has no title; as to the other, it will be directed, although it will appear by the judgment of this House operating on the court below that he has no title. The whole ground of the Respondents claim is annulled by the judgment in the first appeal, and this proceeding is only a corollary from that judgment. There has been no acquiescence in any part of the decree; and if the Respondents had intended to take this ground of objection, it should have been taken earlier. They have answered the second petition of appeal, and suffered the Appellants to proceed upon it, to print their cases, and act upon it for two years without objection. It is now too late to object.

* There has been no submission, actual or virtual, to that part of the decree which was omitted in the first appeal. No case has been found in which two appeals, at different times, against different parts of a decree, have been brought before the House; but there are cases which furnish analogy and principle, which tend to show, that in the [266] opinion of this House an appeal against part of a decree is not an acquiescence in the rest of the decree: that appears by the case of Roper v. Radcliffe. The question in that case was, whether a devise, or bequest of money, to arise from the sale of land to a papist was a devise within the Acts relating to papists. Lord Harcourt held, that as the land was directed by the will to be sold out and out, it was not an interest in land within the meaning of these Acts; that it was a devise or bequest of the surplus of money. Against that part only of the decree, the bequest of the surplus, an appeal was presented to this house. Upon argument, the House being of opinion that it was a devise of an interest in land within the meaning of the Popery Laws, the decree, so far as the appeal complained of it, was reversed: But after the declaration reversing the decree, the order of the House proceeds thus—"And as to the payment of any of the simple contract creditors out of the money arising by the sale of the trust-estate, in case the personal estate should not be sufficient for the payment thereof, no complaint thereof being made by the Appellant, the decree was to stand: but without prejudice to the Appellant applying to the Court of Chancery, if he conceived himself aggrieved, thereby to vary the directions in the said decree touching the payment of the simple contract creditors, as he should be advised: and the Court of Chancery is to give all such directions in pursuance of this order as may be just."

This permission to apply, and direction to the Court of Chancery, on a subject which formed no [267] part of the appeal, was in effect a direction to that Court to re-hear that part of the case which was not before the House on the appeal. Suppose the party to have availed himself of this liberty, and the cause had been accordingly re-heard on this unappealed portion of the decree, and an order thereupon made by the Court below, would it not have followed as a matter of course, that if the party had been dissatisfied with the order upon re-hearing, or any thing relating to the re-hearing, he might have applied to the House by way of appeal upon that subject? In such a case there would of necessity have been two successive appeals against different parts of the decree in the same cause.

The proceedings in this House in another case (Drake v. Smith, D. P. 1823, MS.) lately pending, illustrates the position, that an appeal against part of a decree is not to all intents and purposes a submission to the rest of the decree. In that case a bill was filed by a vicar for tithes. There were four townships in the parish: one called Shafton. The claim was by the Plaintiff, as vicar, of all the tithes, except a moiety of corn and grain. Lord Westmoreland, who claimed a portion of tithes in Shafton, was made a defendant with persons who were occupiers of lands in that township. Lord Westmoreland, by his answer, insisted that he was entitled not to a moiety, but to the entirety of the tithes of corn and grain in Shafton. The other defendants admitted occupation, and that they had had titheable corn and grain on their lands.

Upon the hearing the bill was dismissed, with costs, as against Lord Westmoreland: and, as against the occupiers, an account was directed of the articles [268] of titheable produce specifically: and the decree concluded with the general words, "all other titheable matters and things demanded by the bill," which included the moiety of the tithes of corn. Against that part of the decree which directed an account of the tithes of hay, wool and lambs, and some other things, the defendants appealed to this House, but that part of the decree which directed a general account of all things demanded by the bill was left untouched by the appeal. When the case came before the House the discrepancy was discovered, and the House refused to hear the appeal until the decree was rectified. It therefore became necessary to apply to the Court of Exchequer to re-hear the case, and to have that part of the decree rectified, in order that the appeal might be brought before the House in a perfect state. But if appealing against part of a decree is an affirmance of the rest of the decree by the effect of acquiescence, no application could have been made to the Court below to rectify the decree: for according to the argument the party had bound himself by virtual submission to the decree.

The effect of the order upon the former appeal was to annul the title of the Respondent, and to take away all right to account in this cause. If he had submitted on the presentation of the second Appeal no costs would have been incurred, and if he had intended to raise the question of practice he ought to have taken the objection when the appeal was presented.

Mr. Wetherell, in Reply: The cases cited are not in point. In Roper v. Radcliffe leave was [269] given to the party to raise the question, whether the simple contract debts were well charged on the estate. It is nothing unusual when a decree is reversed if collateral parts of it are affected by the reversal, to give directions as to what is to be done in the Court below. It is a declaration, explanatory of the judgment of the House, to prevent a consequence, flowing from the reversal of the decree, which might be injurious to the parties, if no declaration were made, or direction given on the subject. In the case of Drake v. Smith the title of Lord Westmoreland was not properly brought before the House when the case was first brought for hearing on the appeal; and the House directed that the cause should go before the Court of Exchequer to make his title apparent in the cause, and to enable him to appear at the bar as a party in the appeal.

As to the supposed discrepancy between the order of the House on appeal and the judgment in the Exchequer, if there had been any decision upon the title in the appeal, the point might deserve consideration; but in this judgment of the House no question of title is decided: it is expressly reserved.

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor asked whether the decree was general, to which it was answered, that it was so as to the account.

Upon the argument, founded on the absence of any order of the House to exclude a second appeal in the same cause, he asked whether any instance of such an appeal could be produced. As to the effect of any acquiescence or [270] agreement between the parties upon the subject: he said the objection must arise from the practice of the House, without regard to the arrangements or conduct of parties.

As to the argument, that after the judgment on the former appeal, if the decree for the small tithes should be suffered to stand, it might appear by the record that the Court of Exchequer had decreed the small tithes to a person having no title, Lord Redesdale observed, that the order on the former appeal was made without prejudice to any demand to be made by the Respondents in any other suit: that the House had expressed no opinion as to the parts of the case not then the subject of appeal, and that the cases were very different.

Lord Redesdale: I think the petition of appeal should be dismissed. The case came originally before the House on an appeal, which applied to the tithes of certain abbey-lands called the Lower Friars. The decree against which the appeal was made was upon a bill in which the Plaintiff sued in the character of improPRIATOR, for all tithes, great and small, of the whole parish. The defence set up by the Defendants in that case was with respect to the tithes of the lands called the Lower Friars; that they were abbey-lands, and exempt from tithes. The Court of Exchequer were of opinion that that exemption was not proved, and therefore decreed an account of those tithes of the lands called the Friars. The Court of Exchequer also decreed against the Defendant for the tithes of other lands, including the small tithes. The question before the House on the first appeal was, [271] whether these lands called the Friars were exempt from tithes, as the Defendants contended: it appeared that the Respondents in that case had not given sufficient evidence of their title to the tithes of these lands, for a part of the evidence which they produced, and which proved their being in possession of all the tithes of the rest of the parish, excepted the abbey-lands, particularly leases of the tithes of all the other lands except the abbey-lands. There was also evidence of the actual receipt, (that is, receipt by letting the tithes) of all the tithes of the rest of the parish except the abbey-lands. It appeared, by the evidence of a person who claimed to be improPRIATOR, that he had said they were exempt from the payment of tithes. Upon this case, so appearing before the Court of Exchequer, they thought fit to make a decree with respect to the abbey-lands, as well as the other lands in the occupation of the Appellant, for tithes generally including the small tithes. Now the ground upon which this House reversed that decree with respect to the abbey-lands was this, that the Respondent had not sufficiently shown a title to the tithes of the abbey-lands, but they had shown a prima facie title to the small tithes of the other lands, and therefore the House having really nothing before it with respect to these lands on which it could make any order whatever, did not touch that part of the decree. The House was also doubtful as to the tithes of the abbey-lands. They therefore, in the order which they pronounced, declared it to be without prejudice to the Respondents in that appeal claiming the tithes in any other suit. It [272] the decree against part of which the Appellant now seeks to appeal with respect to other lands had been a decree establishing the title to the tithes, the question might be different; but it is a decree merely for an account, and therefore it is a decree without prejudice to the title. What was decided by the House on the former appeal was also without prejudice to the title: for the House, in the judgment which it thought fit to pronounce on that appeal, ordered that the decree, so far as the same was complained of, (that is, with respect to the abbey-land being exempt,) should be reversed: and it was ordered, that the original bill, so far as it regarded the tithes of the Lower Friars, or clavius thereto, should be dismissed, but without prejudice to the Respondents demand in any other suit. The parties therefore are in this situation, that the dismissal of the bill in the Court of Exchequer by the order of the House, does not prejudice the title; it prejudices the demand that was made in that suit, and it puts an end to the title of the Plaintiff in that suit with respect to the titles of the abbey lands, but it does not determine that he has no title to these titles, and he might have instituted a suit for the purpose of ascertaining his title to these titles. The decree of the Court of Exchequer which was pronounced at first does not at all prejudice the rights of the Appellants in that case, who have now presented a further petition of appeal: it does not prejudice their right to insist on the exemption from payment of small tithes to the Respondents: they set up no exemption from the payment of small tithes at all, with respect to [273] these lands: but their defence was, that the Plaintiff was not entitled to these small tithes. Now the evidence did prove a prima facie title, and therefore was sufficient to ground the decree of the Court of Exchequer. Had they thought fit to present an appeal against the whole decree, the House might have determined the whole case. How it would be determined on the whole case I cannot now pretend to say, for the whole case has not been argued before the House. But as the party had the opportunity, if he thought fit, to have presented the appeal against the whole case, I think it would be extremely mischievous to permit a second appeal, in such a case as this, to be presented to the House. If it was a decree which concluded the title, that might be a question of separate consideration, but as it is a decree which does not conclude the title, but leaves both parties in the situation in which they would have been, except as to the account, I think there is no reason whatever for doing what does not appear ever to have been done before, permitting a second appeal to be presented by the same party, for the purpose of bringing the question again before the Court, with respect to the title which the Respondents in this case may have to the small tithes of the other land in the occupation of the Defendant, which is now the only subject of question.

Under these circumstances, therefore, it appears to me that this appeal ought to be considered as improperly presented, and therefore dismissed. It is not a case in which costs ought to be given, especially as the Respondents have thought fit to put in [274] an answer to this appeal. They ought, immediately on the appeal being presented to have presented a petition to the House, praying that the appeal might not be heard: not having so done, it seems to me not a case in which there should be any costs given to the Respondents: I therefore move that the petition of appeal be dismissed without prejudice to any question of right, and without costs.

The Lord Chancellor: I rise for the purpose of stating the question, whether this petition be or not received. I am quite satisfied that this second appeal ought not, under the circumstances, to be upheld. Whether, if the title had been brought into question, the appeal should have been received, I desire to withhold my opinion; that is a question of great importance, and I should be sorry to prejudge that question by any thing falling from me at present. I am satisfied that this petition of appeal should be dismissed. But the persons who complain of this petition of appeal have not done what they had an opportunity of doing. When the order was made for hearing the appeal they should have presented a petition to the House to put an end to that petition of appeal: under these circumstances I think the costs are properly refused.

Petition of Appeal dismissed.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

Dr. JAMES ROBERTSON BARCLAY, of Keavil.—Appellant: The Right Honourable WILLIAM ADAM, Lord Chief Commissioner in the Jury Court of Scotland.—Respondent.

An entail in the prohibitory clause provided that it should not be lawful to sell, alienate, or put away the lands, etc.; nor to alter the course of succession; nor to contract debt, etc.; nor to do or commit any fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the lands, etc. might be adjudged, evicted, or forfeited, etc.; nor to permit the estate to be adjudged or affected for any debts or deeds contracted or committed by the grantor or the heirs of entail; It contained an irritant clause in the following words: "All which debts, deeds and contractions are hereby declared null and void, etc." The resolute clause provided that the heir in possession, if he should not redeem any adjudication which might be led against the estate for and upon the debts and deeds of, etc. should forfeit, etc.

Held, that the word "deeds" in the irritant clause does not apply to all the things enumerated in the prohibitory clause, but is restricted by the context to such deeds as are of a nature to create a debt or burden; that it refers especially to the debts and deeds previously prohibited, and cannot be extended to the prohibition against selling.

Upon a sale therefore by the heir in possession, an objection to the title by a purchaser, on the ground that the irritant clause struck at alienation, was held invalid.

In the month of November 1820, the Appellant purchased from the Respondent certain lands situated in the county of Fife. By the agreement the Appellant undertook to pay £3950 as the price [276] of the estate; and the Respondent bound himself to execute and deliver to the Appellant a valid and sufficient disposition of the property.

Of the lands so purchased, certain parts, called Craigincate and Kingscat, are contained in the entail of the Blair Adam estate. These lands consist of about four hundred acres, and the proportion of the price corresponding to them was about £3000.

The Appellant having refused to pay this part of the price, on the ground that the entail of the estate of Blair Adam contained a prohibition against selling, the Respondent was proceeding to enforce the execution of the contract, when the Appellant presented to the Lords of Council and Session in Scotland, a bill of suspension, in which, after setting forth the terms of the agreement, he professed his readiness to implement all the obligations incumbent upon him, provided he could be assured that the Respondent was in a situation to give him a sufficient title to the lands which he had purchased.

The bill of suspension having been passed, the cause came to be pleaded before Lord Gillies; who ordained the parties to print and to lodge informations, that it might be judged of by the first division of the Court.

The main objection of the Appellant was grounded on the terms of the Blair Adam entail, as importing a prohibition against selling.

The entail was executed by the Respondent in terms of a former deed of entail, executed in the year 1758, by Alexander Littlejohn of Woodstone, and in terms of an act of parliament, by which the Respondent became bound to settle certain lands on the same series of heirs, and under the same conditions [277] and limitations, as those contained in the deed executed by Mr. Littlejohn.

The entail contains the following prohibitory clause: "That it shall be no ways lawful to the grantor and heirs of entail, to sell, alienate, or put away the lands, and others foresaid, or any part or portion thereof, nor to alter the course of succession above established, nor to contract debt above £500 sterling at one time, nor to do or commit any fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be anyways adjudged, evicted, or forfeited from me or them, or may be anyways affected in prejudice and defraud of the subsequent heirs of tailzie and provision successively, according to the order of substitution above specified: neither shall it be lawful for me nor them to permit the said estate, or any part thereof, to be adjudged, or affected for any debts or deeds contracted or committed by me or them, before our succession, or by any of our predecessors whom I or they may any way represent, or to which we, as their representatives, may be liable or subject."

Then follows an irritant clause in the following terms: "All which debts, deeds, and contractions are hereby declared void and null by way exception or reply, and without declarator, in so far as they may burden the said lands and estate."

After this irritant clause the prohibitory clause is resumed in the following terms: "Neither shall it be lawful for me, or the said heirs of tailzie, to permit the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, to be evicted, adjudged, or affected [278] for any debts or deeds contracted or done by the said deceased Andrew Littlejohn, or for the said sum of £500 sterling, wherewith the heirs of tailzie are empowered to burden the lands and estate at one time."

After this there follows a resolute clause specially applicable to this last prohibition. It is expressed in the following terms: "And if I, or the heir in possession, shall not redeem any adjudication that may be led against the said estate, for and upon the debts and deeds of the said deceased Alexander Littlejohn, or for the said sum of £500 sterling, within three years of the expiry of the legal [?] term] of such adjudications; then and in that case, I, or such heir, shall, for himself only, lose and forfeit his right to the said lands and estate; and it shall be lawful to the next immediate heir of tailzie, and if he shall neglect, to the next succeeding heir, and so on successively, to redeem the said estate, and use all the forms necessary in the order of redemption, and to enjoy and possess the said estate irredeemably thereafter, free of the debts and deeds of the preceding heir."

The entail afterwards contains a more comprehensive resolute clause, which was admitted in every respect to be effectual.

The case was decided by the Court of Session on the 8th of February 1821, when the following interlocutor was pronounced: "Upon the report of the Lord President, in the absence of Lord Gillies, and having advised the informations for the parties, the Lords find, that the deed of tailzie founded on by the suspender does not contain [279] any irritant clause applicable to the sales or alienations of the lands in the said tailzie, and therefore find the letters orderly proceeded, and decern."

The Appellant, conceiving himself to be aggrieved by this interlocutor, presented his appeal.

For the Appellant: The irritant clause is introduced at the end of those parts of the prohibitory clause to which it is applicable, and before the last branch of the prohibitions, because it is to that inapplicable. In order to render an irritant or resolute clause effectual it is not necessary to adopt any precise form of words; either of these clauses may be prefaced by a minute recapitulation of all the different acts which have been previously prohibited, or by a general reference to the previous prohibitory clause in which such enumeration is contained; if a particular recapitulation is attempted, there should be no omission of any one act which is meant to be prohibited, since otherwise the court, consistently with recent authorities, will be disposed to conclude that such omission arises from design, and that the act so omitted is not meant to be comprehended under the irritant and resolute clauses. But an irritant clause, expressed in terms of general reference to the previous prohibitory clause, is equally effectual as if it contained the most minute recapitulation of particulars.

Thus, in the act of parliament 1685, c. 22, by which entails were first declared to be effectual against the creditors of the heir in possession, it was made lawful "to his majesty's subjects to tailzie their [280] lands and estates, and to substitute heirs in their tailzies, with such provisions and conditions as they shall think fit, and to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolute clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful for the heirs of tailzie to sell, nailzie or dispoise the said lands, or any part thereof, or contract debt, or do any other deed, whereby the samen may be apprised, adjudged, or evicted from the other substitute in the tailzie, or the succession frustrate or interrupted, declaring all such DEEDS to be in themselves void and null," etc. Here it will be observed, that after the enumeration of several different prohibitions against selling, contracting debt, etc. the statute proposes the form of a general irritant clause, "declaring all such deeds to be void and null," and by which general term "deeds" is made to comprehend all sales, contractions of debt, alterations of the order of succession, and every other act previously prohibited.

In like manner this mode of expression has been adopted in many of the entails which the Court of Session have had occasion to consider. Thus, in the entail of the estate of Roxburgh, the prohibitory and irritant clauses were in the following terms: "And sicklike it is expressly provided, that it shall not be lawful to the persons before designit and the heirs male of their bodies, nor to the other heirs of of tailzie above written, to make or grant any alienation, disposition, or other right in security whatsoever, of the lands, lordship, baronies, estate, and leiving above specified, nor of no part thereof, nather zit to contract debts, nor do ony [281] deeds quairby the samen may be apprizit, adjudgit, or evicht frae them, nor zit to do ony other thing in hurt or prejudice of thir prests and of the foresaid tailzie and succession in hail or in part, all quhilk deeds sua to be done by them, are by thir prunts declared to be null and of nane avail, force, or effect."

So in the entail of the estate of Tillycountry, which was under the consideration of the Court of Session in 1799, there was a prohibition against selling, altering the order of succession, contracting debt, or doing any other fact or deed, "civil or criminal, by which the lands might be evicted;" and the irritant clause following these prohibitions was in these general terms: "All which deeds are not only declared void and null ipso facto by way of exception, or reply without declarator, or in so far as the same may burden and affect the foresaid estate, but also," etc. An objection was taken to the resolute clause of that entail, but the parties did not question the irritant clause. On the contrary, it was distinctly admitted, that the irritant clause expressed in these terms of general reference to the prohibitory clause was perfectly sufficient.

For the Respondent: An entail with prohibitory and resolute clauses is not effectual against the onerous deeds of the heir in possession, if it contains no irritant clause declaring such deeds to be null and void.

This was settled by the decisions of Baillie against Carmichael (11 July 1731), and Gardiner, etc. against the Heirs of entail of Dunnipace (27 January 1744). It has ever since been held to be fixed law, and is not disputed by the Appellant.

[282] The irritant clause in the present entail is not a general one, applicable to all the prohibitions, but specially and exclusively directed against the debts and deeds which are specified in the particular branch of the prohibitory clause which immediately precedes it; and therefore it has no relation to sales and alienations.

The prohibitory clause in the present entail consists of three distinct branches or members, each of which is introduced by the words, "It shall no ways be lawful," or "Neither shall it be lawful" to me or the heirs of entail. The first branch prohibits the heirs from selling, from altering the order of succession, and from contracting debt; the three restrictions which are essential to a strict entail. The prohibition to contract debt is not an absolute one, but is qualified in favour of the heirs in possession, and that by words so ambiguous in their meaning as to give room for different interpretations. This branch contains also another clause, prohibiting the heirs "to do or to commit any fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be anyways adjudged, evicted, or forfeited;" but the word deed, as used in this restriction, which is a common one in entails, has been invariably held to apply solely to feudal delinquencies, and to have no reference to written instruments or conveyances affecting the lands.

The provision as to contracting of debt, inserted in the first member of the clause, seems to have been thought insufficient, as not applicable to those debts which the heirs of entail might have contracted, or become liable for, before their succession to the [283] estate; and it was further foreseen that the lands might be adjudged for debts left by the entailer himself, or those which the entail permitted the heirs to contract.

But the two classes of debts last mentioned stand in very different situations. Those for which the heirs were liable at the time of their succession it was in the entailer's power, by proper prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, to prevent from ever affecting the estate at all; whereas, having no such power with regard to debts which he might contract himself and leave unpaid, or to debts which he had allowed the heirs to contract, it was necessary to guard against them in a different way.

Hence a separate prohibition, or member of the prohibitory clause, is applied to each class of debts. By one of these prohibitions it is declared not lawful for the heirs to permit the estate to be adjudged or affected "for any debts or deeds contracted or committed by me, or them, before our succession, or by any of our predecessors, whom I, or they, may anyways represent, or in which we as their representatives, may be liable or subject to." And as it was meant to prevent such debts or deeds from affecting the estate at all, there is added the irritant clause in question: "All which debts, deeds, and contractions, are hereby declared void and null, by way of exception or reply, and without declarator, in so far as they may burden or affect the said lands and estate."

Then follows the third member of the prohibitory clause, declaring it unlawful for the heirs to permit the lands to be adjudged for the debts or deeds of [284] the original entailor, Alexander Littlejohn, or for the sum of £500, with which they are allowed to burden the estate. As no irritant clause similar to that applied to the former class of debts, could have been used here, a special resolute clause is immediately subjoined, declaring, that if the heir in possession did not within a certain time redeem any adjudication which might have been led against the estate for the entailor's debts, or the above £500, he should lose and forfeit his right to the lands.

The irritant and resolute clauses above mentioned, being specially applicable to particular prohibitions, left the entail defective, in so far as regarded the restrictions contained in the first branch of the prohibitory clause. The defect has been partly supplied by the insertion of a general resolute clause applicable to the whole prohibitions. But there is no additional irritant clause, the defect having so far escaped observation.

It is argued that the words "all which debts, deeds, and contractions," in the irritant clause, must be held to apply to all the things which had been previously prohibited, the word "deeds" in particular being comprehensive enough to embrace every act of the heir in possession, by which the estate may be alienated, or the order of succession altered: That this word deeds, when it has been used generally in an irritant clause, with reference to the prohibitions which have gone before, has always been held to comprehend every prohibited act: That the irritant clauses both of the Roxburghe and Tillicoultry entails were of this kind, and their efficacy would most certainly have been disputed [285] had it been thought possible to raise a question on the point: That in both those cases the word "deed" had been previously used in the prohibitory clause, in a way which showed it to apply merely to feudal delinquencies: That there is no good ground, therefore, for taking it here in a more limited sense, more especially when there can be no doubt of the intention of the entailor that his estate should descend entire in the line of succession pointed out. But the general intention of an entailor to preserve his estate to the series of heirs he has called, as manifested by his making a deed of the present kind, can be no reason for giving to particular words or expressions an interpretation different from their legal sense. Were such a mode of construction admissible, there is not one of the numerous entails which have been found ineffectual by the courts of law which would not have been sustained as effectual. There is not one where the general object of preserving the estate was not obvious, and where there were not words which, if taken in their most comprehensive sense, might not have been held to imply the restriction contended for. But this is not the rule of construction applicable to such cases. On the contrary it is tritissimè juris that the words in which restraints and limitations are imposed are to be strictly interpreted, and in no case extended beyond the limited signification, in which, according to the proper style of the deed, they are used.

It is also a rule invariably applied to the construction of such deeds, that the sense in which a word which admits of different meanings is to be [286] taken, must be regulated by the context, and will be affected by the other terms with which it may be coupled in the passage where it is found. Thus a prohibition in which the word "dispose" is coupled with the words "sell and alienate" has been found insufficient to prevent a gratuitous disposition, by which the lands were conveyed away from the heirs of entail: and in the same cases the prohibition to "do" or "to grant any other deed, whereby the lands might be evicted," was found ineffectual to prevent an alteration of the succession, because it was held as restricted to things of the same kind with those previously enumerated.*

Now the word deed, as used in this irritant clause, is not a single or insulated one, as in the Roxburghe or Tillicoultry entails. It is coupled with others, and placed betwixt two, which being specially and exclusively applicable to burdens of the nature of debt, leave no doubt as to the proper sense. The things declared null are "debts, deeds, and contractions." The deeds therefore in view must be such as are of a nature to create a debt or burden. The conveyancer, by adding the word contractions, which is nearly if not wholly synonymous with debts, shows clearly that the whole expression must be held to denote things of the same kind. Had he conceived the word "debts" to be sufficient to express all burdens of this nature, and used the term "deeds" to denote things of a quite different kind, he could never have thought of adding the word "contractions," which can apply only to those [287] very things which are supposed to have been already dismissed from his mind, as sufficiently designated by the term "debts." As the first and last are clearly of limited signification, the intermediate term, though more flexible in its nature, can only be taken in a sense consistent with that of its adjuncts. The whole forms a complex expression, which cannot be understood to comprehend things of a kind altogether different from those denoted by any one of its terms.

* 8th July 1789, Stewart against Home; and 25th May 1808, Brown against the Countess of Dalhousie.

The same inference is no less clearly deducible from the context which immediately precedes the irritant words. These do not, as in the Roxburghe and Tillicoultry cases, form a separate clause coming after all the prohibitions, and having no particular relation to any one. They are added to, and make a part of, the second branch of the prohibitory clause, so as to have a special relation to what is contained there. The words, "all which debts, deeds, and contractions," refer to some debts and deeds which had been previously mentioned; and if there are to be found in the same member of the clause, and in the sentence immediately preceding, the words "debts and deeds," these must, according to every known rule of legal or grammatical construction, be held the proper antecedents of the pronoun "which," and it is not allowable to seek for them elsewhere. When the entailor, after prohibiting his heirs to allow the estate to be evicted "for any debts or deeds contracted or committed by me or them before our succession," immediately subjoins "all which debts, deeds, and contractions are hereby declared null," we cannot in sound construction [288] hold the debts and deeds so annulled to be any other than those so contracted or committed by the heirs before their succession.

There occurs, it is true, in the first branch of the prohibitory clause, the words debts and deeds. The heirs are there prohibited "to contract debt above £500 at one time, or to do or commit any fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the lands may be adjudged or forfeited." But so far is the occurrence of the words there from being a reason for extending the irritant clause to the whole prohibitions, that it affords the clearest evidence against its extending to any of them.

The entailor, while he was expressly leaving the heirs at liberty to contract debts to the extent of £500 at one time, could never have thought of declaring the whole debts contracted by them to be null and void. This would have been quite inconsistent with the prohibition itself; and had an irritant clause been contemplated, as applicable to this species of debt, it must, it is evident, have been qualified in the same manner as the prohibition. It could only have declared the debts contracted by the heir in possession to be null, in so far as they exceeded the sum of £500 at one time.

The same observation applies to the prohibition to commit facts or deeds, civil or criminal, whereby the lands may be evicted or forfeited; for the entailor could not by any declaration take away the rights of the crown or the superior, in cases of treason or feudal delinquency, though he might resolve the right of the heir who was guilty of them.

[289] But if the irritant clause is not applicable to those restrictions in the first branch of the prohibitory clause in which the words debts and deeds actually occur, still less can it have any reference to the prohibition which respects selling.

A question as to the meaning of the word deed, when used in the irritant clause of an entail, was determined by the Court of Session in circumstances much more favourable for an extensive interpretation than the present (Sir John Dick against Drysdale) (Fac. Coll. 14 Jan. 1812). But it was taken there in the restricted sense of feudal delinquencies, because this was the sense in which it had been previously used by the entailor.

For the Appellant, Mr. J. P. Grant.

For the Respondent, Mr. Cranston.

The Lord Chancellor: I have fully considered this case, and, independently of the authority cited by Mr. Cranston (Dick v. Drysdale), I think the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

A POWER reserved upon a marriage settlement to Tenants for life to grant or renew leases for lives, provided that a right of re-entry is reserved upon such leases for non-payment of rent, is well executed by a lease for lives providing a re-entry in case the rent remains in arrears fifteen days, and there is no sufficient distresses on the premises.

B. M. being seised, etc. in fee of lands, etc. devised the lands, etc. to his daughter, L. B. for life, with remainders over: with a power to her in consideration of marriage, either before or after marriage, of revocation and appointment. B. M. died seised, without altering his will, leaving his daughter, L. B. seised of the lands, etc. for life, with power, etc.

L. B. intermarried with G. V. V.

Before the marriage, L. B. being seised as aforesaid, by deed, in conformity with the power in the will of B. M. and in consideration of the marriage, revoked the uses and devises contained in the will, and appointed and limited the lands, etc. to F. Earl of G. and C. M. and their heirs, in trust, to hold the same to the uses before limited, until after the marriage, and then to the use of G. V. V. for life, remainder to L. B. (the grantor) for life, remainder to preserve, etc.: and after the decease of the survivor of them to divers other uses for the benefit of their issue: and in default of issue to the use of the will of L. B.: and in the mean time to the use of L. B. her heirs and assigns.

In the deed was contained a leasing power to and for [291] G. V. V. and L. B. from time to time during their respective lives, when and as they should respectively be in possession of the lands, etc. by indenture or indentures, under their respective hands and seals, attested by two or more credible witnesses, to demise such parts of the lands, etc. as now are leased for lives, or for years determinable on lives, in possession or reversion for lives, or for any number of years determinable on lives, so as there be not any greater estate or interest subsisting at any one time than what will wear out or be determinable on the dropping of three lives, and so as on every such lease there be reserved and made payable, during the continuance of the estates and interests thereby to be demised, leased, or granted respectively, the ancient and accustomed duties and services, or more, or as great or beneficial rents, duties and services, or more, as now are, or at the time of demising or granting the premises so to be demised, leased, or granted respectively, were reserved or made payable for the same premises respectively, or a just proportion, etc. (except heriots, etc.) all such rents, duties, and services respectively, to be incident to and go along with the reversion and remainder of the same premises expectant on the determination of the respective demises, etc. and so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent thereby to be reserved, and so as, etc. etc.: and also by indenture under hand and seal, attested as aforesaid, to demise all or any of the lands, etc. for any term absolute, not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, etc. so as upon every such lease there be reserved, during the continuance of such lease, so much or as great and beneficial yearly and other rent, and services proportionably, as now is paid, or the best and most improved yearly rent, etc. without taking any fine, premium, or foregift, etc. : and so as in every such lease for any term of years absolute respectively, there be contained a clause of re-entry in case the rent or rents thereupon to be reserved be behind or unpaid by the space of twenty-eight days after the times thereby respectively appointed for payment thereof : and also by indenture under hand and seal, attested as aforesaid, to demise the lands, etc. wherein any mine, etc.

[292] On the 5th September 1803, G. V. V. being seised of the lands for life, by an indenture of lease, in consideration of, etc. let premises, part of the lands, in settlement, which had been and were then under a lease for years determinable on lives, to C. S. and H. S., their executors and administrators, for ninety-nine years, if C. S., H. S. and J. S., or either of them, should so long live, yielding, etc. the yearly rent of £2 at Michaelmas and Lady Day, and one couple of fat capons on, etc.

The indenture contained a covenant by the lessees for the payment of a proportion etc. : and a covenant for the payment of the yearly rent of £2, and for the performance of the duties, etc. And also a proviso : " that if it should happen at any time during the estate thereby granted that the said yearly rent or sum of £2, and every or any of the duties, services, reservations and payments thereby reserved, or any part thereof, should be behind, unpaid, or undone, in part or in all, by the space of fifteen days next over or after any or either of the days or times whereat or whereupon the same ought to be paid, done, or performed as aforesaid, and no sufficient distress or distresses can or may be had and taken upon the said premises, whereby the same and all arrearages thereof, if any be, may be fully raised, levied and paid, etc. : or if any default should be made in the payment or performance of all or any of the reservations, covenants and agreements therein-before contained, that then and from thenceforth, in all or any or either of the said cases, it should be lawful to and for the said G. V. V., his heirs and assigns, and the person and persons to whom the freehold or inheritance of the premises should belong, into the premises, etc. to re-enter, and the same to have, hold, retain, possess and enjoy, as in his and their former estate, etc."

After the death of the tenants for life, upon a trial in ejectment by the grantees c. the devisee under the will of L. M., against the parties holding under this demise, it was found by special verdict, that the rents, duties, reservations, and payments reserved by the indenture, and secured by the render, covenants, and power of re-entry therein contained, at the time of making the indenture, were ancient and accustomed, [233] and then were as great and beneficial as any which at the time of making the deed, or at any time thereafter, were or had been reserved in respect of the premises demised.

And that the usual and accustomed form of leases of the estate, contained in the settlement for lives or years determinable on lives, as well prior as subsequent to that settlement, was, with a conditional proviso of re-entry, similar to that in the indenture of demise in question.

Held, affirming a judgment of the King's Bench, and reversing a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, that the evidence from the former leases was properly admitted and introduced into the special verdict : and that the lease in question, according to the practice of conveyancers, was by implication within the terms of the power, and valid.

George, Earl of Jersey, Edward Ellice, and Alexander Murray, brought an ejectment in the Court of King's Bench in Michaelmas Term 1813, against Henry Smith for the recovery of a tenement, with the appurtenances, called Taly Cuba Lledr, in the parish of Llanisamlet in the county of Glamorgan, then in the possession of Henry Smith. There were two demises laid in the declaration : the first on the 11th July 1813, and the second on the 11th January 1814. Henry Smith defended and pleaded the general issue.

At the Summer Assizes in the year 1815, the cause was tried before Baron Wood, at Hereford, when a special verdict was found, stating in substance as follows :

That the Honourable Bussey Mansel, afterwards the Right honourable Bussey Lord Mansel, Baron Mansel, of Margam, in the county of Glamorgan, being seised in fee of the premises in the declaration [294] mentioned, being a tenement called Tal-y-Coba-Uchaf, made his will, dated the 11th December 1749, by which he devised the said tenement, amongst other things, in remainder, after certain limitations which never took effect, to his daughter, Louisa Barbara, for life, with remainders over ; and a power to her in consideration of marriage, either before or after marriage, of revocation and appointment, as afterwards pursued by her in the deed of settlement hereafter mentioned.

That Lord Mansel died on the 29th of November 1750, seised as aforesaid, without altering his will as to the said premises, leaving his daughter, Louisa Barbara, his only child him surviving, seised for life of the said premises.

That the said Louisa Barbara, on the 20th July 1757, intermarried with George Venables Vernon, the younger, afterwards the Right honourable George Venables Vernon, Lord Vernon, Baron of Kinderton, in the county of Chester.

That before the said marriage, the said Louisa Barbara being seised as aforesaid, by deed dated the 2d July 1757, in conformity with the said power in the said will of the said Lord Mansel, and in consideration of the said marriage, revoked the uses and devises contained in the said will concerning the said premises, and appointed and limited the same to Francis Earl of Guildford and Charles Montague, and their heirs, in trust, to hold the same to the same uses as before limited until after the said marriage, and then to the uses of the said George Venables Vernon for life, without impeachment-[295]-ment of waste, remainder to the said Louisa Barbara for life, without impeachment of waste, and in the mean time to one said Francis Earl of Guildford and Charles Montague, and their heirs, to preserve contingent remainders ; and to permit the said George during his life, and afterwards the said Louisa Barbara during her life, to take the rents, etc. ; and after the decease of the survivor of them, to divers other uses for the benefit of their issue ; and in default of issue, to the use of the will of the said Louisa Barbara, and subject to the powers and limitations to be thereby directed and appointed ; and in the mean time to the use of the said Louisa Barbara, her heirs and assigns, for ever.

In the said deed was contained a leasing power in these words : “ Provided always, and it is hereby further declared and agreed, by and between the said parties to these presents, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said George Venables Vernon the younger, and Louisa Barbara Mansel, his intended wife, from time to time, during their respective lives, when and as they shall respectively be in possession of or entitled to the perception of the rents and profits of the manors, messuages, lands, hereditaments and premises, so limited to them for their respective lives as aforesaid, by indenture or indentures, under their respective hands and seals, attested by two or more credible witnesses, to demise, lease, or grant such part or parts of the said manors, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, or parts or shares of manors, messuages, lands, tenements, heredita-[296]-ments and premises, whereof they shall be so respectively in possession or entitled to the perception of the rents and profits as aforesaid, as now are leased for life or lives, or for years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives, to any person or persons, in possession or reversion, for one, two, or three lives, or for any number of years determinable on the dropping of one, two, or three lives, so as there be not on any part or parcel of the same premises to be demised, leased, or granted respectively, for a life or lives, or for years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives as before mentioned, any greater estate or interest subsisting at any one time than what will wear out or be determinable on the dropping of three lives, and so as on every such respective lease, demise, or grant for a life or lives, or for years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives, there be reserved and made payable during the continuance of the estates and interests thereby to be demised, leased, or granted respectively, the ancient and accustomed yearly rents, duties, and services, or more, or as great or beneficial rents, duties and services, or more, as now are, or at the time of demising or granting the premises so to be demised, leased, or granted respectively, were reserved or made payable for or in respect of the same premises respectively, or a just proportion of such ancient or the present reserved rents, duties, and services, or more, according to the value of the premises so to be demised, leased or granted respectively (except heriots, which shall [297] or may be varied, or altered or compounded for, according to the will and pleasure of the said George Venables Vernon the younger, and Louisa Barbara Mansel), all such rents, duties, and services respectively, to be incident to and go along with the reversion and remainder of the same premises, expectant on the determination of the said respective demises, leases, and grants thereof, and so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent thereby to be reserved; and so as the respective lessees to whom such lease or leases shall be made as aforesaid be not, by any express clause to be contained in any such leases respectively, freed from impeachment of waste; and so as the said respective lessee or lessees, to whom any such lease or leases shall be made respectively as aforesaid, doth and do seal and deliver a counterpart or counterparts of such lease or leases respectively; and also by indenture or indentures under their respective hands and seals, attested as aforesaid, to demise, lease, or grant all or any of the said manors, messuages, lands, hereditaments and premises, and parts and shares of manors, messuages, lands, hereditaments and premises, or any of them, so limited to them the said George Venables Vernon the younger and Louisa Barbara Mansel, his intended wife, for their respective lives as aforesaid, for any term or number of years absolute, not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, and not in reversion, or by way of future interest, so as upon every such [298] lease for an absolute term not exceeding twenty-one years there be reserved and made payable, during the continuance of such lease or leases, so much or as great and beneficial yearly and other rent and rents, and other services proportionably, as now is and are therefore paid and yielded, or the best and most improved yearly rent and rents that can be reasonably had or obtained for the same, without taking any fine, premium, or foregift, or any thing in the nature or in lieu thereof, to be incident to and go along with the reversion and remainder of the same premises expectant on the determination of the said respective leases; and so as the respective lessees, to whom such lease or leases shall be made, be not, by any express clause to be contained in any of such leases respectively, freed from impeachment of waste; and so as the said respective lessee and lessees, to whom any lease or leases shall be made respectively as aforesaid, doth and do seal and deliver a counterpart or counterparts of such lease or leases respectively; and so as in every such lease for any term of years absolute respectively there be contained a clause of re-entry, in case the rent or rents thereupon to be reserved, be behind or unpaid by the space of twenty-eight days after the times thereby respectively appointed for payment thereof; And also by indenture or indentures under their respective hands and seals, attested as aforesaid, to demise, lease, and grant all or any part of the lands, hereditaments and premises so limited to them the said George Venables Vernon the younger, and [299] Louisa Barbara Mansel, his intended wife, for their respective lives as aforesaid, wherein or whereupon any mine or mines now is or are open, or wherein or whereon any person or persons shall be willing to open any mine or mines, sough or soughs, or other thing or things whatsoever, which may be requisite and necessary for the digging and getting of lead or copper ore, or any metal or mineral whatsoever, unto any person or persons, for any term or number of years not exceeding thirty-one years, to take effect in possession and not in reversion, or by way of future interest; and so as upon every such lease for an absolute term, not exceeding thirty-one years, there be reserved and made payable, during the continuance of such lease or leases, such part or share of the lead, copper ore, coal, and other produce to be gotten from the said mines, or such yearly rent or income in respect thereof, as can reasonably be had or obtainable for the same, without taking any fine, premium or foregift, or any thing in the nature or in lieu thereof, to be incident to and go along with the reversion and remainder of the same premises expectant, on the determination of the said respective leases; and so as the respective lessees to whom such lease or leases shall be made, be not, by any express clause to be contained in any of such leases respectively, freed from impeachment of waste, other than in the necessary and reasonable winning or working thereof; and so as the said respective lessee and lessees, to whom any lease or leases shall be made respectively as aforesaid, doth and [300] do seal and deliver a counterpart or counterparts of such lease or leases respectively; and so as there be also inserted such proper and usual covenants for the effectually winning and working the said mines and smelting the ore, and doing all other proper and necessary acts, as are usually inserted in leases of the like nature."

The said George Venables Vernon after the said marriage became seised for life of the said premises, and entitled to the receipt of the rents, etc.

Before the making the said deed of settlement, and until the surrender hereafter mentioned, the said premises were under lease for a term of years determinable on the lives of three persons, who died before the 11th day of July mentioned in the declaration.

On the 5th September 1803, the said George Venables Vernon being seised of the said premises as aforesaid, and entitled to and in receipt of the rents, etc. by an indenture of lease between him (then Lord Vernon) of the one part, and Charles Smith (since deceased), and the said Henry Smith of the other part, in consideration of the surrender of the said former lease, and of £105 paid to the said Lord Vernon by the said Charles and Henry Smith, and of other matters in the said indenture specified, let the said premises called Tal-y-Coba-Uchaf to the said Charles Smith and Henry Smith, their executors and administrators, for ninety-nine years from the date of the said indenture, if the said Charles Smith, Henry Smith, and John Smith, son of the said Charles, or either of [301] them, should so long live, yielding therefore to the said Lord Vernon, etc. the yearly rent of £2 at Michaelmas and Lady Day, and one couple of fat capons on the first of January yearly, during the term, or 1s. 6d. in lieu, at the election of Lord Vernon, etc., also the heriots and services in the said indenture specified.

The said indenture contains a covenant by the said lessees for the payment of a proportion of the said reserved rent, in case the term should determine between any of the days of payment by the death of the persons named in the said lease; also a covenant by the said lessees for the payment of the said yearly rent of £2, and for the performance of the duties, heriots, suits, services, etc. at the times and in the manner limited and appointed in the said lease. And the said lease contains a proviso in these words: " Provided always, that if it shall happen at any time during the said estate hereby granted, that the said yearly rent or sum of £2 and every or any of the duties, services, reservations and payments hereby reserved, or any part thereof, shall be behind, unpaid, or undone, in part or in all, by the space of fifteen days next over or after any or either of the days or times whereat or whereupon the same ought to be paid, done, or performed as aforesaid, and no sufficient distress or distresses can or may be had and taken upon the said premises, whereby the same and all arrearages thereof, if any be, may be fully raised, levied, and paid, or if the said Charles Smith and Henry Smith, their executors, [302] administrators or assigns, or undertenants, or any of them, shall suffer and leave the said premises, or any part thereof, to continue in decay or unrepaid, by the space of six calendar months next after such view had, and notice given or left as aforesaid, or shall do or commit, or cause or suffer to be committed or done, any wilful waste, spoil, or destruction in or upon the said premises, or any part thereof, or shall at any time during the said term grind any part of their corn or grain at any other mill than such mill so to be appointed by the said George Lord Vernon, his heirs or assigns, or such person or persons to whom the freehold or inheritance of the premises shall as aforesaid belong (the same being in repair and order to grind such corn and grain,) or if the said Charles Smith and Henry Smith, their executors and administrators, or any or either of them, shall at any time during the estate hereby granted give, grant, bargain, sell, assign, or otherwise depart with this present demise and lease, or with their or either of their estate or interest herein, without the license and consent of the said George Lord Vernon, his heirs or assigns, or of the person or persons to whom the freehold or inheritance of the premises shall as aforesaid belong, in writing, under his or their hands thereunto first had and obtained, or if any default shall be by them, the said Charles Smith and Henry Smith, their executors, administrators or assigns, made in the payment or performance of all or any of the reservations, covenants, and agreements hereinbefore [303] on their parts contained, that then and from thenceforth, in all or any or either of the said cases, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said George Lord Vernon, his heirs and assigns, and the person and persons to whom the freehold or inheritance of the premises shall as aforesaid belong, into and upon the said premises hereby demised, and into every part and parcel thereof, wholly to re-enter, and the same to have, hold, retain, possess, and enjoy, as in his and their former and proper estate, against the said Charles

Smith and Henry Smith, their executors, administrators or assigns, these presents, or any thing herein contained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding."

The said lease does not contain any other than the above-recited power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent reserved. The said Charles Smith and Henry Smith executed and delivered a counterpart of the said lease.

The rents, duties, reservations and payments reserved by the said indenture, and secured by the render, covenants, and power of re-entry therein contained, at the time of making the said indenture, were ancient and accustomed, and then were as great and beneficial as any which at the time of making the deed of 2d July 1757, or at any time thereafter, previous to making the said indenture of 5th September 1803, were or had been reserved, in respect of the said premises demised by the said indenture.

The premises demised by the said indenture, and [304] the premises mentioned in the said declaration, are the same.

The usual and accustomed form of leases of the estate, contained in the said settlement of 2d July 1757, for lives, or years determinable on lives, as well prior as subsequent to that settlement, was, with a conditional proviso of re-entry, similar to that in the said indenture of 5th September 1803.

All the rents, duties and services reserved by the said indenture, which accrued in the lifetime of Lord Vernon, have been discharged and performed; and the said Henry Smith has been ready to pay and perform all things that would have accrued to this time, supposing the said indenture to have continued in force and undetermined.

The said Charles Smith died on the 1st January 1813; the said Henry Smith and John Smith are still living.

The said Louisa Barbara, by virtue of the said powers to her granted, made her will, dated 5th August 1783, duly attested, signed and published, and thereby devised the said premises, subject to the estate for life of her said husband therein, unto Thomas Earl of Clarendon for life, remainder to William Augustus Henry Villiers, afterwards William Augustus Henry Villiers Mansel, second son of George Bussey Villiers Earl of Jersey, and his heirs.

The said Louisa Barbara died on the 1st January 1786 without issue, and without altering her said will as to the said devise of the said premises.

The said Earl of Clarendon died on the 1st January 1787, whereupon the said William Augustus [305] Henry Villiers was seised in fee of the said remainder, subject to the said life-estate of the said Lord Vernon.

By indentures of lease and release, the former bearing date the 4th January 1812, and the latter the 6th January 1812, the said William Augustus Henry Villiers, being so seised of the said remainder as aforesaid, conveyed the same to George Earl of Jersey, Edward Ellice, and Alexander Murray, who thereupon were seised of the said last-mentioned remainders.

Lord Vernon afterwards, and before the 11th of July, the day mentioned in the declaration, died, whereupon the said George Earl of Jersey, Edward Ellice, and Alexander Murray, were seised in fee of the said premises.

The special verdict then finds the leases by the said George Earl of Jersey, Edward Ellice, and Alexander Murray, the lessors of the plaintiff, in support of the several demises in the first and second counts of the declaration mentioned, also the entries and ousters as in the declaration mentioned, and concludes in the usual form, referring the matters to the court.

This special verdict was argued before the judges of the Court of King's Bench, at Serjeant's Inn, at the sittings holden there before Michaelmas Term 1816, and in the ensuing term the Court pronounced their judgment for the defendant (5 Maule and Selwyn, p. 167.)

From this judgment the plaintiffs brought their writ of error into the Exchequer Chamber, where [306] the case was twice argued, and four of the Judges of that court being of opinion for a reversal, and three for an affirmance of the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, that judgment was reversed accordingly (1 Burr. and Brod. p. 97; 3 Moore, p. 339.) From that judgment of reversal the original defendant brought a writ of error returnable in parliament, praying that the judgment of reversal might be reversed.

For the plaintiff in error: 1st. The intention of the donor of a power is to be collected from the whole of the deed whereby that power is created; from the plan and design of it as well as the words, and also from the circumstances of the property which is by him subjected to the operations of that power; and in the construction of the particular instrument executed under such power, the law will expound it with an inclination to preserve rather than to destroy the instrument, "ut res magis valeat quam pereat;" "It is the office of a judge to preserve, not to destroy an estate" (See Cotter v. Merrick, Hardr. 93, per Parker, Baron.)

2d. The only objection raised to the lease under which the plaintiff in error holds is, that the proviso for re-entry therein contained is not such as is required by the leasing power under which it was granted by Lord Vernon, as not being absolute, unconditional, and capable of being enforced instantly upon every default of payment of rent, on the very day on which such default takes place; but the words [307] of the power do not require a proviso for re-entry absolute, unconditional, and capable of being enforced instantly, such words being only "so as there be contained, in every such lease a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent." It is undoubtedly a condition precedent to the due execution of the leasing power, that there should be reserved in all leases granted under such power "a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent;" but in what terms that power of re-entry is to be reserved the settlement is wholly silent, and the argument for the Defendant in error is, that from the non-expression of any terms in which that proviso is to be framed, it necessarily results that the comprehensive expression, "a power of re-entry" (which comprehends and includes every proviso of re-entry adapted to the object for which it is required,) must be narrowed to one particular proviso for re-entry, absolute, unconditional, and capable of being enforced instantly upon every default. But the expression "a power of re-entry" is no description of the particular form, though it is of the general object of the condition to be introduced into the lease, and the language of the leasing power is fully satisfied by a proviso for re-entry such as is contained in the lease now sought to be set aside by Lord Jersey, which, though not an absolute, unconditional proviso, and capable of being enforced instantly upon every default, is nevertheless "a power of re-entry," sufficient for the object for which it was required, such as was in use upon the estate to which the leasing power applies at the time when it was created, and such as the general term used in the leasing power, [308] so far from either expressly or impliedly disapproving, seems advisedly to sanction, especially when it is recollected that in a subsequent part of the same leasing power, as applicable to the rack-rent estates, the donor of the power omits the general and larger term, "a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent," and specifically chalks out the very power to be introduced into such leases, viz. "a clause of re-entry, in case the rent to be reserved be behind or unpaid by the space of twenty-eight days after the times thereby respectively appointed for payment thereof." Thus, in this latter case, where large rents were to be secured, defining the extent of indulgence to the tenant, and furnishing the very clause to be introduced, as contra-distinguished from the more general and comprehensive expression previously used, viz. "a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent." Can it be successfully contended that this expression conveys a perfect idea to the mind of the nature and form of the power of re-entry required? It points out, indeed, distinctly the wish of those who framed the settlement that there should be some power of re-entry in all leases of this description, but not the precise terms in which such power shall be reserved. Had the power required a covenant on the part of the lessee to build a house upon the premises, it would still have been a question what house, and a lease stipulating for the building a house of given dimensions, and within a prescribed time, must have been judged of by the law as a reasonable or unreasonable compliance with the condition.

3d. If the language of the leasing power has been [309] literally attended to in the lease executed under such power, the next consideration will be, whether the spirit also is preserved; or whether there be any thing in the plan and design of such leasing power, and the circumstances of the property to be leased, which, by disclosing a different intention in the donor of the power from that which occurs on the mere reading of the words themselves, thereby imposes a different construction upon such words. The leases under the power are of three sorts. First, leases for lives, or determinable on lives, which are renewable on fines, and where the rents reserved are nominal: secondly, leases for years, where a rack-rent is reserved:

and thirdly, mining-leases, in which no reservation of a power of re-entry is required. The lease in question is of the first sort, and the proviso therefore for re-entry rather introduced with a view of enforcing regular acknowledgment of the tenancy, than of securing a succession of large payments at stated periods. It is not improbable, therefore, with such an object, that some discretion should be left to the person by whom the power was to be executed as to the form of the proviso. If the words of the leasing power allow such discretion, is there any reason on which its exclusion can be founded? Is the security of the nominal rents endangered by it? Are the acknowledgments of a subsisting tenancy less likely to be regular in a case where the property of the tenant, if hazarded by irregularity, is hazarded to so great an extent as that of the loss of a valuable lease for lives held under a nominal rent, than where it consists only of a short term at a rack-rent? On the contrary, considering that two objects [310] must have been present to the mind of the framer of the leasing power: first, the securing the rents to those who were to benefit by them; second, the preservation of the estate in good condition when the lease determined: has not the language of the power been designedly varied, when directing the reservation of the right of re-entry in the two sets of leases? In the leases for lives, where a small proportion of the annual value is to be paid in the shape of rent, and where a distress might be resorted to without injury to the estate, a mere reservation of the right of re-entry is required, in such manner and form as should be found discreet and beneficial, and adapted to the object in view; but in the rack-rent leases a precise and well defined clause of re-entry is pointed out, because the interest of both tenant for life and remainder-man is materially consulted in the reserved power of re-possessing themselves of land for which the lessee is not able to pay the rack-rent within twenty-eight days from the time of its becoming due, and where a distress taken for such rent, if resorted to, would probably not secure the rent, but certainly injure the cultivation of the estate.

4th. If the literal language of the condition be not violated, and there be nothing in the spirit of the leasing power giving a meaning beyond the words used, the principle which has hitherto governed in cases of this kind must govern in this case, which is, that where a special clause of re-entry is prescribed by the power, that clause cannot be departed from, even in trivial circumstances, without defeating the lease made under the power; the donor of the power being in this respect the legislator, and having a [311] right to impose any condition precedent he pleases, provided it be not inconsistent with law, and which, when once plainly expressed by him, is not subject to any examination of its reasonableness or unreasonableness. But if no special clause be furnished by him, but merely a direction given that certain leases shall contain "a power of re-entry," then if a clause reserving the right of re-entry be inserted, the will and direction of the legislator is complied with, unless the power be executed in a fraudulent or illusory manner, which neither law nor equity would hold to be any compliance at all. Such is the true result of Core v. Day (13 East, 118), explained as that case is by the subsequent decision in this case, when in the Court of King's Bench, of two of the same learned Judges who signed the certificate in Core v. Day; for in that case the power having prescribed a particular clause, that is, in the event of the rent being behind a specified number of days, those learned Judges held a proviso for re-entry, which added terms not used in the particular clause prescribed by the power to have vitiated the lease. But in this case the settlement only requiring "a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent," and the lease containing the clause of re-entry in question, they considered the words of the power to have been complied with, such compliance being not only literal, but not impeachable on the ground of any fraud or contrivance, and, on the contrary, fair and reasonable.

5th. In considering whether the lease be bad on the ground of any excess in the indulgence given to [312] the tenant, where the power, as in this case, prescribes no precise clause of re-entry, it is most material to ascertain what was the indulgence granted in leases of this estate prior and subsequent to the settlement creating this power. No such inquiry, it may be safely conceded, can be admitted where the precise clause is prescribed by the power; but where the power is silent as to the particular nature of the condition, if it follows from thence that some discretion is to be exercised by him who executes the power in framing the condition, the discretion heretofore sanctioned by the donor of the power, who if she had spoken, must have been obeyed, is fit evidence to guide the judgment where she has been silent. It seems difficult to maintain by argument, that where, by the terms of the condition, reference is made to prior leases impliedly, as where "ancient" or "accustomed rents, or rents as beneficial as the ancient rents," are spoken of, such evidence is not admissible to ascertain either the propriety of the new rents as compared with the old rents in amount, or the propriety of the mode in which they are reserved or secured as compared with the ancient mode of reserving or securing them. But it is said, there is no implied reference in the very words directing the reservation of the power of re-entry. If however the words "a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent" embrace every power of re-entry, properly so called, then some assistance is necessary to ascertain what particular power of re-entry should be introduced, and none better can be had than that which the leases prior and subsequent to the settlement furnish, as directing [313] the will of her whose will alone is to be consulted on the occasion: and though it is clear that her will of to-day cannot be contradicted by her will of yesterday or to-morrow, yet it is equally clear that those who contend that such will must be the sole guide, must be content to find it elsewhere if they cannot find it in the power itself. For however general the power in its terms, it seems not more repugnant to reason to contend that the execution thereof is thereby left absolutely to the tenant for life, since that would destroy the condition altogether, than to contend that the very generality of the words confines its execution to one, and one only form of proviso for re-entry, and that of the narrowest and most limited form. But upon sound reasoning it must be conceded, that in such case the limit to the exercise of discretion by the tenant for life must be sought for, either in the arbitrary rules of law, or in such facts as are fit to regulate the decision of the law: and as in the same power, for a different object, viz. the reservation of the rent, the settler has himself impliedly referred to former leases, why may he not be considered also, in this particular, as referring to former leases, and therefore framing the power in general terms? Either that must be the conclusion, or some more unsatisfactory source of evidence must be introduced, or there must be no limit to the discretion of the tenant for life, or the power must be narrowed to something less than its terms by some supposed will of the settler, not evidenced either by his words or his acts. The evidence therefore admitted at the trial was properly admitted, [314] and the result drawn by the jury a matter of much weight in the consideration of this case.

6th. If the terms of the power be such as to leave the terms of the proviso unfettered by positive direction, there seems little reason to quarrel with the extent of the indulgence, in point of time, granted to the lessee: and such has been the concession throughout the argument of this case. Much more fault has been found with the latter qualification of the proviso, by those who have argued for the defendant in error, viz. with that part which restrains the right of re-entry to the case where no sufficient distress or distresses may be had or taken upon the premises. The reasonableness of this qualification, as applied to the particular rents reserved in these leases, and the nature of the property leased, has been already pointed out: in addition however it is to be observed, that the statute law has not only spoken the same language, but it may be doubted whether it has not restricted all lessors from exercising any right of re-entry not guarded by this reasonable qualification. The 4th Geo. II. ch. 28, s. 2, provides, that as often as it shall happen "that one half year's rent shall be in arrear," the lessor "shall and may" without any formal demand or re-entry, serve a declaration in ejectment for the recovery of the premises: and in case of judgment against the casual ejector, if it shall be made appear to the court that half a year's rent was due before the declaration was served, "and that no sufficient distress was to be found on the demised premises," and that the lessor had power to re-enter, then he [315] shall be entitled to judgment and possession. It then proceeds to bar all relief against such judgments, except on payment of such rent and arrears, together with full costs, within six months. The interests of the lessor and the lessee are by this statute equally provided for: the former is relieved from the formalities of the old common-law entry: the latter is protected against the forfeiture of his interest, in case there be sufficient to satisfy the rent by way of distress upon the premises. The Legislature has thus recognized the reasonableness of a provision preventing forfeiture, where there is a sufficient distress, and so far affords a strong argument in favour of the clause for re-entry contained in the lease now under consideration. But has it not gone farther? Do not the words speak imperatively that no re-entry shall be enforced where there is such sufficiency of distress? The language of the 8th and 9th W. III., respecting the breaches to be assigned upon bonds, is not so strong; for there the Legislature only says the plaintiff "may" assign as many breaches as he shall think fit upon the bond, giving the defendant the opportunity of paying the money into court after judgment and before execution. But the courts of law have construed this statute as imperative upon the plaintiff to do what he is there told he "may" do; whereas in the 4 Geo. II., the language is "shall and may:" and as in both statutes the object is the same, viz. to relieve the subject from the necessity of seeking the aid of a court of equity against the technical difficulties of the common law, why should not this equitable provision in [316] each statute be construed to be a compulsory provision, and especially in the statute of Geo. II. where it is introduced with the words "shall and may?" If it be a compulsory provision, applicable to all cases of re-entry, and not confined to cases of re-entry under that statute, then the clause in question conforms itself to the law, and no more: if it be applicable only to cases under the statute, then, by analogy thereto, this leasing power is reasonably executed, being qualified in its execution by what the law of the land has deemed reasonable, and being from the terms in which it is penned open to such qualification.

For the Defendants in Error: 1st. The leasing power in the marriage settlement of 1757 (a power granted by a person having the absolute dominion of the fee to a purchaser of a life-estate), expressly requires that the leases shall contain "a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved," which makes it necessary, that the right to re-enter should attach immediately on the rent being unpaid; whereas the lease under which the Defendant in the ejectment claims, postpones the right of re-entry for fifteen days after the day of payment, thus depriving the reversioner of a part of that benefit which by the condition annexed to the leasing power was intended to be secured to him. If such postponement be allowed for 15 days, why may it not be allowed for 30, 40, 100 or any other number of days so great as to make the power of re-entry nearly or quite unavailing? Where is the line to be [317] drawn? If it be allowable to deprive the reversioner of any part of that right of re-entry which the creator of the leasing power says he shall have, of what part may he be deprived? Only two lines can be drawn, either the tenant for life is obliged to reserve the whole right of re-entry, or no part of it. And as the latter rule cannot be supported, it follows, that the right of re-entry in the lease should be fully commensurate with that required by the leasing power, and that this lease is void as an execution of that power.

2d. The lease in question is liable to the further objection, that the leasing power requires that the lease shall contain "a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved," whereas the lease contains no such power, but only gives the lord a right to re-enter for the absence of distress for rent unpaid. The meaning of the words of the leasing power is perfectly plain and unequivocal: "a power of re-entry," means something enabling a man to re-enter, and "a power of re-entry for the non-payment of the rent" signifies something enabling a man to re-enter on the occasion, or for the cause of non-payment of rent: now the lease in question certainly does not enable the reversioner to re-enter on such occasion, or for such cause; inasmuch as the whole rent for any number of years may be unpaid, and yet he may not be enabled to re-enter. In the case of Croft v. Day (13 East, 118), this point was expressly decided.

3d. It is said, in support of the lease, that the [318] creator of the power has used very general language, that a power is required, without saying what power; and that the power of re-entry in this lease is sufficient, because it is a reasonable power, and was usual on the estate. It is true, the language of the leasing power is general, so general, that only one quality is specified, which the power of re-entry is required to have, that it should be for non-payment of rent, but the creator of the power having exacted this one condition only, is certainly no reason why a compliance with that condition should be dispensed with. The leasing power requires that the power of re-entry should be for non-payment of rent, and it does not require that it should be usual or reasonable; why then should the leasing power be so construed as to dispense with the former condition, which by its terms is annexed to its execution, and to exact a compliance with the latter which is not so annexed. Besides, it is not found that this conditional clause of re-entry is reasonable, or that it is usual generally: it is only found to be usual on the estate, which is not only not the same thing as usual generally or reasonable, but may be the direct contrary. The generality of the word a, (relied on in support of the lease) must certainly exclude a reference to any particular class of clauses of re-entry, such as those on this estate, as nothing can be more opposite to a general word than a word of reference. If this leasing power be construed to require the power of re-entry usual in cases of the lands comprehended in the settlement, although in this particular case this construction will operate to the advantage of the lessee, yet [319] it may in other cases be productive of the greatest inconvenience to him. Suppose a lease under a power, in the terms of this leasing power, to be on the face of it conformable to the power, yet if this construction prevail, the reversioner will have a right to avoid the lease, if he can show that the clause of re-entry is different from that which is usual on the estate comprehended in the leasing power. The inconvenience to both parties will be extreme, if a lessee cannot be sure that he has a valid lease, by comparing his lease with the power, without inspecting all the leases formerly granted of lands within the same estate. It is submitted, that what the creator of a power has required, must be done for this one reason, of itself sufficient, that it is required, and that it is a much safer rule to adhere to that condition which is expressly annexed to the execution of a power by one who has all the circumstances of the property before him, and who has the right to enlarge or narrow the power to any degree, than to substitute for what he has exacted something which it may be conjectured he ought to have exacted, but has not.

4th. The power of re-entry in the lease is not only different from that required by the leasing power, but much less beneficial to the reversioner. Under an absolute power of re-entry, the reversioner would be entitled to succeed in an ejectment, on proving the rent in arrear, a demand made, and the execution of the counterpart of the lease by the Defendant. Under a power to re-enter on failure of distress, it would be necessary for him to prove that he had searched every part of the premises demised, [320] and that no distress was to be found (Rees v. King, Forrester Exch. 19), a matter of extreme difficulty where the rent is small and the premises extensive. A conditional clause of re-entry, which may be an adequate remedy in the case of high rents and lands of small extent, becomes quite insufficient when the rent is small, as is usually the case with ancient rents, and the lands demised of considerable extent. And as the absolute power of re-entry becomes the more necessary for the lord, in case of small rents for large property, so it becomes the less inconvenient for the tenant, who might have some difficulty, and expect some indulgence to raise a large sum, but can have none in being ready with a small one. It is indeed universally true, that in order to secure a small demand, the remedy should be more summary and less expensive than is requisite to enforce a large one.

5th. The finding of the Jury, that the usual and accustomed form of leases of the estate contained in the marriage settlement was with a conditional proviso of re-entry, ought not to be taken into consideration in deciding this case. The words of the leasing power are "a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved;" they contain no reference to the former practice of leasing the estate, nor is there any fact stated on the special verdict which raises any ambiguity in them; and a provision contained in a written instrument may not be explained or construed by any extrinsic matter, except in two cases; first, when the provision refers to extrinsic matter; secondly, when its terms contain a latent ambiguity, that is, [321] when, in consequence of some matter of fact shown by evidence, it appears that the language of the instrument has more meanings than one, neither of which is the case with the clause in question.

6th. Even supposing the former practice on the estate might legally be taken into consideration, it is far from affording any inference favourable to the lease in question. It is not found that the former leases were granted under similar powers. There is nothing to show that the creator of the power was not dissatisfied with the former clauses of re-entry, and did not insert the provision in question for the very purpose of introducing a new one, which might well be, for the reasons stated above. And this is the more probable, because the leasing power, in several instances, expressly refers to the former practice on the estate, where it was intended that the tenant for life should be guided by it; there is no such reference in the clause relating to powers of re-entry; the inference is, that the practice was not intended to prevail with respect to powers of re-entry.

For the Plaintiffs in Error, the Attorney General and Mr. Puller.

For the Defendants in Error, Mr. Jervis and Mr. Maule*.

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor observed, that if the settlement had said there should be "a reasonable power of re-entry," some [322] body must have judged, in the first instance, what was reasonable in that respect; and he added, that in his experience he had never seen a settlement which directed any thing as to the number of days allowed for rent to be left in arrear; and that as to leases granted under powers in such settlements he had never seen any which did not contain some allowance of days.

After the argument, the Lord Chancellor proposed the following question for the opinion of the Judges:

Whether, having due regard to the true intent and meaning of the indenture of the 2d July 1757, according to the legal construction of the several parts of that indenture as stated in the special verdict, and having also due regard to the legal effect of all the facts and circumstances found by the special verdict, the demise of the 5th September 1803, as the same is stated in the special verdict, is for any and what reasons invalid?

There being a difference of opinion, the twelve Judges, in answering this question, delivered their opinions seriatim.

Richardson, J. After having shortly stated the case, the proceedings, and the question put to the Judges, proceeded thus:

I am of opinion that the lease of 1803 is invalid, because I think it is not made in conformity with the leasing power contained in the indenture of 1757.

The leasing power for that class of leases, of which the lease in question is one, requires that "there be contained in every such lease a power of [323] re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved;" and the question resolves itself into this,—what is the true construction of these words?

In order to decide this, I must first consider, whether the words themselves import and convey any distinct meaning: and I think they do; I think they mean, that the lessor should have power to re-enter if the rent reserved should not be paid according to the reservation.

One test, and, I think, a fair one, whether such meaning is conveyed by the words of this power, would be to insert in a lease a proviso for re-entry, expressed as nearly as possible in the very words of the power itself, and then to consider what construction a proviso so expressed would require, and whether the meaning would be sufficiently distinct to be capable of being enforced by a court of justice.

Suppose, then, in the lease of 1803, it had been provided, that it should be lawful for the lessor or person entitled to the rent, "to re-enter for non-payment of the rent hereby reserved." In that case would the person entitled to the rent have been empowered to re-enter if the rent had not been paid on the days of reservation? It seems to me, that he would have been so empowered; and that without any delay or condition other than the previous demand required by the common law: for all that he would be bound to prove, in order to justify and enforce his re-entry, would be, that there was a non-payment on demand of the rent reserved by the lease.

If this be so, it seems to me to prove that the necessity of waiting fifteen days, and the necessity [324] of proving a deficiency of distress on the premises imposed by the proviso actually contained in the lease of 1803, are conditions not warranted by the leasing power.

It has been said, that the leasing power requires only "a power of re-entry much stress having been laid on the indefinite effect of the article "a;" and it has been further said, that, though such power of re-entry is to be "for non-payment of the rent," yet, that the words "for non-payment" are not equivalent to "on non-payment," but only point at the purpose or object of the power of re-entry, namely, that of securing the payment of the rent.

It appears to my mind, however, that, although the article "a" be indefinite, yet it cannot, in just construction, extend an indefinite meaning to the subsequent words, if they sufficiently import (as I think I have shown they do) a distinct and definite meaning. In this sentence, the word "a" seems to me neither to add to nor to qualify the meaning: but, that the meaning would have been the same, if that word had been wholly omitted, and the sentence had stood thus, "so as there be contained in every such lease power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved." And, as to the observations made on the meaning of the words "for non-payment of the rent;" although it is true, that the word "for" does often import the purpose or object, (and so it might here, if the words had been "a power of re-entry for payment of the rent:") yet the same word "for," as often imports the cause or occasion of that which is predicated; [325] and such I think is its import here, where the words are "a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent," meaning on occasion of the non-payment.

If the words of this leasing power import, as I conceive they do, by themselves, a distinct and definite meaning, I think it follows, that the fact stated in the special verdict respecting the usual and accustomed form of leases of the estate mentioned in the marriage settlement can have no legal effect on the construction to be put on these words. Such evidence, I conceive, is never admissible in the construction of a written instrument, unless the words of the instrument itself import a reference to something extrinsic, or unless the words involve some latent ambiguity, that is, an ambiguity not appearing on perusal of the instrument itself, but which becomes apparent on applying its provisions to the subject matter. The words of this leasing power, in that part which respects the clause of re-entry, seem to me to involve no latent ambiguity, nor to import any reference to any thing extrinsic: although some former parts of the same leasing power do import such reference, namely when it is required, that the lands to be leased for lives should be such lands as were in lease for lives at the time of making the settlement, and that the rents to be reserved should be the ancient rents, or rents as great and beneficial.

I admit that a court is bound to look at every part of a written instrument, in order to ascertain the meaning of the parties in a particular part. But I think it by no means follows, because this settle-[326]-ment, in respect of the rack-rent leases, expresses that the tenant is to be allowed twenty-eight days for payment, that therefore it was intended, in respect of the leases for lives, to give a similar or any allowance of time, which is not only not expressed, but which appears to me to be at variance with what is expressed.

Supposing, however, it were possible on this ground to get rid of the objection made against the lease of 1803, in respect of the allowance of fifteen days; another and still more decisive objection remains, namely, that this lease fetters and confines the power of re-entry to such cases only where there is a want of sufficient distress: a condition which appears to me, to be equally inconsistent with the power applicable to leases for rack-rent, and to that which is applicable to leases for lives.

The case of Core v. Day (13 East, 118), which I think was rightly decided, appears to me to be in point, and I cannot draw any distinction which is satisfactory to my own mind from the circumstance that the leasing power there allowed a period of twenty-one days for payment: whereas the leasing power now under consideration as to the leases for lives, expresses no such allowance. It is true, that in Core v. Day, the case of Holley v. Scot (Lofft, 316, S.C. Mr. Butler's MS., see note (a), p. 331), does not appear to have been cited: and it seems that in the last-mentioned case a similar objection taken to a lease granted under a power was over-ruled by the Court [327] of King's Bench: on what ground (see the arguments and judgment, post, p. 332, et seq.) the Court proceeded we are not apprized, and being obliged now to make an election between the two authorities I must express my concurrence with that of Core v. Day.

It has been suggested, that the statute of 4 G. 2. c. 28, though professedly made for the benefit of landlords, does in effect take away their right of re-entry at common law, and confine them in all cases to the statutable remedy thereby given, which remedy can never be exercised without proof that no sufficient distress was to be found on the demised premises countervailing the arrears then due. And I think it must be admitted, that such a construction of the statute, if it be the true construction, furnishes a sufficient answer to the second objection made to the lease of 1803; for in that case the lease has only expressed that which, whether expressed in the lease or not, the statute law has provided.

But I cannot think that this is the true construction of the statute. The object of the statute, as appears to me, both from the recital and the enactments, was to relieve landlords from certain inconveniences to which they were subject by the law as it then stood, and to give them certain remedies to which they were not before entitled; but not to deprive them of any remedies or rights to which they were already entitled by law. It contains no negative or prohibitory words, which I think would obviously have been inserted if the intention had been to deny to the landlord the future exercise of any ancient right; and it would, as it strikes me, be [328] a strange construction to hold, that the words apparently intended for the landlord's benefit do, from their generality, operate to extinguish any of his ancient rights; when if such had been the intention it would have been so easy and so obvious to express it. That such however was not the intention I think manifestly appears from this, that whenever the new mode of proceeding in ejectment given by the statute is pursued, the statute declares that "then and in every such case the lessor in ejectment shall recover judgment and execution in the same manner as if the rent in arrear had been legally demanded and a re-entry made." It refers to the legal demand and re-entry as a still subsisting mode of proceeding, not repealed or affected by the statute; and thereby shows that the old mode of proceeding was intended to be left as it was, although the new one, if adopted, is declared to be equivalent for the purpose of obtaining a valid judgment and execution. This, I believe, has always been considered as the intent and effect of the statute; and although I am not able to point out any case where it has been expressly decided that the statute does not take away the landlord's remedy at common law, several cases have occurred where landlords have so proceeded without objection on that ground, and it has been taken for granted that they were well entitled to do so. Doc dem. Forster v. Wandlass (7 T.R. 117) and Doc dem. West v. Davis (7 East, 363), are cases to this effect, and so is 1 Wm. Saund, 2:6, No. 16.

[329] It has been said, that if the lease of 1803 be invalidated the decision will shake many titles. I have no means of knowing whether this observation is well founded, or to what extent. If such should be the consequence I shall regret it; but I cannot feel that such an apprehension can afford a legitimate ground for deciding the present case, otherwise than as the words and legal effect of the instruments now under consideration seem to me to require. Upon the whole, therefore, I am bound, for the reasons before given, to answer the question in the affirmative.

Best, J. The words of the power are, "and so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved." The terms in which it is expressed are general and indefinite. Instruments in such terms are not to be abstractedly and absolutely considered, but with reference to the nature of the subject to which they relate. They are in law taken to contain such qualifications as are manifestly just and reasonable, and such as according to practice, have before been introduced in similar cases, and which, not being expressly excluded, must be understood to be within the intent of the parties. This rule of construction is universal; it cannot be departed from without destroying the excellence of the law, which consists in its bearing a just relation to the state of things on which it is to operate. Thus, under contracts to sell goods, in which nothing is said as to the time of delivery, the vendor is not bound to deliver them the instant that the contract is made. Under a contract to perform [330] a particular service the contractor is not bound to begin his work immediately. In both these cases the law allows a reasonable time for the performance of the contract. Under a contract for service for a year the law will not compel the servant to serve every hour of the year; but excepts such a portion of time as is necessary for refreshment and relaxation. So, if there be an established usage, regulating the manner in which a thing contracted to be done, is to be done, as the time and circumstances of delivering articles sold, or the payment of the price, or the time for paying a bill of exchange. Such usage is by law incorporated into the contract without any words of reference to it.

Our books do not furnish many cases on this subject. There are enough, however, to satisfy us that according to the practice that has long prevailed among conveyancers, the proviso for re-entry in this lease is a sufficient execution of the power. The existence of this practice, and its being considered reasonable, account for there being no more decisions of courts on the subject. From the few cases that are to be found, the balance of authority seems to me to incline much in favour of the validity of this lease. But the authority of the cases in favour of the lease is much strengthened by the practice of that branch of the Profession of the law who have been accustomed to prepare powers, and leases under powers.

The first case is that of Jones dem. Bromfield v. Verney (Willes, 169). Sir John Cowper had been enabled [331] by act of parliament to grant building leases for any term not exceeding sixty-one years, "so as in every such lease there be contained a condition of re-entry for non-payment of rent." The clauses of re-entry in the leases granted by Sir John were for non-payment of the rent in forty-two days after the days of payment. An ejectment was brought in the Common Pleas to turn a tenant out of possession who held under one of these leases; but no objection was made (although it was stated in the judgment that the case was fully argued) on the ground of the qualification introduced into the lease, by the words "forty-two days after the day of payment." This is but negative authority; but considering the great learning and industry employed in the discussion of this case, an objection must have been raised if the law had not been considered to be settled; and if it had not been thought that the lease was sanctioned by a practice which no argument could overturn.

The next case is Hotley v. Scot.* The words [332] of the power were, that if the

* Michaelmas Term, 14th George III. B. R. This case is reported in Lofft 316, under the name of Hotley v. Scott.

In a manuscript note taken by Mr. Butler (of which a copy is subjoined) it is given under the name of Lord Tankerville v. Wingfield and Pritchard. Upon ejectment; the case was as follows. Upon the marriage of Sir John Astley, his lady's estate was settled upon Sir John for life, with several remainders over, which never took effect; remainder to the lady's right heirs. A power of leasing was given to Sir John, such leases to be made for any number of years, at the accustomed rent, to take effect immediately in possession, and not by way of future or reversionary interest; and on every such lease there was to be inserted a clause of re-entry if the rent should be behind for twenty-one days; the rent to be made payable, and the re-entry to be incident to and go along with the reversion or remainder. In the same settlement there was also a power of revoking all the uses thereby declared, and appointing new.

Some time after the marriage, Sir John Astley and his lady revoked all the uses of the settlement that were subsequent to Sir John's life-estate, and the powers incident thereto, and declared new uses. There was also a fine levied to the same effect.

September 21, 1766, Sir John made two several leases of this date to the two defendants, Wingfield and Pritchard, for twenty-one years, conformable to the power he had by the said settlement, and the other deeds and the fine, except that previous to the entry distress was to be made, and it was nearly in the following words: "That if the rent should be behind or unpaid by the space of twenty-one days, and no sufficient distress or distresses could be had, or if the lessee should assign over the leased premises, (except as therein is excepted) then it should be lawful to Sir John Astley, his heirs and assigns, to enter."

Sir John Astley and his lady being both deceased, the estates are descended upon Lord Tankerville, the Plaintiff, etc.

Dunning, for the Plaintiff: The Court always takes a difference between powers when exercised by a man upon his own estate, and the exercise of powers by a man upon another's estate, or which he holds in another's right. The first are always con-rent should be behind or unpaid for twenty-one days the lessor should have [333] power to re-enter. The condition in the lease was, if the rent should be behind and unpaid for twenty-[334]one days, and no sufficient distress could be had, then it should be lawful for the lessor to re-enter. [335] Lord Mansfield in giving judgment, said, "The clause of re-entry is short with words of course, and does not preclude the operation of law—a re-entry is to enforce the payment of rent—by statute it cannot be without distress." The report of this decision is very short. It is probable that it does not give us the very words of Lord Mansfield, but we learn with certainty from it that the Court decided the very point now before your Lordships in favour of the lease: for the power does not contain a syllable about a sufficient distress: this qualification is introduced into the proviso for re-entry, and yet the Court upheld the lease. It is clear, also, that Lord Mansfield must have referred to some form of drawing up these powers and clauses of re-entry which were then in use, and have expressed himself, that the power and clause in that case were agreeable to usual form. He is made to say, "The clause of re-entry is short with words of course." It is most probable that he said the power was short with words of course: the obvious meaning of which is, that the power was expressed in the terms commonly used in such cases, and imported that sort of clause of re-entry which it was then the practice to introduce into leases made under strued favourably to the persons making use of this power: the second are taken in a strict light: here it was certainly the second. It was a power to be exercised on the wife's estates, and, in some respect, in prejudice of his wife; and therefore to be taken strictly.

1st objection, that the settlement declares that the power of re-entry should be reserved and made incident to the inheritance of the estate: and by the lease it is reserved to Sir John Astley, his heirs and assigns. 2d objection, the settlement directs the re-entry so to be reserved as above, to be made immediately, if the rent should be behind by twenty-one days. By the lease it is to be preceded by demand and distress.

These are strong, plain, and conclusive objections.

Beaumont, for the defendants: The remainder-man, Lord Tankerville, has, substantially, all the powers he ought to have, or can have. As to the first objection, the rent cannot be made payable but to those in remainder or reversion, to which it is inseparably incident. The heirs and assigns of Sir John Astley mean those who are heirs and assigns to the estate under the settlement by which Sir John claims the estate. See Cotter v. Merrick (Hard. 89). Tenant in tail died seised, his son entered, and made a lease for twenty-one years, rendering rent during the term to the lessor, his heirs and assigns, and died.

It was unanimously adjudged to be a good lease, and within the 32 H. 8.; the opinion of the Court being, that the word heirs being a comprehensive word, it ought to be construed secundum subjectam materiam, and to have that construction which the nature of the deed requires. This is much the stronger in the present case, as Sir John Astley having joined with his wife in the deeds which raised the limitations, those who take by virtue of those limitations may, in some respect, be said to be the heirs and assigns of Sir John Astley. As to the second objection, that the re-entry, which is directed by the power in the settlement to be reserved immediately on the rent being behind twenty-one days after it is due, is by the lease to be preceded by distress and by demand. The words in the settlement are short and loose, and seem to be no more than a general direction that in every lease to be made under this power there should be a clause of re-entry. It is not a formal description what kind of re-entry should be reserved, or of any particular clause of re-entry; it is a direction that the power of re-entry, usually inserted in leases, should be inserted in the leases to be made under this power in the usual manner. This, I apprehend, is a sufficient answer to the objections raised against these leases: each is a verbal objection, and I have given each a verbal answer.

Mr. Dunning, in reply: The distinction I set out with, and the consequence of that distinction, that these leases are to be considered in a strict light, is not denied. And besides this claim to the favour of the Court, Lord Tankerville has that of being the heir at law of the owner of the estate on which this power has been exercised powers: that the only object of the power being to secure the payment [336] of the rent reserved, such qualifications as the law considered reasonable and consistent with this object were not excluded:—as the Legislature had thought the landlord ought not to have any greater facility for recovering possession of the estate than he had at the common law, when there was a sufficient distress on the demised premises, the introduction of such a condition into the clause of re-entry was but a reasonable qualification. This decision is an authority to show that reasonable qualifications may be introduced into clauses of re-entry when the terms of the power are general; and also, that the qualification most objected to in this lease is reasonable.

That a power expressed in general terms is well executed by a lease containing a proviso with legal qualifications, is further proved by Dormer's case (5 Co. 40. b.). "By special consent of the parties a re-entry may be for default of payment of rent without demand of it. And divers other cases were put where the consent of the Lord Tankerville is neither the heir nor the assignee of Sir John Astley: he claims by a title paramount to Sir John's. The rent is directed by the settlement to be incident to the inheritance, that is to say, to be to the several limitées of the settlement when respectively in possession. The reservation is to the heirs and assigns of Sir John Astley. They are not limitées. This is therefore not a proper execution of the power. The case quoted, and the act of parliament (32 Hen. 8) only show that if a tenant in tail make a lease according to the statute, and reserves rent to himself and his heirs, the words "heirs and assigns" may be construed to be such heirs as may succeed by force of the entail. This construction can never in the present case take in Lord Tankerville, who cannot, in any sense or meaning whatever, be deemed the heir of Sir John Astley or his assign. It is sufficient to say, that in pleading he could never be described as such. As to the words being loose, and directing what should be done, and not describing how it is to be done, this seems a frivolous distinction. The settlement directs a clause of re-entry to be inserted in the lease: the lease says it shall not be lawful for Sir John Astley to enter as long as there is a sufficient distress or distresses to be taken. Till then it is postponed. This is contrary to the words of the settlement, and is not, certainly, a proper execution of the power.

Lord Mansfield: The two objections to these leases are, 1st. That by the settlement the re-entry is to be made incident to the rent; but by the lease it is reserved to Sir John Astley, his heirs and assigns. And in the event it has not followed the rent, but gone to the heirs of the lessor, Sir John Astley, while Lord Tankerville is in the lawful possession and receipt of the rents. The second objection is that the clause of re-entry, which by the settlement ought to be immediate, is by the lease fettered, being on a previous demand * and previous distress. As to the first, by the nature of the power it must go with the reversion and inheritance. The person who is in the reversion and inheritance is he that is to enter on the forfeiture of the lease, and no one can enter but he to whom the rent is payable: for as Littleton says, no stranger can enter for forfeiture, for a stranger cannot be in by his former estate. If the rent had been reserved for the term, as in the case cited from Hardres, still it goes with the inheritance. Heirs and assigns can only mean those who have the reversion and inheritance; otherwise, as is said, 2 Saund. (370), they would be words of surplusage. The clause of re-entry must go with the inheritance the same as the rent, for it cannot be reserved to any body but to him who is seised of the inheritance. It was said, that it ought to have been worded, to the person next in the reversion or remainder. The words heirs and assigns are general words, and are as good as and quite tantamount to particular words. As to the second, the clause of re-entry is short with words of course, and does not preclude the operation of law. A re-entry is to enforce the payment of rent; it is an immediate forfeiture of the estate by common law. By statute it cannot be without a want of distress. Therefore in both points we agree to support the leases. So the verdict must be entered for the Defendants.

* This does not appear by the clause as set forth, ante p. 332.

parties shall alter the form and course of the law." Although a clause of re-entry was absolute for nonpayment of rent, yet the common law superadded the qualification to that clause, that the rent be demanded on the estate demised on the last hour of the day when it was payable; and according to Dormer's case, the demand of the rent can only be dispensed with by special consent, or, (as it is expressed in Newdigate's case (Dyer, 68), "that it shall be lawful without further demand to re-enter."

If at common law a landlord could not recover possession against a tenant holding under a lease, [337] containing a general clause of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent without a demand of the rent, surely, when the Legislature has relieved the landlord from making a demand of the rent, and substituted in the place of that demand the condition, that there be not a sufficient distress on the premises, the law will not allow the tenant to lose his estate if there be a sufficient distress on it to satisfy the rent due. It will require the same express consent to exclude the condition of there being no sufficient distress since the statute of George the 2d., as was required to exclude the necessity of a demand of the rent at common law.

I do not mean to say that since the statute of George the 2d. a man may not proceed at common law. My argument is, that the law annexed the condition of demand of rent before the statute, and as the statute has now dispensed with a demand of the rent when there is not a sufficient distress, the law will annex the condition of there not being a sufficient distress to a power expressed in general terms: and therefore a clause of re-entry containing this condition is not inconsistent with such a power: otherwise the tenant would not have the protection which according to the spirit of the law he ought to have; for by an omission to pay the nominal rent on the day it became due, he might, without notice, and with abundance of property on the land to satisfy the rent, be dispossessed of an estate for which he had paid a large rent in advance under the name of a fine. This would be making that remedy which was intended only as a security for the rent a forfeit-trap.

[338] The decision in the court of King's Bench in Care v. Day is supposed to establish a contrary doctrine. Lord Ellenborough, during the argument of that case, seems to have intimated an opinion inconsistent with that which I have offered to your Lordships. But it is not dealing fairly with that great Judge to hold him to what he threw out whilst he was forming his opinion, particularly when it is contrary to what he afterwards decided, when the case now before your Lordships was in the King's Bench. The wisest of men could not escape the charge of inconsistency, if expressions, which are dropped while the mind is struggling with the different considerations presented by conflicting arguments, are to be recorded. I know not on what ground the Court agreed to the certificate which was sent to the Court of Chancery: but I cannot admit that this certificate is an express authority on the point now under consideration, when the case presents a ground, on which, with the opinion that I entertain on this case, I should have signed that certificate. The power in Care v. Day was in these words, "so as in every such lease there be contained a condition of re-entry for the nonpayment of the rent reserved by the space of twenty-one days." The words of the proviso were, "if the rent should be in arrear for twenty days—being lawfully demanded." The words "being lawfully demanded" weakened the landlord's security for his rent by imposing on him the necessity of demanding it on the last hour of the day on which it became due, a thing always found to be attended with difficulty, and often impracticable, and from [339] which landlords are relieved by the statute of George the Second. Such a proviso could not be sufficient under such a power.

If authority be doubtful we must recur to principle. When property in lands is divided into estates for life and estates in remainder, it becomes our object to secure to the possessor all the advantages which belong to his estate. The mode of doing this is by giving to the tenant for life a power to grant leases for certain terms not determinable with his life. Unless he has this power the estate will not be cultivated as it ought to be; much less will it be improved: and not only tenants for life but the public would suffer from the want of such powers. In the granting these powers care must be taken that in granting their leases tenants for life do not prejudice the estate of the remainder man: possession of the lands must be secured to the tenant, and the rent to the landlord. Considering this as being the object of these powers, Judges in the construction of them will only have to consider—What did the maker of the power consider sufficient to attain this object? Can any one doubt that the maker of this power would have considered the clause of re-entry in this lease abundantly sufficient to secure the rent? But for the respect which I feel for those learned Judges from whom I differ on this subject, I should have said, without doubt or hesitation, “a clause of re-entry” means in law what these words would in common conversation, viz. such a clause of re-entry as is generally inserted in leases. That this clause answers that description will not, I think, be disputed.

[340] That the principle on which I found my opinion is a sound legal principle is evident from the following cases: In Holtley v. Scot, Lord Mansfield says, “a re-entry is to enforce the payment of rent.” In Wadman v. Calcraft (10. Ves. jun. 69), Sir William Grant says, “there is no doubt equity will relieve against the forfeiture; considering the purpose of the clause of re-entry to be only to secure the payment of rent; and that when the rent is paid the end is obtained.” In Opey v. Thomasius and others (Sir T. Raym. 134), Twissden, J. says, “powers are to be expressed according to the intent of the parties.” In Gouldtiff v. Funnican (Doug. 573), Lord Mansfield says, “powers are now a common modification of property in land, and as such are to be carried into effect according to the intention of those who create them.”

I shall not advert to some facts which are found by this special verdict, and on which arguments might be offered in favour of this particular case. My opinion is formed on these general grounds: Where the power is expressed in general terms, as it is in this case, reasonable qualifications are not excluded, but may be introduced into the clause of re-entry; and the qualifications introduced into this clause have been acknowledged by the Legislature and the course of law to be reasonable. “A clause of re-entry” means the usual clause of re-entry, and the clause of re-entry in this lease is such as is usually inserted in such leases. [341] I believe that it has been so much the general practice of conveyancers to insert such clauses, that if your Lordships were to declare this lease invalid you would destroy the titles of a very large proportion of the landholders in the kingdom. Much of the property in the West is held by leases granted by tenants for life: I know that in other parts of England actions are already brought to turn tenants out of possession of those estates on the same objections as are made to this lease. Some of these actions have been brought to trial before me, and now await the judgment in this case.

I have heard the learned Judges say that they would never allow a practice to be set aside on which the titles to many estates depended, however much they might disapprove of such a practice. If you set aside this lease you will turn a large proportion of the tenantry of England out of estates for which they or their ancestors have paid large sums of money, and which have been continued in their families by a successive renewal of leases for as great a length of time as any of your Lordships families have held their estates. The personal property of tenants for life, the fund out of which provision is to be made for the younger branches of families, will be drained to make compensation to the leaseholder for the loss that he has sustained by being deprived of his lease: and where these funds fail the families of the leaseholders will be ruined.

I have only further to say, that I see no reason to hold the lease stated in the special verdict invalid.

Garrow, B.:—The settlement made upon the marriage of Lord Vernon with Lady Louisa Barbara [342] his wife, of the 2d July 1757, on which this question arises, gives a power of leasing, requiring, with respect to property of the nature in question, that there shall be contained in the lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent. In this leasing power no time is specified, by way of indulgence to the tenant, as to the payment after the day on which it shall fall due, nor are any other terms required than that the person who from time to time shall be in possession of the estate shall insert in the lease a power to resume the possession for nonpayment of the rent.

The lease granted by Lord Vernon to the defendant and another, contains a clause for re-entry if the rent shall be in arrear for the term of fifteen days, and if there shall be no sufficient distress upon the premises to satisfy the rent; and the question is, whether this is a good execution of the power, or in other words, whether this is such a power of re-entry as was required by the creator of the settlement!

It is observable, that the creator of the power, or those who advised her, knew how to make distinctions as to powers of re-entry applicable to different estates: and in the case where the rent reserved is of the most valuable description, there the creator of the power only requires of those who shall come in succession into the possession of the estate, as tenants for life, that they shall, for the preservation of the estate, in the most beneficial form and extent, for those who shall be from time to time interested as reversioners, insert a provision, that if the valuable rent reserved on leases for years absolute shall not be paid for twenty-eight days, then there shall [343] be a right to enter at the expiration of these twenty-eight days.

In the case of the render of £2 a year, and a couple of fat capons, or 18d. at the option of the lessor, it is insisted that the power of re-entry should be altogether absolute and unconditional; and that at the first moment when the day has expired on which the money is demandable, the power of re-entry is to attach, and enable the reversioner at that moment to turn the person out, who upon a valuable lease for years determinable upon lives should have permitted the day to expire before he had paid his sum of £2. I admit that if the maker of the settlement had in express terms said, "the power shall be to re-enter the moment at which the rent is due, and not paid or tendered," a court of law could not alter, but must execute such power so expressed. We must see whether the power has been complied with or not.

Now the terms of the condition in the settlement are, that there shall be contained in the leases a power of re-entry on non-payment of the rent. Is there not in the lease granted to the defendant a power of re-entry on non-payment of the rent? There is; but it has been urged with great force that it is not such a compliance with the power as the reversioner had a right to expect the lessor should have made; for he has clogged the clause of re-entry with a delay of fifteen days, and with the necessity of seeing that there is no sufficient distress upon the premises. The answer to this appears to me to be, that according to our experience such an event is so improbable, that it probably did not occur to [344] the maker of the power to guard against it; and not having in express terms required any particular form or terms of the clause for re-entry, I think the power is satisfied by that which has been inserted in the lease in question, and consequently that the lease is not invalid.

Burrough, J.: After the fullest deliberation, I am of opinion that the demise of the 5th September 1803, is invalid; that it was valid only during the life of the lessor, and that his death determined the estate of the lessee.

The statute of the 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, was relied on in the Exchequer Chamber, and in the argument here, as bearing on the subject. In my view of this case it has no application to the subject before the House. That statute, as I conceive, applies only to leases which before the statute might and must have been avoided by entry; to cases where the cause of avoidance might have been waived. Such leases were valid till a strict legal entry was made, and before such entry they were capable of confirmation by suitable acts done by him in whom the right of re-entry was. But a lease by a tenant for life having a special power to demise, if not made conformable to the power, is the lease of a mere tenant for life, and has validity only during his life, and not a moment longer.

I cannot see that any well-grounded argument from a provision made by an act of parliament, in the case of demises of a description wholly different from the demise in question, can be urged in support of that demise. In forming our judgments on the [345] questions submitted to us we must consider that we are required to give our opinion on the construction of a deed. There are certain rules of the common law which must govern us on such an occasion. One rule is, that the construction must be made on the whole deed. The principle of the common law is, that Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus est optima interpretatio (Shep. Touch, c. 5, rule 1, fo. 87). There is another rule which also strongly applies to the case in question, and that is, Quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est. Acting on these rules, I contend that there is no ambiguity in the words of the power, and that it is manifest, from the various parts of the deed of the 2d July 1757, that it was the intention of the parties to have these words understood as they are written, and without addition.

The clause of re-entry in the demise ought, I contend, to have corresponded with the reddendum, which is to this effect, "yielding and paying the yearly rent of £2 at Michaelmas and Lady-day, by equal portions :” and not so corresponding I am of opinion the lease is invalid. First, because there can be no re-entry unless the rent is behind and unpaid for fifteen days from Michaelmas and Lady-day, which is an extension of the time beyond that in the reddendum. Secondly, because the re-entry for the non-payment of the rent cannot, by the express terms of the demise, be made if there is sufficient distress to be had on the premises. The general scope of the deed is too well known to require repetition. It has heretofore been considered [346] that there are three distinct powers in this deed. I conceive that, correctly speaking, there is only one power, consisting of three distinct parts. I say this, because the enabling words “that it shall and may be lawful, etc.” are placed at the head of the whole, and are not afterwards repeated; and the other parts are introduced by the words “and also.” It appears to me, from this mode of looking at the deed, that it may be fairly collected that the framers of it must have had their minds directed to the different parts of the power: and must have designedly and deliberately introduced an additional restriction on that part of the power which relates to leases for years, and references in other parts to extrinsic matters, and designedly and deliberately omitted any such additional restriction in the part of the power in question, and also all words of reference to extrinsic matter or former leases.

The first part of the power is that which relates immediately to the demise in question: by this Mr. Vernon and his wife (who by the deed took successive estates for life) are enabled to grant leases for life, or years determinable on the death of a life or lives, of such lands as at the time of the deed were leased for life, or years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives: so as the ancient and accustomed yearly rents, dues, and services, or more or as great and beneficial rents, etc. be reserved or made payable, and so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved. Now, what is the rent thereby to be reserved but the reddendum?—the power of re-entry is to be for the non-payment of [347] that rent. If that rent was not paid at Michaelmas-day or Lady-day, I contend that it is plain by the very terms of the deed that the right of re-entry ought to be complete.

It is not to be doubted that former leases were admissible in evidence for two purposes: first, to show what lands were, at the time of the demise, leased for life or years, as described in the deed: secondly, to show what the ancient and accustomed rents were: for former leases are for these purposes necessarily referred to. But, it appears to me to be free from doubt that, as to the power of re-entry prescribed by the deed, there is no reference to former leases or to prior circumstances, but to the reddendum only, ascertaining not only the rent itself, but also the mode and time of payment. This power of re-entry prescribed by the deed is framed in plain terms: it contains a clear proposition in itself, and therefore I contend, that the maxim that quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est, is precisely applicable to the point. Thus to decide is to avoid the vicious mode of interpretation which is reproached by a maxim to be found in Lord Bacon’s Tracts (67). Divinatio, non interpretatio est quae omnino recedit a litera. If you stir beyond what the deed expressly prescribes then commences the divinatio, and the interpretatio is at an end.

Next follows in the deed what, I say, is more properly a second part of the same power than a distinct and separate power. The general enabling words being at the beginning of the whole: this part [348] is connected with the former part by the words “and also.” “And also, by indenture, to demise any of the lands in the settlement for any term not exceeding twenty-one years in possession, so as there be reserved as much or as great and beneficial yearly and other rents as were then yielded, or the best and most improved yearly rent or rents as can be reasonably had or obtained, and so as in every such lease for an absolute term of years.—(thus distinguishing them from the former leases.)—there be contained a clause of re-entry in case the rent or rents thereupon to be reserved be behind or unpaid for the space of twenty-eight days after the time thereby respectively appointed for payment thereof.” This part of the power, which is, as it were, uttered in the same breath with the former part, under the same enabling words, and united to them by the words “and also,” affords very important observations. First, the rents to be reserved in these leases are to be as much or as great and beneficial as were then yielded: here, then, is a plain reference to the then existing state of rents. To prove this the former leases were good evidence. Or, secondly, the rents are to be the best and most improved that can be reasonably gotten: this admits, too, of reference to extrinsic matters. The third observation is as to the clause of re-entry prescribed by this part of the power, in case the rent be behind or unpaid for twenty-eight days. With great deference to the judgment of those who entertain a different opinion, I cannot refrain from expressing my strong opinion on this part of the deed. In my mind, it affords an argument of irresistible weight, that the parties [349] to this deed intentionally omitted an extension of the time of payment in the first part of the power under which the demise in question is contended to be valid: and that they intentionally inserted the extension of twenty-eight days in the second part: and I confess I feel myself alarmed at the fate of men's deeds, if it shall be holden that the demise in question is valid which contains an extension of the time of payment to fifteen additional days, not hinted at in the power itself, and inconsistent with the reddendum: and which also contains a provision which deprives the reversioner of his re-entry if on any part of the premises there may chance to be sufficient distress. That the clause of distress imposes a difficulty on the reversioner is proved by the case of Rees on dem. Powell v. King and Morris, tried before Mr. Justice Heath in the summer of 1800, at Hereford, whose opinion was ratified by the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer in the following term. It was there held, that a clause of forfeiture in a lease, in case no sufficient distress was to be found on the premises, must be pursued strictly, and every part of the premises must be searched.

The third part of the power is introduced in the same manner as the second part: this is the part which empowers the leasing mines then open, or lands wherein persons may be willing to open mines. Annexed to this there are several restrictions running in this language: "So as in every such lease there be reserved or made payable such parts of the lead, copper ore, coal, and other produce to be gotten from the said mines, or such other yearly rent or [350] income in respect thereof, as can be reasonably had or gotten for the same, without taking any fine, etc., and so as the lessees execute counter-parts: and so as there be inserted such proper and usual covenants for the effectually working the mines, etc., and doing all proper and necessary acts as are usually inserted in leases of the like nature. It is to be observed, that with respect to these leases there are special restrictions peculiarly applicable to them. The parties to the deed had all the parts of this power before them, and have cautiously introduced restrictions applicable to each part: and can a court of law add to these restrictions? The rents of the mines, or the parts of the produce to be reserved, are to be such as can be reasonably gotten: the covenants are to be the usual covenants for effectually working them and doing all necessary acts.

In the second and third parts the word "reasonably" is introduced: but it is wholly omitted in the first part. Is a court of law authorised to transplant the word "reasonable" to the first part, when the parties have introduced it in the second and third parts, and omitted it in the first part? This cannot be done if it varies the construction of the words as the parties have penned them. We are required to state our respective opinions, whether, having regard to the due intent and meaning of the indenture of July 1757, according to the legal construction of the several parts of it, and having due regard to the legal effect of the facts and circumstances found by the verdict, the demise is for any and what reasons invalid? I feel that if I depart from the plain meaning of plain words, made (if it were possible) more [351] plain by the context, that I shall be at sea without a compass. If the demise in question had contained a power of re-entry framed in words literally corresponding with the words in the settlement, I conceive it would have been good. I have heard no valid objection to such a power of re-entry, notwithstanding the most earnest attention to the subject before and since the arguments in the Exchequer Chamber, and here. I have not been able to raise in my mind a doubt of the fitness of such a clause, or of its being that which the parties intended.

For the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion, first, that the former leases were not admissible in evidence to show that they contain clauses similar to those to be found in the demise in question, respecting the extension of the time of payment, and respecting the distress. Secondly, I am of opinion, for the reasons I have given, that the demise in question is invalid. The House has been told at the bar, that a decision, that this demise is invalid, will have the effect of destroying other leases made under similar powers. I cannot take notice of such a statement, first, because it is an assertion of a fact, of which, as a Judge, in a court of law, I can have no knowledge; secondly, if it were fit that it should weigh with us, ought we not to see the settlements and the leases, in order to know that the antecedentia et consequentia are the same as in this case. A variation in the words and context matter might vary the grounds of our judgments. Thirdly, if there were other leases made under circumstances precisely similar it would not vary the opinion [352] I have formed. I cannot accommodate my opinion to the convenience of lessees under powers; their estates must stand or fall by the authority under which they are made. It is a maxim of our law, that it is better to suffer a mischief than an inconvenience: the mischief (if it be any) we can see the extent of; it will be, that certain demises, in consequence of the carelessness or ignorance of those who drew them, will be invalid, and they who were intended to take, in the event of there being no good subsisting leases, will take. On the other hand, no one can foresee the end of inconveniences which would arise from the relaxation of the rules of law in the construction of these deeds.

As to the cases of Holley v. Scot, and Cove v. Day, from the report of the first case I cannot discover what was decided, it is to me unintelligible; but supposing it to be applicable, we have the later case of Cove v. Day. The decision of the four learned men on the second question has great weight with me, and I cannot see why it ought not to guide our judgment on the present occasion. It is well known that the late learned Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir Vicary Gibbs, thought that decision right, and was of opinion that the present lease was invalid: he was in office when the present case found its way into the Exchequer Chamber.

Holroyd J.: I think that, having due regard to the true intent and meaning of the indenture of the 2d day of July, 1757, according to the legal construction of the several parts of that indenture, as [353] stated in the special verdict, and having also due regard to the legal effect of all the facts and circumstances found by the special verdict, the demise of the 5th of September, 1803, as the same is stated in the special verdict, is invalid.

By the death of Lord Vernon, the lessor, who had an estate in him for life only, that demise became invalid, unless it were made in conformity to one of the powers of leasing contained in the above-mentioned indenture of the 2d of July, 1757. That indenture contains three powers of leasing: one, for a life or lives, or for a term determinable on a life or lives; another, for years not exceeding twenty-one; and the third, for working mines or ore for years not exceeding thirty-one. Each of these powers is clogged with qualifications of two descriptions; one class of which is comparative, or with reference either to the existing or previous state of things, or to usage or custom, or to what can reasonably be had or obtained; the other class is direct and absolute, without any reference or regard either to the existing or previous state of things, or to usage or custom, or to what can be reasonably had or obtained, or to any matter whatever; these last qualifications are superadded by the creatrix of the power, to be complied with at all events, as I think, without reference or regard to any matter, and not to be varied, changed, or altered by, or at all to depend upon, any usage, custom, or state of things, or any matter whatever.

The first of the above powers of leasing is that upon which the present question depends, the power of leasing for a life or lives, or for years determinable [354] upon a life or lives. The qualifications with which that power is clogged, are, as to the reservation of the rents, duties, and services, that they be such as were the ancient and accustomed, or more or as great or beneficial as at the time of the demising were payable, or as much as a just proportion thereof amounts to, according to the value of the premises demised, or more, with the exception of heriots. These qualifications are comparative, or with reference, expressly, to the things there expressed; and must be such as, on such comparison or reference, shall be found conformable thereto, and are wholly dependent thereupon. But the other class of qualifications superadded to this power is direct and absolute, and without reference to and wholly independent, as it seems to me, upon any other matter except what the law requires, and to be complied with at all events, whatever may be or may have been any usage, custom, or state of things whatever.—These other qualifications are, that the rents, duties, and services be incident to and go along with the reversion and remainder; that the leases contain a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent reserved, and not contain any express clause freeing the lessees from impeachment of waste, and that the lessees seal and deliver a counterpart of the lease. It is upon one of these direct, absolute, and independent qualifications of that power that the present question has arisen. That qualification is in the following words: "So as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved." This qualification being expressed in words that are direct [355] and absolute, and without reference to any former leases, or to any prior or then existing state of things, or former management or disposition of the property, the fact found by the jury, with respect to the former leases, cannot, I think, vary the legal construction to be given to this qualification. There is in the words no latent ambiguity which those former leases either raise or remove. If the words be not clear and explicit in themselves, their ambiguity, if any, is upon the face of the deed itself, and they cannot, I think, by law be allowed to crave in aid any former usage to vary or alter their construction: and this more especially in the case of such a deed as the present, wherein the parties expressly direct, that a reference to the then existing or former usages should be had recourse to, where they intend that either of them should be called in aid on the subject matter of these qualifications. Besides, it has been held by the Court of King's Bench, in Iggulden v. May (7 East, 237), as well as by the Lord Chancellor in the same case (9 Ves. jun. 329), ratifying a similar doctrine that had before been held by Lord Alvanley and Sir William Grant, when Masters of the Rolls, on covenants for renewal of leases, that the construction of deeds cannot be varied by the acts of the parties: and therefore, various other leases, that had before been successively made by the owners of the inheritances for the time being, could not be taken in aid to construe the meaning of a covenant for renewal. The instability and uncertainty introduced into rights of property created by deed, by [356] letting in such extrinsic evidence, and the mischief arising therefrom, would apply equally, as it seems to me, to the present case.

The present question arises in a case where the exercise of the power is by a person (namely, Lord Vernon) who, previous to the creation of the power, was a stranger to the estate; and in a case, where this qualification of the power given to him by his wife must be taken to have been inserted as well for the benefit of herself, as of the several other persons in remainder, in derogation of whose rights his exercise of the power would operate so long as the lease should continue valid after the extinction of his life-estate. It would operate in derogation of her and their rights, by depriving them, successively, of the actual occupation and enjoyment of the demised premises themselves, which they would otherwise be entitled to have, and giving them, successively, in lieu thereof, a rent or rents such as the power required, however inadequate the same might be.

The power given to the tenant for life to lease for a term that may last beyond his own life, is, agreeable to what is said by Lord Ellenborough in Cox v. Day (13 East, 127), for the benefit of the tenant for life; the qualifications only, as he there also says, are for the benefit of those in remainder; and, in this case, those in remainder, who are to be protected by these qualifications (except the creatrix of the power herself), are not parties or privies, but are strangers to the deed; and therefore as to them, [357] the words of the deed are to have their full operation for their protection against the tenant for life, who executed the power, and against whose act, which would or might be to their detriment, they were to be protected by this qualification. The very intent of prescribing these requisites is to protect the several remaindermen from the discretion of the tenant for life in the exercise of this power of leasing given to him. The object of the qualification is to secure to them the rent itself, and not to give them any substitute whatever in lieu thereof, other than and except the land itself for which the rent was to be paid. For this purpose this qualification looks to and specifies some occasion or event, and that a simple unqualified one, namely, the nonpayment of rent, not under any particular circumstances only, but generally whenever there is a nonpayment of rent, that is to say, it looks to and specifies the default of the lessees by the nonpayment of the rent as the occasion or event on which those entitled to the rent to be paid for the land shall, for want of the rent, have the land itself, the quid pro quo the rent was to be paid. Whenever that event or default arises the case then exists, I think, on which the land was to be had for that default.

without any other matter being to be superadded thereupon, except what the general rules of law, independently of particular terms of contract, would require, such as those requiring in a particular manner and form a demand of the rent due.

The words applying to the power of re-entry required to be contained in the lease are "a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent thereby [358] to be reserved;" that is, as I think, such a power as will authorize the party, whenever there is a nonpayment of the reserved rent, to re-enter. That is the express cause on account of which he is to be at liberty to re-enter, which liberty must, I think, be co-extensive and co-existent with that cause; and that cause, which is nonpayment of rent, (such I mean as will authorize a re-entry) exists from the very instant that there is such a default of payment as the law requires to authorize a re-entry; and that default of payment equally exists from the moment of such a demand as the law requires being made of the rent due and nonpayment thereon, without any subsequent definite period of time having elapsed; and whether there be or be not distrainable goods on the premises sufficient to pay the arrears of the rent, and by the sale of which the remainder-man may, at his own trouble and risk, pay himself those arrears. The words "for nonpayment," must in this case, I think, be taken to mean the same as either, "because of"—"by reason of"—"on account of," or "in case of nonpayment;" that is to say, when that event occurs, and the same therefore as if the words were on nonpayment of rent. That appears to me to be the proper sense and meaning of the words; and it is also, as I think, agreeable to the object of the qualification, which is, that the party shall have the land whenever the lessee fails to pay the rent for it. The lessee's failure or default in the performance of a duty which it is incumbent on him to perform, is the sole ground and consideration for entitling the party to re-enter and have again the land, without regard to [359] any possibility or power which the rent-owner may have to obtain the rent by any other means or exertions of his own.

But it has been argued that this qualification in requiring a power of re-entry is silent as to the time when it should be carried into effect; and therefore that it may be considered to require only that there should be some reasonable power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent, and that the power of re-entry reserved upon the lease in question is a reasonable power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent, and therefore as much as the creatrix of the power has required. To this, besides observing that the word "reasonable" is not here used in the deed, though it is used in two other instances in giving those powers where a discretion was intended to be given, I answer, that this qualification in my opinion is not to be so considered, if upon the due and proper construction of this leasing power, this leasing power, if fully executed, would have authorized a re-entry for nonpayment of rent in any case in which such entry would not be authorized for nonpayment of rent upon the lease in question. And I say that there are cases in which, if the power of leasing had been fully executed, a re-entry might lawfully be made for the nonpayment of rent, in which it could not lawfully be made under this lease.

To try whether this be so or not, suppose the right of re-entry reserved by this lease, instead of its being in its present form, had used the very words of qualification used in the deed creating the power of leasing. Suppose the lease had been, "Provided that it shall be lawful for the lessors, etc. [360] to re-enter" (or, "that they shall have power of re-entry,") "for non-payment of the rent hereby reserved." That is an easy and obvious way of framing the proviso, and most likely to be adopted, as I should think, by a person having recourse to and looking at the leasing power, as he ought to do who is anxious to be secure; and that clearly, I think, would have been a due execution of the power, and under such an execution of the power, by using those words in the lease, whenever there was a default of payment, whether fifteen days had elapsed or not since the rent became due, or whether a sufficient distress was on the demised premises or not, the right of re-entry would have arisen in case the landlord had made such a demand of the rent as the law for that purpose requires: so that the same construction would be given to those words where used in the lease, as if the words had been on nonpayment of rent; whereas according to the right of re-entry actually reserved the landlord has no such right of re-entry (though the rent is due and has been so demanded,) for fifteen days, during which he would have such a right, under such a due execution of the power of leasing as I have above supposed, nor would he have such right of re-entry at any period of time when there was a sufficient distress on the premises on which he might levy for his rent, though upon the goods of innocent third persons; which right of re-entry he would have during all that period in the other case, and without the painful necessity of being driven, in any case, to his remedy by distress upon the goods of innocent strangers. So that he has not that right and [361] specific remedy in lieu of his rent in those cases, under the lease in question, which he would have had under it on such a due execution of the leasing power as I have above supposed; but a different one, and such as in some of such cases at least some conscientious persons would not resort to or enforce, such as enforcing the power of distress upon the goods of innocent third persons. The construction of the words in question, therefore, if used in a lease instead of being used in the leasing power, taken according to the proper and ordinary sense and meaning of the words used, would, as it appears to me, have given a right of re-entry immediately on non-payment of the rent. They cannot, therefore, I think, be properly deemed to have a different import and signification when used in the leasing power, from what they would have in a lease made in conformity to that power, or that they would have if they were used in any lease whatever. There is not only no right of re-entry given for nonpayment of the rent until a default of payment for fifteen days, but even on such default the right given by the proviso is not a right of re-entry to possess or enjoy the land, but a right only of distress in case there be a sufficient distress upon the premises. In the forms of leases contained in Horseman's Conveyancing, in the edition that I have, I have been able to find only one that is clogged with the insufficiency of distress, all the others appear to be without it. Those leases appear to have been between the times of the statutes of William and Mary and Geo. 2, and several of the conveyances there for securing annuities give, first a power of distress, in [362] case the annuity be in arrear for a given number of days, and a right of entry and enjoyment till satisfaction, in case it be in arrear for a larger number of days, without regard to whether there be or be not any sufficient distress upon the premises. I think too that it affords an argument in favour of the above construction, and that nothing else can legally be deemed to have been in the contemplation or intention of the creatrix of the leasing power when she used the words in question, than a mere simple nonpayment, or default of payment of rent generally, unaccompanied with any other fact or circumstance, except that which the general rule of law requires, viz. a demand. It is manifest, that where she meant any other fact or circumstance should accompany that nonpayment before the right of re-entry should be given, she has expressly mentioned it, for in the second leasing power she enables leases to be granted, though the right of re-entry be not reserved except upon a lapse of nonpayment for twenty-eight days after the time appointed for payment of the rent. And I do not see how the lease in question can be held to be valid except upon principles of law that would have rendered it also valid, in case the creatrix of the leasing powers had also expressly added in the second leasing power another ingredient besides that lapse of twenty-eight days, namely, the want of a sufficient distress upon the premises, without both which, in addition to the mere nonpayment of rent, a right of re-entry need not, in that case, have been reserved under the second leasing power.

But, in truth, the reserved right of re-entry which [363] is now in question (whether it is to be deemed reasonable or unreasonable) is not a right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, but it is in truth a right of re-entry for a different thing which may never exist, notwithstanding there is a default of payment of rent, namely, for an aggregate, consisting in part indeed of that default, but of two other things besides, namely, a certain lapse of time and a want of sufficient distress. It is, in reality, not a right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, but a right of re-entry for want of a sufficient distress in case of such nonpayment. Instead of giving a right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent it refers the remainder man to the right of distress on that event, a right which he would have by the general law even without such reference; and it gives him the right of re-entry only at a later time for a different thing, and on a further event, viz. the want of sufficient distress.

It is not, therefore, in reality a right of re-entry for the same thing as the creatrix of the leasing power required it should be for (and which right, as I have said before, must I think be co-extensive with the existence of the thing, or event, or default for which it was given); but it is a right of re-entry for a combination of things, all of which must exist before the right of re-entry can be exercised. And how reasonable soever it may be thought that this qualification of this leasing power might have been given by its creatrix for the securing of the rent instead of the qualification she has actually given to it, it cannot I think be substituted for the qualification which she has actually given and required.

[364] But it has been argued that all this is immaterial, because of the general clause of re-entry that follows for default of the performance of any of the reservations, covenants, etc. But it is so completely settled, both on the maxims and authorities of law, that the general clause of re-entry can extend only to cases not before specially provided for, more especially when it would otherwise contradict and defeat the prior express provision, that I shall say no more upon this point.

But then it has further been objected that this leasing power being given and executed since the statute 1 Geo. II. (c. 28, s. 2), the insertion of the want of a sufficient distress on the demised premises in the leases, in order to give the right of re-entry, has become immaterial; because it has been urged, that since that statute no right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent can be rendered effectual so as to regain the actual possession, unless where there is no sufficient distress to be found on the demised premises countervailing the arrears of rent due. But that statute does not appear to make any difference in the present case. That statute applies only to cases where the landlord has omitted to make such a demand of the rent as would entitle him to the forfeiture, and substitutes for his relief other things to be done in lieu, and then gives him the benefit of a forfeiture (to which he would not be otherwise entitled), and gives him that benefit only in certain cases, amongst which is the want of a sufficient distress, and on certain terms. But notwithstanding [365] that statute, where a due demand of the rent has been made, a right of re-entry may be given, and may be effectually enforced, though a sufficient distress be upon the demised premises. That statute too applies only to cases where a half year's rent is in arrear, and not to cases where a less arrear of rent is due, as may be on the lease in question by a part payment, although the rent is reserved not quarterly but half-yearly.

But it has been further urged, that not only the above statute of the 1th Geo. II., but also the cases both at law and in equity show that the object of a power of re-entry is only to secure the payment of the rent. It was then contended, that this payment of the rent is as effectually and as beneficially secured by the power of re-entry actually reserved in the present case, as if that power had been reserved in the words used in the leasing power, inasmuch as it is said that it reserves the right of re-entry in all cases where the landlord cannot himself by a distress obtain the payment of the rent. This, it was argued, appears by the necessity there is (even after entry) of obtaining judgment and execution in an action of ejectment before possession can be obtained; and by the relief which the courts both of law and equity, but more particularly the latter, give, independently of the provisions of that statute, in cases of forfeiture for nonpayment of rent. But let us see how the case as to this point stands: If the right of re-entry reserved had been merely for nonpayment of the rent, in the terms of the right of re-entry required by the leasing power, it is clear, I take it, that on a due demand of the rent being made (and by [366] the statute 4th Geo. II., even without such demand, where half a year's rent remains due), the landlord would have been entitled either to have the rent itself actually paid to him, or to have the land. No other act in that case need be done, or any trouble or risk undergone by him with regard to the rent; but without further act, trouble or risk on his part, he might immediately enter into the land, or immediately proceed to recover the possession thereof by an action of ejectment, against which the tenant could not gain relief without his paying the rent itself, with costs; and unless he thus gets such relief, the landlord would be entitled to recover all the mesne profits from the time of the default by the nonpayment of rent. The right of re-entry actually reserved in the present case gives him no power to re-enter, or to proceed by ejectment, until the expiration of fifteen days, nor at any period of time, unless there is the want of a sufficient distress upon the premises, nor any right to recover the mesne profits farther back than not only the expiration of fifteen days, but also the time when there can be proved to be or when there was such want of distress; and so long as there continues such a distress the only remedy the landlord has for the rent is by action for it, or by distress: so that instead of having the rent by the payment and act of the lessee himself, or, in default thereof, an immediate right to enter or recover possession of the land itself, the remainder-man is driven to the necessity of incurring not only the trouble and expense of ascertaining whether there is or is not a sufficient legal distress upon the premises,—whether of the [367] property of the tenant, or of third persons,—of waiting, where the distress is of standing corn, until it is ripe and cut (for till then it cannot by the statute be appraised or sold for payment of the rent,) but also of incurring the trouble, delay and risk attending the making the distress in such manner as is in no respect illegal, either by reason of the manner of making or disposing thereof, or by reason of the distrained property being privileged from distress by the same being in the way to market, or by reason of trade or otherwise. Not only is the remainder-man driven to this trouble, but the tenant may also deprive him of the power of sale by a replevy of the distress; and it may happen at the end of the replevin-suit, that by the eloignement of the distrained property the insufficiency of the pledges in replevin, and the insolvency, or death without sufficient assets unadministered of the sheriff and the tenant, his remedy by distress may finally fail, with the additional loss and costs both of the distress and of the replevin-suit; and if this does not happen, he may still be without his rent unless he take upon himself the trouble and expense of prosecuting execution pro retorno habendo, or for his debts and costs, and the trouble and risk of prosecuting some further action or actions against the sheriff or the bail in replevin in case such execution shall prove ineffectual: and his remedy by ejectment would be in that case delayed until these results of the replevin-suit shall have been ascertained, even if an action of ejectment would then lie for the nonpayment of that rent which had been before distrained for. So that after the termination of the distress [368] and replevin-suit it may happen that the remainder-man may lose his rent, with the addition of costs. The payment of the rent is not, therefore, I think, as effectually and beneficially secured by the right of re-entry actually reserved as if that right had been reserved in the words of or according to the leasing power.

I have considered the question as above, independently of the disputed authorities of Core v. Day (13 East, 118), and Doe dem. Vaughan v. Meyler (2 M. and S. 276), both which cases I think were rightly decided, notwithstanding the prior case of Holley v. Scot. I have considered the question, too, as if in the lease the rent reserved had been a money-rent only, because it has been so treated in the arguments here, and in the courts below. But it is to be observed that this is the case, not of a lease for a money-rent only, but also for a rent of another nature, although certainly a very small one, namely, the additional rent of a couple of fat capons, or money, at the election, not of the tenant, but of the lessor or remainder-man, who would therefore be entitled, if he pleased, to have that rent in kind instead of money. It has been considered on all sides as the case of a lease for a money-rent only. I presume on this ground that the special right of re-entry depending on the want of a sufficient distress does not apply to this additional rent or reservation, but to the money rent only, and that the right of re-entry applicable to this additional rent is the general right of re-entry subsequently given by the lease, in case of default in payment or performance of any of the reservations, covenants, [369] etc.; and this may be the case if the statute 2 W. and M. (C. 5) which is the statute giving the power of sale of a distress for rent, be deemed to be confined to money-rents only. But if the default or payment of this additional rent be within the special rights of re-entry depending on the want of a sufficient distress, more especially if this kind of rent be also not within the above statute of William and Mary, so that the distress could not be sold under that statute for the purpose of raising or paying that rent, though if it could be sold for that purpose it would not raise the rent in kind agreeable to the landlord's right of election, but in money only, at least not without additional trouble and expense to the landlord of purchasing the rent in kind with the money raised by the sale, that is, either by doing it himself or procuring another to do it, I say that in such case the question proposed to us by your Lordships, as it appears to me, would embrace still further considerations arising from those circumstances, as the d's treasure for that small rent in kind, viz. the two capons, would in that case, that is to say if it could not be sold under the statute, remain only a dry, unprofitable, chargeable pledge for that rent, in lieu of the productive security and enjoyment of the land. This however it is unnecessary for me to consider, inasmuch as whether the additional rent in kind would embrace further considerations as to the law of the case or not, I think, for the reasons which I have before stated, that having due regard to every thing alluded to in the question proposed to us by your Lordships, the lease in question is invalid.

[370] Park, J.—The objections to this lease are two: viz. that it does not pursue the power, inasmuch as a clause is required to be in every lease in these words: "So as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent thereby to be reserved," and nothing more: whereas it is said this lease contains a power of re-entry, not generally, but clogged with two conditions,—"Provided the rent, etc. shall be behind and unpaid, etc. for fifteen days, and no sufficient distress can or may be had or taken upon the premises." And these two objections fall under very different considerations: but it must be admitted that if either of them prevail the lease is invalid. As to the general rules which govern the courts in the construction of leasing powers they are all now well understood, and have been so fully explained and commented upon by some of my learned brothers who have preceded me, that it would be a silly parade of learning, and a useless waste of the time of the House to enter upon them: it being sufficient to state that the intention of the parties, which is to be collected from the instrument, is to be the governing principle in the construction.

The words of the power having been read to your Lordships, "So as there be contained a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent thereby to be reserved," it has been asked, "if a plain man were asked how he would execute such a power, what would he say?" I answer distinctly that he would say, "insert a clause in the very words of the power, that the lessor shall have a power to re-enter for nonpayment of the rent thereby reserved." I am—[371]—swear that such a plain man, in my conception, would be grievously surprised to find two conditions, which he will in vain look for in the power, but which materially alter the rights of the remainder-man. The power to make leases is to be construed so as to lean neither to the one party nor the other, for the maker of the power certainly intended that they should operate for the benefit of both, of the one, by giving him the enjoyment during his life of an estate well cultivated, of the other (viz. the remainder-man), by preventing him from coming to an impoverished one.

It seems to me that to contend for what is insisted on by the Plaintiff in error is to say, that "absolute" and "conditional" mean the same thing; or, that a power clogged with two conditions is the same thing as an unclogged and unconditional power. When this case was before the Exchequer Chamber I stated, that if the only objection to this lease were the time given, before the lapse of which he could not re-enter for nonpayment of the rent, as then advised, I should think the objection fatal. I have heard nothing since to remove my doubt. It is said indeed that the indefinite article a being used, namely, a power, any power that is reasonable may be inserted. But what right have we to do this for the grantor of the power? Who has a right to insert this word? Who, if inserted, is to construe it? The court or the jury? If fifteen days be reasonable, why not twenty, twenty-five, and thirty? That this was never contemplated I think quite clear: for whenever time is meant to be given it is expressed, and therefore she must be presumed to [372] have known that where she meant to give time it ought to be expressed, lest the giving it in one case should be construed, as it is by me, that it was not intended to be given in the other. But I have said, and I repeat it, what right have we to insert the word "reasonable" into this power? If this word "reasonable" never found its way into powers, it might perhaps more fairly be argued that it was inherent in all. But looking at precedents and adjudged cases we do find the words "usual" and "reasonable" sometimes jointly introduced, sometimes separately: and these words when introduced compel the courts to consider what are usual—what are reasonable covenants—under such powers. If then it is not unusual to insert such words, why are the courts to introduce them where the creator of the power has not: and why by omitting them must be taken to have intended that they should not be inserted? But I am staggered by what is said in a book of great authority, and to which I think the Professional Public are much indebted (Sugden on Powers), that if this objection were to prevail it would invalidate nine tenths of all the leases in the kingdom granted under powers. I can only say such a consequence is to be deeply deplored; but it is entirely owing to this, that those who have prepared such leases have chosen to follow their own new-fangled conceits, instead of using the exact words of the power conferring the right to lease upon certain terms, and upon certain terms only. This argument, that many leases will be invalidated, may be a very good one to your Lordships in your legislative capacity, [373] on account of the hardship of the case, but cannot, and ought not, to influence you when your province is jus dicere, non dare. However, if this were the only objection to the lease in question, on account of the long practice which has prevailed, as it is alleged, I might be inclined to pause before I presumed to offer my humble advice to your Lordships, that on this ground alone the lease would be void.

But the second objection seems to me to be impossible to be got over. I have thought much about it, both before I gave my judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, and since. I have turned it in every point of view; I have heard all that learning and ability at the bar could suggest; I have of course been present at all the conferences with my learned brethren; I have been most desirous to be convinced if my opinion be erroneous; but after all I cannot raise in my mind a probable doubt; and though if the decision of your Lordships should be ultimately in favour of the lease it will be my duty to conform to that opinion, I am at present bound to state my entire concurrence in this point with my learned brothers, Richardson, Burrough, and Holroyd, who have preceded me. Their luminous exposition of the argument, and my own judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, which is very accurately reported, both by Messrs. Broderip and Bingham, and by Mr. Moore, and which is in the possession of some of your Lordships, render it unnecessary for me to do more on this head than to make an observation or two on the cases that have been quoted.

The main reliance on the other side is on the case of Hothly v. Scot, Loft, 346. Of that reporter [374] I shall say no more than this (without forming any judgment of my own), that during a long professional life of forty years, and Loft's reports embracing a period of that great man's life who then presided in the Court of King's Bench, during which, as to this part of them, there is no other reporter (not the reports of the very learned person now at your Lordships table (Henry Cowper, Esq.) did not commence till 1771, nearly two years after Mr. Loft's), I never heard them quoted three times in my life. But without any observations of this kind, it is quite clear from that report that none of the learned counsel then at the bar, neither Mr. Dunning nor Mr. Bearecroft, neither my Lord Mansfield nor any of the Judges, appear to have taken the least notice of the condition as to the want of a sufficient distress, which is the very point now under consideration, and which from the terms of the power and lease in that case might have arisen. But it is said there is a note of that case by Mr. Butler, taken by himself, in which it appears to have been mentioned; I have not seen that note, and therefore I can say nothing to it. I entertain great respect for that gentleman, and I do not wish to depreciate the labours of the young; but unless he be much more advanced in life than, for the sake of the public I wish him to be, he must forty-eight years ago have been a very young man. But admitting the point to have been mentioned, it cannot have formed a prominent feature either in the argument at the bar or in the consideration of the court, for if it had it is impossible that Mr. Loft, or any other man, in a report [375] of four pages should have omitted it. Can such a case for a moment be put in competition with Cove v. Day (13 East, 118), where this clause was the main objection to the lease, a case most ably argued at the bar by the now Chief Justice of that Court, and receiving the deliberate certificate of four very eminent Judges, Lord Ellenborough, Justices Grose, Le Blanc and Bayley? In the course of that argument Lord Ellenborough said, "There can be no doubt that it is more beneficial to the owner of the estate to have a power of re-entry at once upon the tenant, upon nonpayment of the rent within a certain time, than to have such a power only in case there shall be no sufficient distress upon the premises." And in another place, when Mr. Abbott was strongly pressing on the Court that such a clause secured the landlord, namely, satisfying his rent more speedily than in any other way, Lord Ellenborough said, in answer, "In the one case it is to be secured from time to time by successive suits, with the risk of sureties if the distress be replevied; in the other, it is secured once for all by the landlord's re-possessing himself of the land out of which the rent is derived." Can any one say, my Lords, that the one remedy is not more easy, more direct, and less circuitous than the other? And that great man, Lord Ellenborough, again says, "Surely the direct power is more beneficial to the landlord." And the certificate of all the learned Judges is in direct conformity with these dicta of Lord Ellenborough; for it is said, "We are of opinion that the power of re-entry reserved in and by the [376] said lease for nonpayment of the rent is not made in conformity to the power in the settlement for granting leases of the freehold part of the said premises, and that the lease is void on that ground." Not having seen any report of the judgment of the Court of King's Bench upon this case of Doe dem. Earl Jersey v. Smith, I cannot tell whether this case of Core v. Day was recalled to their attention; but I am quite sure it is impossible to reconcile the one with the other. This was so strongly felt by two very learned Judges in the court below, that at once they doubted the propriety of that decision; and one of them says, "it is not law, for it is diametrically opposite to reason and common sense" (ante, vol. I, 195). I am sorry to say I think directly the contrary; but I, for one, seriously object to this mode of getting rid of decisions, because they militate against our own notions. I agree with the pointed manner in which this was expressed lately in this House by the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and I hope I shall be excused for using his language. "If the law so settled is now to be considered unsettled, I know not on what foundation, in point of law, any decision can stand" (Rowe v. Young, Bl. 273).

But the case of Core v. Day is not a solitary case, for the question again, in about three years after, came under the consideration of three of the same Judges who decided Core v. Day, namely, Lord Ellenborough, Judges Le Blanc and Bayley, with the addition of another learned person now no more (Mr. Justice Dampier), and who could not [377] have decided as they did without determining that such a clause as we are now considering rendered a lease void where the power did not authorize it. The case I allude to is Doe dem. Vaughan v. Meyler (2 M. and S. 276). The case was tried before the latter Judge at Hereford, who thought the objection, such as we have here, was one that went to the whole lease, though it was partly of lands of which the lessor was seised in fee, and partly of lands in which he had only an estate for life with a leasing power, provided there was a clause of re-entry for nonpayment of rent for fifteen days. The lease was not executed according to this power, for it added, "and if there be no sufficient distress;" but the Court held, though the lease was void, because not executed according to the power, yet it was good as to the land of which the lessor was seised in fee, and the Court apportioned the rent; which was an erroneous judgment, if the objection to the present lease be not a good one.

The case of Rees on the demise of Powell v. King (Forrest, 19), I formerly thought, and still think, sets this point at rest, by showing that such a clause as this throws a burden upon the right of re-entry which the maker of the power never contemplated. That case has been so often mentioned that it is enough to say of it that it has decided, that before a plaintiff in ejectment can recover upon a clause of re-entry in a lease, in case there be no sufficient distress on the premises, he must show that every part of the premises has been searched, else he cannot say there was no sufficient distress. The Judge who first [378] decided this was well known to some of your Lordships, and no man will decry the knowledge of the late Mr. Justice Heath, and his opinion was confirmed by the Court of Exchequer. If the Courts of Westminster Hall were to overturn that decision it would go a great way to shake my present opinion; but I do not learn that any of my brethren are prepared to do so; and if, therefore, I feel myself bound, as I shall feel, to call upon any plaintiff in ejectment on the circuit, who has such a clog on his clause of re-entry as this, to prove that he has made a full search for a distress before I permit such a plaintiff to recover, I cannot conscientiously advise your Lordships that this lease is valid; most sincerely, however, wishing that consistently with my honest opinion I could do so.

Of one other point I must take notice, namely, that as this lease contains a general clause of re-entry it must necessarily control the special clause. To that position, I, for one, at present cannot agree; for I find the contrary doctrine maintained, from Altham's case (8 Co. 154. b.) down to the present day. In Altham's case we find this position or rather this maxim adopted. In the first part of the argument, putting every point that can possibly occur, his Lordship says, "Quando carta continet generalem clausulam, posteaque descendit ad verba specialia, quæ clausulæ generali sunt consentanea, interpretanda est carta secundum verba specialia." But he goes on to add, there is another rule or principle of law, viz. "generalis clausula non porrigitur ad ea, quæ antea specialiter sunt comprehensa." [379] Therefore, I say, this point for which I am now arguing being first specially defined cannot be enlarged by a subsequent general clause, which can only apply to cases not before specified or defined. So in Sheppard's touchstone (which is supposed to be the work of no less a man than Mr. Justice Doddridge) on the exposition of deeds (Ch. 5. p. 88. fo. 7), in confirmation of the above doctrine, that writer says, "If there be two clauses or parts of the deed repugnant to one another, the first part shall be received and the latter rejected, unless there be some special reason to the contrary." If we descend to more modern times, we find the same rule universally adopted and confirmed by Judges on particular cases depending before them. In Cotter v. Merrick (Hardr. 89), Mr. Baron Nicholas, quoting the Year-Books in support of his opinion, says (Hardr. 94), "When there are two clauses in a deed of which the latter is contradictory to the former, there the former shall stand." And not to multiply authorities upon a point on which Lord Ellenborough intimated a strong opinion, when he expressed himself against the validity of an argument founded upon such a point, I shall only quote one more from what Lord Chief Justice Holt and two of his brethren said in Thomas v. Howell (4 Mod. 69), that "in deeds it was admitted that subsequent clauses which are general shall be governed by precedent clauses which are more particular." I therefore think that this ground does not, in any way, strengthen the argument as to the validity of the lease.

[380] The point upon the statute of 1 Geo. 2, has been so luminously explained by my learned brother Holroyd, that I shall not trouble your Lordships on that point, except to say I entirely concur with him.

The next point is, whether the other leases should be admitted as evidence? I am willing to admit that if this deed upon the clause in question contains any latent ambiguity raised by extrinsic evidence, parol evidence or extrinsic evidence may be admitted to explain it, or to render it unambiguous. But I have never heard the general rule contradicted, that parol or extrinsic evidence cannot be admitted to contradict, vary, or add to the terms of a deed. It would be of most dangerous consequence to admit such testimony; for then, parties dealing in matters on writing made upon advice and consideration would be subjected either to the uncertain testimony of vague and precarious memory, or, as in the case at bar, to matter, of which at the time of contracting they might have no knowledge, and never intended to be under its control. The written instrument, therefore, except in cases of fraud, or other excepted cases, of which I insist this is not one, must be considered as speaking the sense of the parties to that deed or instrument. Upon this ground it was, I conceive, that the case of Cooke v. Booth (Cowp. 849) met with such a decided opinion against it in Baynam v. Guy's Hospital (3 Ves. jun. 298), by Lord Alvanley when Master of the Rolls, who not only states his own opinion, but that of Mr. Justice Wilson, who had argued the case of Cooke v. Booth, (who, Lord [381] Alvanley says, was astonished at the decision) as well as that of Lord Thurlow. The Master of the Rolls says, "I protest against the argument of the learned Judges as to construing a legal instrument by the equivocal acts of the parties, and their understanding upon it." The case of Tritton v. Foote (2 Bro. C. C. 636) seems directly at variance with Cooke v. Booth. In Iggulden v. May * the Court of Exchequer Chamber, unanimously affirming a judgment of the Court of King's Bench, held, that a covenant in a lease to grant a new lease, with all covenants, grants, and articles as in the said indenture is contained, does not bind the lessor to insert a covenant of renewal in the renewed lease, although it was alleged in the pleadings that the covenant required had been introduced in various other cases before then successively made and executed on renewals from time to time granted. Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, stopping the then Mr. Abbott, who was to have argued against the construction contended for on the other side, said, that the case of Cooke v. Booth was the first time that the acts of the parties to a deed were ever made use of in a court of law to assist the construction of a deed: and in another part of his judgment his Lordship says that case had been impeached upon all occasions, and that the Court of King's Bench were misled by the renewals stated in the case sent by the Court of Chancery. Now what is asked for in the present case but to assist the construction of an unambiguous deed by the prior acts of the parties? In the case which I argued as [382] counsel (Doe, d. Allen v. Calvert, 2 East, 376), though the lease there was according to the custom of the country as to the times of holding, yet the lease, dated 29th March, was held not to be a lease in possession, within a power to grant in possession, and not in reversion, because the days of holding were as to the tillage from 13th February past, the pasture ground from 5th April next, and the residue of premises from 12th May next.

But, my Lords, in my opinion no cases are wanting to prove that no evidence can be admitted to explain a deed which is plain and perspicuous in its terms, containing no ambiguity, much less to add clogs and conditions to it. I am asked then, is this a deed of that description? I answer, that in my opinion it is. I see no ambiguity: it is precise and definite in the powers granted; every person of plain and common understanding, much more every person with a legal mind, can give it a clear and satisfactory solution. But I am told the case of Fonnercau v. Poyntz (1 Bro. C. C. 472), before Lord Chancellor Thurlow, is against my opinion. Upon the best attention I can pay that case I do not think so. The case was a bequest of the sum of £500 stock in long annuities, and similar bequests of smaller sums in the same stock. The question was, whether this was a bequest of £500 a year long annuities, or only £500 in the long annuities. This case was very powerfully argued by one of your Lordships: I own I should have thought there was no difficulty in the construction: and Lord Thurlow seemed at first to be of that opinion, but afterwards admitted evidence [383] to show the extent of the property of the testatrix, to see whether she could possibly mean £500 a year, when she had no such stock. But though his Lordship admitted this, he states the clear principle of law to be, that for the wisest reasons it will not admit of an instrument being construed aliunde. And in the close of that case his Lordship says, what I quote to your Lordships as strong in my favour, because he only lets in the evidence to explain what is uncertain, "There is no doubt, if the word stock had been left out, but the meaning would be that the sum of £500 was to be disposed of in long annuities, and to make a produce, and that produce to accumulate until the legatee should attain twenty-one. This being the doubtful interpretation upon the face of the will, the question arises whether the state of the testatrix's fortune is not applicable to the construction of the will. It appears by some other parts of the will that she was extremely anxious to make an ample provision for the family of the Fonnercaus; considering then the situation of her fortune, it is perfectly inconsistent to say that she could mean to give ten times more than she was worth in legacies. My opinion therefore is that the judgment must be reversed, and that I can let in the evidence of the value of the estate, not to control the bequests, which the testatrix has made in words themselves distinct, nor to control the bequest which she had made of a subject which she had accurately described, but because the words she has used in the description are upon the whole of the context uncertain." "The peculiarity of this will furnishes sufficient doubt to warrant the [384] admission of collateral evidence to explain it: and if so, the statement of the testatrix's fortune is applicable to the purpose of such an explanation." His Lordship, whether right or wrong in his notion, clearly admits evidence aliunde on the ground of uncertainty and ambiguity only, and leaves the principle wholly untouched, that parol evidence, or evidence aliunde, cannot be admitted to contradict, add to, or vary the terms of a deed, will, or other written instrument. Now here the terms of this power are clear and express, without limitation, clog, or condition, nothing being doubtful or ambiguous: and the evidence sought to be admitted is not to explain that which is doubtful, but to add two clauses or two conditions to that which is absolute and unconditional: in short, to make a new deed in this respect.

The decision I am humbly recommending steers clear of all vagueness and uncertainty: leaving nothing to the variety of conflicting opinions. For who is to decide what is reasonable? If the Judges, as I should be inclined to think,—(but worse, if the jury) are,—what can lead to such contrariety of decision? We all know, in every transaction of human life, what is held reasonable or unreasonable depends upon the reasoning and feeling of every individual man who has to consider the question.

I heard it said this will unsettle many leases. I lament that it is so. The Legislature may interpose; but if my mode of construing powers had been always adhered to no such evil could have ensued. The hardship of the individual case is represented; and if there be hardship, I also, as an [385] individual, lament it; and this statement of hardship, and the consequences of what I should propose, have made me, again and again, examine this point with all the ability in my power; but after all this consideration, feeling that it is my sworn and therefore bounden duty to declare what I believe the law to be now, not to say what it ought to be, I think that to decide in favour of the lease would be to make a power differing substantially from that which was made, and making conditions which the creator of it never intended. This would be my opinion if I stood alone; but I am happy not to be singular in my judgment on this important question, although I am opposed to others whose ability I respect, and whom I reverence.

Bayley, J.: I am of opinion that the lease in this case is conformable to the leasing power, and that it is valid. Nor do I think that that opinion will trench on the case of Core v. Day. The settlement in this case requires "a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent;" and the first question I propose to consider is, whether this lease does or does not contain "a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent?" It provides, that if the rent be behind for the space of fifteen days, and no sufficient distress can be had upon the premises, the person entitled to the freehold and inheritance may re-enter. Is this then, or is it not, "a power to re-enter for non-payment of the rent?" Does it give any power to the landlord? Undoubtedly.—To do what? To re-enter.—For what cause? For non-payment of rent. It is then a power of re-entry for non-pay-[386]ment of the rent. I admit it is not an immediate power of re-entry; I admit it is not an unconditional power; but still it is a power of re-entry. In referring to Littleton, s. 325, I find instance, of powers of re-entry if the rent be behind a week, or a month, or half a year; and as far back as the year-books* it is established, that under such powers the time to demand the rent to warrant a re-entry is at the end of such week, month, or half year, and not on the preceding rent-day; so that it is consistent with a power of re-entry that it should not be immediate, but postponed till some given time after the rent should have accrued; and in Godbolt (110, pl. 130) I find the instance of a power of re-entry if the rent be behind, and there be no sufficient distress upon the land; and from these instances I infer that a power of re-entry, if the rent shall be behind fifteen days, and there is no sufficient distress upon the premises, is "a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent." It may not be the most beneficial species of power; it may be clogged with what in some cases may, by possibility, produce an inconvenience, but still it is a power. And if it be a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent, this lease does contain what (in the words of the settlement) is "a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent;" and persons who impeach the lease are then driven to the argument, that though it be a power, yet it is not such a power as, having due regard to the intent and meaning of the indenture of the 2d July 1757, that indenture according to legal construction [387] requires. Now this argument assumes that the words are capable of more than one meaning, if they are not so clear and precise and definite as to admit but of one sense; and it was to point out this assumption that I have been troubling your Lordships upon what might otherwise have appeared nearly a self-evident proposition. The words are "a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent." The law knows of many such powers, some more beneficial, some less so; some qualified, some not; some to hold the land till the rent is satisfied out of the profits; some to hold till the rent is satisfied aliunde (Co. Litt. 203, a.); some, as here, to restore the reversioner to his former estate; and some with the conditions I have already noticed, viz. postponement of time, and absence of distress upon the land; and some (though very few) with neither of these conditions. And which of these powers, having due regard to the intent and meaning of the indenture of 2d July 1757, does the indenture ture, according to legal construction, require? The intent and meaning of that indenture is to be collected either from that indenture, without looking out of it or beyond it, or from that indenture, combined with the consideration of the state of the property at the time when that indenture was made, if the evidence of the then existing leases, and of the powers therein contained (which I shall by-and-by consider), be admissible. The intent and meaning of that indenture (per se, and without looking beyond it or out of it) was, as it seems to me, that the reversioner should have such of those powers as would give him a proper and reasonable security for his rent by way of re-entry; and that if nothing short of a right of immediate re-entry, and of re-entry whether there were or not a sufficient distress upon the land, would give him that security, I should say he was entitled to such a power in the lease as would give him those rights; but if any of the other powers would give him a proper and reasonable security, it seems to me that giving him any of those other powers would be all the indenture of 1757, according to legal construction, requires. The rent is not a rack-rent. It is only £2 ls. 6d. per annum, payable half-yearly; and for a lease for three lives the lessees surrendered a subsisting lease, upon which at least one life was in esse, and paid £105. A half-year's rent therefore would be £1 0s. 9d. only; and for such a rent a delay of fifteen days was not likely to occasion the reversioner much probability of loss; it was not likely the premises would ever be so completely deserted as to have no sufficient distress upon them; nor was the rent such as could be any inducement to the tenant to replevy. For such a rent the power in question to re-enter at the end of fifteen days, if there were no sufficient distress upon the premises, appears to me an adequate and reasonable security; and I should be disposed to think that for such a rent, a clause without giving any days of grace would be unreasonable; because I think the immediate exercise of such a right would be oppressive. Nor do I think it unreasonable to deny the reversioner the power of re-entry where there is a sufficient distress upon the premises, because the Legislature did not think it unreasonable to deny the [389] landlord the benefit of 4 Geo. 2 c. 28, where there was such a distress; and because a landlord can have no difficulty in ascertaining whether there be such a distress or not. He has a right to enter with his bailiff upon the premises, to see whether there be such a distress; and according to Godbolt (110), if there be nothing that he can see upon the premises to distrain he is warranted in concluding that there is no distress there. Godbolt's words are, "It was holden by all the justices that if a man make a lease, rendering rent upon condition that if the rent be behind, and no sufficient distress upon the land, the lessor may re-enter: if the rent be behind, and there be a piece of lead or other thing hidden in the land, and no other thing there to be distrained, the lessor may re-enter; for the distress ought to be open and to be come-by." I am therefore of opinion that, without looking beyond the indenture of July 1757, the power in question is within the true intent and meaning of that indenture and the legal construction thereof as large and beneficial a power of re-entry as that indenture required.

But I apprehend that in judging of the true intent and meaning of the indenture of July 1757, in this respect, we are at liberty to look at the state of the property at the time that indenture was made, and see to what restrictions it was then subject, and what rights the settler then had. The settler has used the indefinite words, "a power of re-entry." By showing, as I do, that there are many such powers, I show that there is an ambiguity in those [390] words, either latent or patent; and may I not refer to the existing state of the property at the time these words were used, to see what was the intention of the settler, and in what sense she used those words? This is the first time I have ever known it doubted whether the estate and interest and powers of the settler over the estate he was settling was admissible in proof. I am not offering declarations of what the party said she meant; I am not construing a legal instrument by the acts of the parties, or by their understanding upon it (as in Cooke v. Booth) (Cowp. 819); but by showing the circumstances and situation of the party, and the estates and interest she had at the time, I am enabling the House to judge what in legal construction was her meaning. And I am not aware that there is any legal authority to exclude the evidence of such circumstances and situation. Doe v. Calvert (2 East, 376) certainly is not. That case only decided that a lease of 29th March of tillage-land from 13th February preceding, of pasture-land from 5th April, and of the residue from 12th May, reserving the rent in April, was substantially a lease from April, and therefore a lease not in possession but in reversion; and the custom of the country, that these were the ordinary periods of letting, was admitted without objection, and argued upon without objection, but was held not to contract the power so as to warrant a lease before April. If a man makes any deed or will, have I not a right to know what estate he had at the time he made such deed or will? and does not the construction vary in some cases according to the estate? If I grant a [391] man an estate for life, without saying whether for his life or for mine, is not evidence admissible to show what interest I had in the premises? For if I was tenant in fee he will take an estate for his own life; if I was tenant in tail, or for life only, he will take for mine (1 Shepp. Touch. 88). If a man bequeath me £10,000 3 per cent consols, it will be a specific legacy if he have that stock at the time; not specific, if he have it not, Selwood v. Mildmay (per M. R. 1797. 3 Ves. 310). Evidence is therefore admissible in such case to show what was the state of his property at the time he made his will, and the construction upon the will is one way or the other, according to the result. In Masters v. Masters (1 P. Wms. 421), where a lady by her will gave £5 to each of two hospitals in Canterbury, and by her codicil gave £5 per annum to "all and every the hospitals," the latter legacy would have been void for uncertainty; but it appearing (which must have been by extrinsic evidence) that the testatrix lived at Canterbury for many years, and died there, and that she took notice by her will of two Canterbury hospitals, the general words "the hospitals" were limited and considered as intended for "all the hospitals in Canterbury." But the case to which I wish to call your Lordships particular attention is Fonnereau v. Poyntz (1 Bro. C. C. 472). The testatrix there gave to Mary Poyntz the sum of £500 stock in long annuities; to Mary Hays the sum of £500 stock in long annuities; to Miss J. L. Barbauld the sum of £200 stock in long annuities; the interest thereof to accumulate till she attain twenty-one; the sum of [392] £100 stock in long annuities to Miss H. Dawson in like manner; and the residue of her estate both real and personal to her two nephews. Parol evidence was given that the testatrix had only £120 per annum long annuities; but Lord Thurlow doubted at first whether he could admit that evidence to explain the words; and he afterwards decreed against receiving it, because he thought it would produce a construction against the direct and natural meaning of the words. But upon a re-hearing he admitted the evidence, and acted upon it; and the ground of his decision was, that upon the face of the will itself it was doubtful whether the testatrix meant to give legacies of £1300 per annum, or only a gross sum of £1300; and he considered the state of the testatrix's fortune applicable to the construction. The situation of the fortune made him conclude she never could have meant to give in legacies ten times more than she was worth; and he let in the evidence, not to control a bequest which was distinctly and accurately described, but because upon the whole context it was uncertain whether she meant so much per annum, or so much as a gross sum. He thought the peculiarity of the will furnished sufficient doubt to warrant the admission of collateral evidence to explain it; and that the statement of the testatrix's fortune was applicable to that explanation. Lord Thurlow decided that therefore as a case of ambiguity; as a case in which, from the use of the doubtful expression "sum of £500 stock," and the "interest thereof," he might let in the extrinsic evidence of the circumstances of the testatrix to explain what was her [393] meaning. In noticing this case (3 Ves. 320) Lord Alvanley says, Lord Thurlow's only doubt was whether parol evidence was admissible to ascertain whether the testatrix did not mean capital, but he had no doubt he must know all the circumstances of her affairs. Apply that case to this. The evidence here is not to produce a construction against the direct and natural meaning of the words; not to control a provision which was distinctly and accurately described; but because there is an ambiguity upon the face of the instrument; because an indefinite expression is used capable of being satisfied in more ways than one; and I look to the state of the property at the time, to the estate and interest the settler had, and the situation in which she stood with regard to the property she was settling, to see whether that estate, or interest or situation, would assist us in judging what was her meaning by that indefinite expression. And then the case will stand thus: Lady Louisa Barbara Vernon being tenant for life with power of appointment in fee, of a very considerable estate, part of which was then out upon leases for lives at small rents, payable partly in money and partly at her election in fat capons, subject to powers of re-entry if those rents should be behind fifteen days, and there should be no sufficient distress upon the premises, settled that estate with powers to make life-leases of that part of the estate at the ancient rents, so as those leases should contain a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby reserved; and with power to make leases at rack-rent of the other parts of the estate, so as those leases [394] should contain clauses of re-entry if the rent were in arrear twenty-eight days; and then the question is, whether by requiring upon the life-leases generally "a power of re-entry" she required more than that description of power which the then life-leases had. She must be taken to have known what that power was; and had she been dissatisfied with it, or required any alteration, can it be supposed she would have contented herself with the indefinite expression "a power of re-entry!" When she is providing for the rack-rent leases, where the right of distress is much more important, she gives the tenant twenty-eight days; and can it be believed that she intended to be less indulgent where the rent bore scarcely any relation to the value of the property? I cannot believe she did; and for these reasons, because the settler has not said what particular species of power she required, and this is a reasonable power, and the very power in force upon this estate at the time this settlement was made. I submit to your Lordships that this lease was warranted by the power, and that the judgment of the King's Bench ought to be affirmed.

Wood, B.: I am of opinion that the power contained in the marriage settlement is well executed. That power applies to lands "leased for lives, or for years determinable on lives, to any person or persons in possession or reversion;" and one of the conditions of such letting is in these words, "and so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved." There is another power [395] of re-entry which applies to leases for years absolute, not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, and to be made at as beneficial yearly rent as was then paid, or the most improved rent, without fine or foregift; and there it is provided that there be contained a clause of re-entry in case the rent or rents thereupon to be reserved be behind or unpaid by the space of twenty-eight days after the time appointed for payment.

The lease in question is under the first power, which provides re-entry on non-payment of the rent generally, without prescribing any time of re-entry at all, or any special terms whatsoever. The proviso in the lease in question is, if the yearly rent of £2 or any of the duties, services, reservations, and payments thereby reserved shall be behind, unpaid, or undone in part or in all, by the space of fifteen days after any of the times of payment or performance, and no sufficient distress or distresses can be had or taken whereby the same and all arrearages may be raised. It is contended on the part of the Defendant in error that this proviso of re-entry in the lease is not such a one as is required by the settlement, inasmuch as it has limited a time for re-entry, which the power has not; and inasmuch as it is clogged with a condition, that there be no sufficient distress, which the settlement does not mention.

The clause requires no more than a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent, giving it no qualification or modification at all. There is a clause of re-entry, and that is a literal compliance. But though the power is general, I admit it must be executed, not in a fraudulent or illusory manner, but in a reasonable manner, such as the law will deem reasonable. In the clause of re-entry for the rack-rent the time is limited, viz. twenty-eight days. I admit that cannot be departed from. Why was no time limited in this!—Because the settlement meant to leave it to the discretion of the tenant for life to insert such a reasonable power of re-entry as might secure the rent to the reversioner. The object of re-entry is merely to secure the rent, and has been always so considered in law and equity; and when I see that object is secured reasonably and fairly, and we are not tied down to any specific terms, I think the power is well executed, being according to the intention of the parties. I think we ought to consider the deeds and acts, ut res magis valeat quam pereat. In Cather v. Merrick (Hardr. 89) in the Exchequer, on a special verdict, the question was whether the lease was a good lease within the statute 32 H. 8. c. 28. That statute is to enable tenants in tail to make leases to bind as if they were tenants in fee simple. The second section is, provided such leases be not for more than twenty-one years, and provided that upon every such lease there be reserved, payable to the lessors, their heirs and successors, to whom the said lands should have come after the deaths of the lessors if no such lease had been thereof made, and to whom the reversion thereof shall appertain, according to their estates and interest, so much yearly term or rent, or more, as had been accustomed paid. The lease was made reserving the rent to the heirs and assigns of the [397] lessor, who were not the heirs in tail entitled to the rent, yet it was held a good lease. Will. B. says, "In the exposition of statutes, the Judges must make such a construction as to advance and not to frustrate the intention of the makers." Parker, B. says, "It is the office of a Judge to preserve and not to destroy an estate." In this case the Judges gave their rational construction to the lease, which gave it effect. So, here, in this case before your Lordships, I conceive we ought to do the same, taking the true interpretation of the power to be to leave the mode of re-entry to the direction of the lessor. Has that been fairly and bonâ fide and reasonably executed? Is the period of fifteen days a reasonable time to allow for re-entry? In the case of rack-rent twenty-eight days is expressly given: if the parties have thought that a reasonable time, surely the fifteen days must be: it is the usual time as found by the jury: the law will judge what is a reasonable time.

The last objection, which was mostly if not entirely relied on, was the clogging the right of re-entry with the condition of there being no sufficient distress. Is that reasonable with reference to the law as it stood when the lease was made? I conceive it is. The 2d July 1757, was the date of the deed of settlement which gives the power of leasing, and which was subsequent to the statute of the 1th Geo. II. c. 28, which was in the year 1731, which regulates the powers of re-entry for the non-payment of rent. Before the making of this statute, the carrying into execution a power of re-entry was attended with great difficulty and nicety. There must have [398] been a demand of the rent upon the land: if there were a house, it must have been demanded at the fore door: and it must have been demanded at a convenient time before the sun-setting of the last day of payment, so as that money might be numbered and received. The landlord then had to make an actual entry and bring an ejectment. If all these circumstances were not critically and exactly performed he lost the right of re-entry for that time, and was forced to wait till other rent accrued, and then had to make fresh demand and re-entry for the subsequent rent. If he had complied with these formalities, and brought his ejectment, it was the uniform practice of a court of equity to relieve against a forfeiture upon payment of the rent and costs, considering the clause of re-entry as a mere security for payment of rent. What is the alteration made by the statute? It has dispensed with the formalities attending re-entries by the common law, and said that when the landlord has a right to re-enter, and half a year's rent is in arrear, he shall and may at once bring his ejectment and recover possession, provided there is no sufficient distress to be found on the premises to countervail the arrears then due. The tenant also may pay or tender the rent and costs to the landlord or his attorney, or pay the same into court before trial, and all proceedings shall cease. The policy of this law is to prevent forfeiture for non-payment of rent, and to facilitate the landlord's remedy for the recovery of it: and at the same time the legislature has thought it right to impose this condition: — you shall not eject the tenant if there be a sufficient distress to secure the [399] rent; you may have an action or a distress as soon as the rent is due, without waiting fifteen days. It is said, "still the statute leaves the common law remedy open to a landlord if he will comply with the formalities of demand at the last hour of the day, and make re-entry; and in that case the necessity of distress is not imposed on him." What then? Why the tenant will be relieved against the forfeiture in a court of equity; yet it does not seem clear even in that case, that the statute does not shut the door against proceedings by re-entry at the common law: but upon that I do not found my opinion. The words of the statute are, "that the landlord shall and may bring ejectment;" and shall is imperative. Under the statute of 8. and 9 W. 3. c. 11, an act for the better preventing frivolous and vexatious suits in actions for penalties for nonperformance of covenants, the plaintiff may assign as many breaches as he shall think fit. It was at first contended that the statute was not compulsory on the plaintiff to assign breaches, for that the statute was made for his benefit, and therefore he might waive it, and leave the defendant to his remedy in equity; but all the courts in Westminster Hall held it to be compulsory on the plaintiff to assign breaches and a sc. ad. dam., and the defendant shall not be put to seek relief in equity. This is the fair construction to be put on the statute of the 4th Geo. II. where the words are stronger, being "shall and may;" and, upon the same principle, if this be the true construction of the statute, and there is no decision to the contrary, then there is an end of the question, for the lease will then have expressed [400] no more than that condition which the statute requires. It might not be necessary to express the condition, because the law imposes it. But I will suppose it to be left open to the landlord to proceed in the old way, as before the statute, and a reasonable clause of re-entry is all that the power required, can the adoption of the same condition which the Legislature has adopted in similar cases be considered as unreasonable? The case of Core v. Day (13 East, 118) has been cited as an authority of the Court of King's Bench that the inserting a condition of re-entry in a lease made under a power in these words, "in case no sufficient distress can be taken on the premises," they not being in the power, was not a good execution of that power. I doubt very much the propriety of that decision; but be that case as it may, it is different in one material feature from the present case. The re-entry required was for non-payment of the rent reserved by the space of twenty-one days, so that there was a specification of a particular mode, and therefore it perhaps might be inferred no other qualification would be warranted. Here no time is limited: a power of re-entry generally is all that is required; and therefore I think reasonable qualifications may be made.

In this present case, which was only a few years afterwards, the same court thought this power well executed. They must have thought their former decision was wrong, or that this case was distinguishable from it: Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Bayley sat upon both those cases. But whatever may be the construction upon the statute [401] of the 1 Geo. 2, I do not rest my opinion upon that. My opinion is founded upon this, that the power of leasing leaves it to the discretion of the lessor to make a reasonable clause; and that the power of re-entry which is contained in this lease is a reasonable one; and therefore I think that the lease is not invalid.

Graham, B.: In my opinion the demise of the 5th September 1803 is valid. All the directions are strictly observed in the lease, yet how the penner of the lease was enabled to be correct in those reservations but by the aid of the then subsisting or former leases, I cannot readily conceive. But it seems he is mistaken, though with the same guides, in the clause of re-entry for non-payment of rent; for it is said he has unwarrantably and without authority or power, given 15 days respite, and annexed a qualification that no sufficient distress can or may be had on the premises, whereby the arrearages of this £1 half-yearly rent may be fully raised, levied, and paid.

And the question is, whether this lease, with a clause of re-entry so qualified, is a proper and valid execution of the power created by the settlement? Whether it be so or not must depend on these considerations, viz. whether it is substantially conformable to the intention of the creator of the power, suitable and adequate to its object and purpose, and not injurious or inconvenient to the person next in remainder or succession.

I will not trouble your Lordships with cases to show that powers of this kind should receive a liberal [402] construction. I ask only the construction of plain common sense: but as these powers pervade the settlements of all the great and potent families of the kingdom, it is important that the execution of them should not be avoided on slight or immaterial departures, even from a prescribed form, still less where no specific form, but a general direction is given. A prudent father, tenant for life, with such a power, makes his leases with the fairest intention: he provides for his wife and younger children by his savings and personal estate: his eldest son succeeds him, and upon an objection of this kind avoids his leases, and the personal estate of the father is exhausted to indemnify the lessees. This consideration would, I may presume, dispose your Lordships not to be rigid in the construction of the execution of these powers, but to give effect to them when they are fairly and honestly executed, and without injury or sensible inconvenience to the remainder-man.

What then did the maker of this power mean by the words, "so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent?" The maker does not say what power—he prescribes no form of the clause. What is it but a general direction to insert a clause of re-entry because of non-payment of rent, that is, where the rent is not duly paid? This general direction was never intended to be inserted verbally in the future lease; it left the verbal exposition and specific form of the clause to further care and provision: no conveyancer would think of transcribing the terms of this general direction. Besides, "a power of re-entry" for non-[403] payment of rent necessarily implies a selection of one out of several. It might be a power of re-entry at common law, or under the statute, or what is likeliest of all, a power such as had been inserted in all former leases of the same subject, and in the very lease which was surrendered to make way for the present. I repeat it therefore, that this general direction necessarily calls for the exercise of judgment in preparing the clause. I speak not of a definitive judgment, that must ultimately rest with a court of law or equity, but of a judgment of the person who executes the power, or his conveyancer, as to what power is meant; the answer to which to me appears obvious, clear, and necessary—a power fit, suited, and adequate to the occasion. Then what is the object and occasion? The coercive means of enforcing the payment of rent: for my error, if it be an error, is this, that clauses of re-entry are intended for that purpose only, and that courts of equity would at no time suffer them to be used for any other purpose; and that if the clause of re-entry in this lease had been unqualified, as it is contended it ought to have been, a court of equity would have enjoined the landlord, on payment of the rent in arrears and costs; so that the remainder-man would not have been at all the better for the unqualified clause. Looking therefore at this general direction as referring to the exercise of some judgment or discretion to be used in the formal execution of this power, let me consider in what manner a tenant for life most anxious to execute it with scrupulous fidelity would act. He would consult his man of the [404] law. The lawyer reads this general direction, he finds he must look into former or subsisting leases, to know first what lauds were formerly letten for leases: secondly, what the rents were before and at the then moment; thirdly, what heriots had been heretofore reserved, what duties, what other reservations were to be made and secured. Could he forbear, or would he be bound to forbear, to look into the clause for non-payment of these nominal rents? Were he so bound, I should much regret that the law had established a rule which excluded the very best information he could obtain. But suppose that he must shut his eyes to those clauses in former leases, and in the very subsisting lease of the same lands, he must, in the first instance, consider what is a fit and proper clause for the purpose. He would naturally say, I cannot pen this clause in the language of the settlement; and if I make it without any qualification by a more obvious and easy means of obtaining the rent, I make it a re-entry at common law, with all the inconveniences attending it, and its ultimate control in a court of equity. He would therefore conclude that he had better take the statute of the 4th Geo. II, c. 2, for his guide, and pen the clause in the manner which that statute seems to have pointed out on a view of the law and equity applicable to that subject. I cannot be supposed to mean that this first exercise of judgment in preparing a proper clause could ultimately weigh, if in the execution of the power the lawyer had misconstrued its meaning and the intention of the maker; nor can I be supposed to mean that the [405] validity of the execution of the power could properly be left to a jury;—the decision on that point could only be by a court of law or equity.

I have said that the clauses for re-entry in the former and subsisting leases were a proper guide to the exercise of discretion in preparing those clauses; but I say it subject to the doubt which some may entertain; and if I am not allowed to use that evidence I do not feel that the argument in support of my view of this question is much impaired: though with that evidence the point is decided. But I take this to be a case very different from Cooke v. Booth, which I know has been overruled by many subsequent approved decisions. In that case the Court of King's Bench were called upon to put a construction on a written and explicit covenant of no ambiguity, or if any, of a patent ambiguity; it was a covenant to grant a new lease on the dropping of one of three lives, for the lives of the two remaining, and the third life under the same rents and covenants. But this is not a question on the language of a written instrument; it is impossible to contend that it should be literally transcribed into the clause; it must have some modification; and if you admit any you admit the exercise of common sense, and the consideration of the fitness and propriety of the power; and to my apprehension you admit inquiry as to what clause of re-entry the settler meant. She has bid you look to former leases as to the lands so usually letten, the usual rents, heriots, services, and covenants for their recovery, and for doing suit at the mill; has she not therefore bid you look for what was the usual [406] and proper clause of re-entry for non-payment of those nominal rents? This extrinsic evidence is not resorted to for the purpose of explaining the written and unfolded language of an instrument, but as a guide how to unfold and prepare a future instrument under a general direction, to observe in all particulars what had theretofore been done. That is the substance of all the restrictions: "do as has been done heretofore." But I do not wish to involve the case in this discussion; though for my own part I think the facts found by this special verdict and rightly admitted in evidence decide the question.

As to the question arising on the assumption that the giver of the power meant that the clause of re-entry should be simple and absolute, it is said, with great impression on many, that there is a manifest distinction between a simple power of re-entry, and a power clogged, as it is said, with a condition or troublesome qualification: but the question is not on a difference in terms, but on a difference in substance and effect: a difference which may sensibly injure the remainder-man, not on a difference which leaves him effectually in the same situation, or, as I think, in a situation which may be proved to be better. To judge of this, let me suppose that a clause, such as has been suggested, had been inserted in the present lease: how would it have availed the remainder-man? He must have begun by a demand of his rent of £1 at proper time and place. It is hardly necessary to quote Lord Coke's Commentary on Littleton (153 a, 154 a, 201 and 202) to show with what punctilious and expensive accuracy this must be done: the preamble of 4th Geo. 2, sufficiently shows how much those niceties were felt as impediments. He must then with much trouble and expense serve his ejectment, and for a rent arrear of £1, and he is immediately met, first by the disgrace of such a proceeding, and then by a bill in equity, with a tender of his £1 and costs. I may presume that it was the knowledge and prevalence of this equity that gave occasion to the statute 4th Geo. 2, which empowered the courts of law to exercise the equitable jurisdiction, and provided, on the one hand, an easier remedy for the landlord to enforce the payment of his rent; and to the tenant a more prompt and less expensive relief, when powers of re-entry were abused. I do not contend that this statute has taken from the landlord his right of reserving to himself a power of re-entry absolute; but it excludes him from all benefit under the statute if he does not pursue the steps which it points out: and when a question arises, as here, of a fit and proper power of re-entry for non-payment of rent, what better guide presents itself for the judgment of a man who is to prepare the clause, than the directions of a statute framed on the view of all the legal rights of the landlord, and the equitable relief of the tenant? And we may remember that when this power was created the statute of 4 Geo. 2, had passed many years, and its operation was known and prevalent.

I have said, that the giver of this power meant by the words used a power fit, and suited, and adequate to the occasion, that is, to its proper and allowable use, the security and enforce-ment of the payment of the rent: and I take it for a clear principle of equity that the landlord shall use it for no other purpose. But two inconveniences are pointed out as affecting the remainder-man: first, that of proving that there was no sufficient distress on the premises; secondly, the delay and expense of a replevin. The first is applied to an estate for lives, where the rent is merely nominal, and intended only to preserve the relation of landlord and tenant, and the right to future fines. It is almost impossible to suppose property of that kind so dismantled as that the landlord should be put to any difficulty to find a cow, or horse, or piece of furniture, to pay a rent of £1, and, with respect to the second difficulty, the same may be said of the improbability of any replevin for so small a rent. But the best answer is, that if the clause of re-entry stand ever so absolute, the tenant, though he would not be heard in equity to say that there was a sufficient distress on the premises, could stay the proceedings at law on payment of the rent and costs; for I take it that it was always and originally in the jurisdiction of a court of equity to relieve against clauses of re-entry for non-payment of rent, where the tenant was ready to pay the rent, or to give better security if required, for the punctual payment of it, whatever doubts the court of equity might entertain of clauses of re-entry for breaches of other covenants, where it might not be so easy to place the landlord in that situation with regard to his property, which he had a right by all means to secure to himself.

With respect to the cases cited I shall con-[409]-fine myself to a very few observations on only two, those of Core v. Day, and Hotley v. Scot. With respect to the former, I am reported to have expressed myself too strongly, by saying that it was contrary to law and common sense; and those expressions have been justly animadverted on by one of my learned brethren. I do not recollect to have used such expressions as applied to that case; but if in the warmth of argument any such expressions did escape me, I have only to regret that I have been so faithfully reported. This, however, I may say, that from my manner of introducing my own opinion I could not fairly be understood to mean an attack on that authority so unbecoming. I certainly mentioned that case as standing in the way of the present decision, and opposed to it the contrary decision of Hotley v. Scot, that in that equipoise of authorities I might more fairly exercise my own judgment; and I said upon that occasion, what I now repeat, that notwithstanding the imperfect printed report of Hotley v. Scot, it is impossible to read Mr. Butler's note, (whatever may be said of his then youth and inexperience), and not to see, that the point or the effect of a qualification similar to the present was distinctly made, argued upon, and overruled, Lord Mansfield saying, as I apprehend, with perfect accuracy and truth, that the clause was a reasonable one and conformable to the statute of Geo. 2; and that clauses of re-entry for non-payment of rent were in equity considered only as the means of enforcing the payment of it. But, perhaps your Lordships may think the case of Core v. Day distinguishable from the present. The ob-[410]-servation of my learned brother, who first delivered his opinion, is material, and in that case there was no reference, nor necessity of reference, to former leases as to what lands should be letten, what ancient rents, what heriots, suits, duties, or services should be secured. It was a power to lease any of the lands, with the single qualification, that the leases should reserve the best and most improved rents.

The decision of the Court of King's Bench in the present case may be thought to throw some doubt on Core v. Day; and, all the cases considered, the present is open to your Lordships decision. I humbly offer my opinion, that the lease in question is not, for any reason that I can suggest, an invalid execution of the power.

Richards, C. B. The question arises upon a deed of settlement made on the marriage of Lady Vernon, by which her Ladyship was made tenant for life, with remainder to Lord Vernon, her intended husband, for life, with powers of leasing, which were given to each of them as they should happen to be in possession of the premises. One power is to lease the mineral lands, in which there is no clause of re-entry at all; the power mentioned secondly in the settlement is to grant leases at a rack-rent, with a proviso for re-entry in case the rent be in arrear for twenty-eight days: in that case there is a power of re-entry required in the lease to be granted for non-payment of the rent; but there is an extension of the time from the days fixed for the payment of the rent to twenty-eight days. The clause is to be [411] introduced into a lease in which the rent and the occupation run together, and are considered as of the same value, the rent is paid and payable for the year during which the enjoyment of the premises has been had; yet by the power in that case there is expressly an extension of twenty-eight days given for the payment of the rent. The power now in question authorizes Lord and Lady Vernon, as each of them shall come into possession of the premises, to grant leases of such parts of the land as were then leased for life or lives, so as there be reserved the ancient and accustomed yearly rents, duties and services.

It seems to me impossible to ascertain what lands were then leased for life or lives without looking into the leases and other instruments which were produced at the trial; and the production of the same instruments is equally necessary to shew what the ancient and accustomed yearly rents were. In this view of the case, as it seems to me to be impossible to consider the effect of these powers without looking to the instruments to which I refer, it follows, that in my judgment they were properly admitted in evidence at the trial. Then come the words of the clause in question, viz. "and so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved." A more general power can never be expressed: It is not clogged with any qualification; it requires only a clause of re-entry "for nonpayment of the rent," not on nonpayment of the rent. There is no allusion to an immediate entry for or on nonpayment of [412] the rent, but a clause of re-entry generally for non-payment of the rent.

Now in this last case, which is the case before your Lordships, the lessee pays the fine contracted for to the tenant for life, the lessor, at once, in the very commencement of the term. The tenant for life receives at that time the whole value of the lease and of the premises demised, except the nominal rent of £2 per annum, and the small duties: and it can hardly be supposed that it could be the intention of the parties to the settlement, in a case where the lessee paid all the value at the first instant, that he should be in a worse condition than the lessee under the other power, paying rack-rent, who was not to pay any rent until he had enjoyed the possession of the premises, and to whom an extension of twenty-eight days beyond the time fixed for the payment of his rent was given.

Now Lord Vernon, intending to execute this power, executed the lease in question, containing a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, with this proviso, "that if it shall happen at any time during the said estate hereby granted, that the said yearly rent or sum of £2, and every or any of the duties, services, reservations and payments hereby reserved, or any part thereof shall be behind, unpaid or undone, in part or in all, by the space of fifteen days next over or after any or either of the days or times whereat or whereupon the same ought to be paid, done or performed as aforesaid, and no sufficient distress or distresses can or may be had and taken upon the said premises, whereby the same and all [413] arrearages thereof, if any be, may be fully raised, levied and paid," it shall and may be lawful to and for Lord Vernon, or the person to whom the freehold or inheritance shall belong, to re-enter: and the question before your Lordships is, whether this proviso is agreeable to the power, which directs that in the lease there should be a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent.

There are two objections stated: the first is, that in the lease the time for the payment of the rent is extended to fifteen days, whereas it is insisted that the re-entry ought to have been immediate, and at the time when the rent was reserved to be payable. The second objection is that the re-entry is given in reference to a want of a sufficient distress.

It is clearly established that the construction of powers is to be governed by the intention of the parties who make them, that intention to be ascertained by a fair interpretation of the language in which the power is worded: in this case, Lord and Lady Vernon, uniting in marriage, may be considered under their settlement as owners of the estates, though before marriage it was her Ladyship's property. By this settlement they propose to grant leases to all who choose to take them upon the terms mentioned in the powers: one of which, relating to the property under consideration, is, that the lease should contain a condition of re-entry for non-payment of rent. It has been considered, and has been ruled in many cases, that in the construction of powers the courts ought to be as liberal as may be: and more liberal in favour of a lessee where the power is executed by the person out of whose [414] inheritance the estate issues than when executed by a third person, a stranger. It has been contended, that in this case, the estate moving originally from Lady Vernon, Lord Vernon was to be considered as a stranger, and that there ought therefore to be a greater strictness applied with regard to the lessee than if he was originally the owner of the estate: but I beg of your Lordships to observe, that in this case Lord and Lady Vernon had each of them, when in possession, the same power to grant leases: the words of the power are precisely the same as applied to each of them, and must be construed as much to apply to a lease made by Lady Vernon, as to this lease made by Lord Vernon: and therefore they must be construed with the same attention to the meaning as if the words were applied to a lease by one or the other, and we are bound to consider, in construction, the lease in question as if made by Lady Vernon, from whom the estate originally moved, and who may fairly be considered as in a situation similar to the case which I am about to mention, and upon which some of your Lordships can have no doubt. Suppose a landlord seised in fee simple enters into an agreement in writing with a man to grant him a lease for a number of years, with a right of re-entry for non-payment of rent at the time specified: Suppose a bill filed in a court of equity by one or the other of the parties for a specific performance of the agreement, the Court would refer it to a master to settle the terms of the lease; and any gentleman who has ever sat in a court of equity must admit, that the Court will, if applied to, direct the insertion of a power of re-[415]entry upon reasonable and usual terms, and unquestionably extend the time of re-entry to a reasonable time beyond the time fixed for payment of the rent; referring at the same time to a sufficiency or deficiency of distress, as in the present lease. I mention this case of an agreement, because it seems to me to apply very closely to the case before your Lordships. Courts of equity adopt the same principle and practice in hundreds of instances, such as leases by guardians of infants, committees of lunatics, and the like. The Court so acts because it executes the intention of the parties; and a court of law in construing powers, is equally bound to adopt the intention of the parties creating the power; and there is no difference in the construction of words in a power, and of words in any other instrument. Suppose Lord Vernon had agreed to grant a lease pursuant to his power, and had not granted it, and there was a bill in equity filed to compel him, or by him, to compel the person who had agreed, to execute the lease according to the power, the court would, I doubt not, direct a lease to be executed with a power of re-entry upon the usual and reasonable terms, which would be according to its construction, according to the intentions of the parties creating the power; and, I presume, the lease to be executed under the orders of the court would be similar to that which has been executed in this case. I am more willing to refer to the proceedings of a court of equity, because I am speaking in the presence of those who have, perhaps, more knowledge and experience than any persons of the present or any former times.

[416] I understand from extensive information, and my own experience, such as it is, justifies me in believing that the practice of all conveyancers has been consistent with what I have stated now, so far as the extension of the time is concerned; and if it be so it certainly must be considered as founded upon the intention which is ascribed to the party making the power, for it is obvious that if the power, as it is contended, required a right of re-entry at the moment the rent was due, the enlargement of the time would be in some degree unjust to the reversioner, as it would cause a postponement of the day of payment: but the practice has been, I believe, so general that it must be strong evidence of the intention ascribed; and so inveterate, that it would be very highly dangerous to affect it: and I have always understood that the Judges have always considered an universal or very general practice amongst conveyancers a sufficient ground for their decisions, though they did not entirely approve of the principles on which the practice had proceeded.

On this point, viz. the extension of the time, I have been always inclined to support the lease, and I am of opinion that the objection ought not to prevail.

With respect to the other objection to the lease, viz. that a re-entry cannot be had unless no sufficient distress can be had upon the premises, I do not find, from the best inquiry that I have made, that any very general practice or understanding upon the subject, namely, with respect to the execution of powers, has prevailed among conveyancers; and I have not been able to find that any decision has [417] yet taken place by which I am in a judicial point of view bound to abide. I must confess that I was for some time convinced by the reasoning so strongly pressed by some of my learned brothers; and that I formed an opinion on this part of the case agreeable to theirs from whom I am now under the necessity of dissenting; but your Lordships commands have obliged me to re-consider the case, and I feel great consolation in having had the opportunity, as I hope that I have been able, to take a more correct view of the subject.

The objection to the part of the lease with which I am now troubling your Lordships is certainly greatly supported by the inconveniences imposed on the reversioner; but if I am right in deeming the lease good, notwithstanding the extension of the time for the payment of the rent, it must be because it is agreeable to the true intent and meaning of the power, though there are no words that expressly allow that extension. If so, it may be right to presume that the words used in the power meant more than is expressed, and that any right of re-entry on reasonable and usual terms, so far as the extension of the time is concerned, is good. If so, what prevents us from inquiring whether the other terms are reasonable and usual. I mean with respect to the distress; and from holding that if they are usual and reasonable they are within the power? It cannot, I think, be said that the circumstance of the want of a sufficient distress can be considered as imposing any condition either not reasonable or not usual. Every one's experience shows that in leases in general it is not only usual but most general, and [418] it cannot be supposed to be otherwise than reasonable; and the leases produced in evidence, which I think were properly received, prove the existence of this clause in all of them as applied to the power.

It is observable, however, that the power now under consideration is the first in the settlement; it requires in very general terms that in every lease pursuant to it there should be a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, or because the rent is not paid; it does not specify any qualification or condition, and only requires that clause of re-entry without more, excepting for non-performance of the covenants. Now it is clear that the clause does contain a power of re-entry for the nonpayment of rent, than which nothing in the world can be more general and unrestricted; and under words so general I humbly conceive that there is in the lease a clause of re-entry on reasonable and usual terms. In a condition of re-entry all that the law requires is to secure the payment of the rent, and re-entry is, as it were, penal; and therefore the clause in this lease under the general words of the power is nothing more than what the law would enforce and require, and therefore the clause is exactly agreeable to the power, as it is reasonable and usual.

That the real object of the power of re-entry is to secure the payment of rent is quite obvious; for a Court of Equity acting on reasonable grounds has always prevented a re-entry from taking place if the rent is paid, though the time of re-entry has arrived; because it was considered merely as a security for the payment of the rent. The maker of it cannot be supposed in directing the clause of re-entry to [419] have intended really to destroy the interest given to the lessee, but to secure the re-payment of the rent reserved to the reversioner: and now by the 2d Geo. II. the Legislature has given a sanction to the clause which is used here, and directed the effect of it in general. Surely it is very difficult to imagine it is not a reasonable clause, since the Legislature has authorized it in an Act of Parliament made expressly for the purpose of assisting landlords; and I apprehend that the clause must be considered as agreeable to a power which requires only a clause of re-entry for nonpayment of rents.

I beg here to request your Lordships attention to the observations which I have made on the proceedings of Courts of Equity, which apply to this head as well as to the former; for I conceive that those courts would direct a clause similar to that which is now in question.

Now suppose this was a lease by Lady Vernon, it seems to me that according to the argument itself used at the bar, there would be very great difficulty in maintaining that the lease was not according to the power, as the estate moved from her ladyship, and therefore the construction of the power would be more favourable to the lessee; and if the words were the same in the lease she might have made as they are in this lease which Lord Vernon has made, the lease would I think be considered as valid; and there can be no different construction of the same words, for the construction in both cases must be on the intention ascribed to the parties who used them in the settlement.

[420] The lessees are purchasers for valuable consideration under the settlement, and upon the faith of the power in the settlement, they have paid the value of the estate for the term demised to them, except the small rent and duties. I am persuaded that every court must feel very desirous of supporting the lease executed. The clause objected to is reasonable, and perfectly calculated to secure the rent. It is inserted in all general leases—it is sanctioned by Parliament—it is, as I conceive, agreeable to the proceedings in Courts of Equity, which act on the intention of parties, collected from the instruments executed by them; it is consistent with all the other leases in the family made under similar powers.

Under these circumstances I confess it appears to me, on the best consideration I have been able to give the case, that this lease is warranted by the words of the power in the settlement, and that the lease is valid.

Dallas, C. J. I am of opinion that the lease in question is bad, as not being a good execution of the power.

Two objections arise. The first, as to the fifteen days: the second, to the clause providing as to distress: and the case has been argued at the bar, and considered by the learned Judges on the double ground of authority and principle; to each of which I shall separately advert.

And first, as to the fifteen days. The single case cited is of a negative nature; that is, one in which, though other objections were taken, this was [421] not. And on this case I think a great deal too much stress has been put; for without saying at present whether the objection be well or ill founded, good or bad, intrinsically considered, I will only observe, that when it is seen how it weighs with many learned persons, now that it is taken, it seems to me it is going a great way indeed to assume that if it had been taken formerly it could not have succeeded; and, much too far to infer, that its not having been taken is to be considered as proof that by common consent it was treated as not fit to take. The more natural and rational supposition I should apprehend to be that it was not adverted to at the time, at least this is the opinion I should form, for I know not on what legitimate ground of reasoning we can assume that what appears to be so important now, was considered and rejected as unfounded then. Still, however, let this case weigh as much as it fairly ought it is admitted to be but negative authority; and the question now occurring, and requiring positive decision, it must be examined and determined on authority, if there be authority; and if there be no authority then on principle. Such then is the only case relied upon with respect to the objection applying to the fifteen days.

I come next to the provision as to there being no sufficient distress. And here again, in support of the validity of the lease one case only has been cited, viz. Holley v. Scot, as bearing directly on the point. On this I shall not waste time by dwelling longer than, in this last stage of the discussion, I feel to be necessary; and therefore, as to the imperfection of the report, the character of the re-[422]-porter as such, the insufficiency and invalidity of the reasoning as reported, and the other grounds of objection made by some of the learned Judges, with whom I agree in opinion, to these I shall merely refer, repeating only for myself what I said upon a former occasion, and am not disposed on reflection to retract, namely, that though the particular point now under consideration was not adverted to then, in the decision, reported as it is, still, as it must have been different if the objection then and now made had been deemed valid, I think that in fairness I must take it, such as it is, to be a case adverse to the opinion I entertain. Taking it then as such, and trying it as authority, the only ground to which at present I am addressing my observations, the first objection to it is that it is a single case, not professing to be grounded on any that had preceded, nor appearing to have been supported by any that had followed it, but on the contrary the only similar case, Care v. Day, standing in opposition to it; for as such I consider it, and for reasons which I shall presently give. I need scarcely add that such a case, dissented from as it now is by so many of the learned Judges, admitted to be inconsistent with the decision in Care v. Day, and at all events confessedly at variance with the observations and reasoning of Lord Ellenborough throughout the whole of that case, can scarcely, as mere authority, be considered of much avail. In opposition to it, I have said, appears to me to be the case of Care v. Day. But here again I wish to deal correctly with the subject of authority; and though to a certain degree (and to what degree I shall examine) Care v. [423] Day must be permitted to operate, still I think it is not to be relied on strictly as mere authority, even in favour of my view of the subject; first, because if Holley v. Scot was rightly decided, Care v. Day would be in opposition to it, and thus we should only have case against case; and further, that with respect to Care v. Day, of the learned Judges who now support the judgment of the King's Bench, it is disapproved of by one, as to the grounds on which it stands, and expressly and in terms dissented from by the other; and lastly, because being a decision by the same court by which this case was in the first instance decided, if to be distinguished, as it is contended it is to be, then it does not apply; if not to be distinguished, nothing of authority can result from two cases decided by the same court in opposition to each other.

To dispose, therefore, of the whole subject of authority, it appears to me that though these cases as cited have afforded much matter for observation and argument, they furnish nothing like authority when correctly considered, and in a judicial sense. A word or two only, before quitting this part of the subject, on what has been much relied on as applied to the objection of the fifteen days, namely, the general prevalence of such leases to be taken as extending, it is said, the sense of the Profession, and the mischief that will result from now holding the objection good. I allow to these topics their weight, and much weight undoubtedly belongs to them; but if, when strictly examined, the practice proves to have crept in against principle, and is not pretended to depend upon any positive authority, I can only say, that being bound [424] to look at the objection now that it is made, I must decide upon principle; and if principle and practice are at variance practice must give way; and in this case, as in others, if the mischief be extensive, the proper remedy, if such there be, must be sought for and applied elsewhere. This however at most confines itself to the objection as to the fifteen days; for with respect to the clause of distress, it is not pretended to have any usage or practice in its favour; and the only decided case is directly the other way. And with respect to practice, the extension as to the fifteen days operating, I admit, in proportion to length of time and number of leases, becomes for this very reason, and in the same proportion, stronger against the clause as to distress, inasmuch as in all such leases no such clause is to be found; and my brother Holroyd, to whose labour of research and solidity of learning we are all of us, at all times, so much indebted, has informed your Lordships, that on an accurate research he has not been able to find in the books of precedents beyond one instance of such a lease, and that not appearing to be adopted in common use. Practice is therefore not only wanting in its favour, but practice is the other way; and in this respect practice and decision go hand in hand.

I come now to consider the case on principle. And first, I admit, that if the power is to be deemed indefinite as to time, and therefore to be exercised in a reasonable manner, leaving it to the discretion of the party by whom it is to be executed to decide what is reasonable, it does not appear to me that the giving fifteen days in the way in which they are [425] given can be considered as unreasonable. In truth, I deem it quite immaterial to any real interest of the parties, or as to any substantial effect, whether 20s. are to be paid by the one and received by the other fifteen days sooner or later; and so I apprehend the party might have thought had his attention been drawn to the point. But when I am told of what the party really intended, as of an independent and substantive intention, collateral to the instrument itself, pre-existent, and having caused the power to be framed precisely as it is, I can only say I take the probability to be, if we could look to the mere matter of fact, that the party himself never entertained a precise intention of any sort on the occasion. The substantial purposes were to be accomplished; the detail of execution was of course left to others; and this may account for the difficulty that has arisen. Drawn as the power is, it was probably supposed by professional persons that the former leases might be looked at, and the clause in question being found there was adopted, and I agree reasonably adopted, if such leases were to govern or might govern; but whether so or not is one of the questions in this cause, and which, if decided in the affirmative, would support the lease as far as this objection goes, though, decided the other way, the case will still depend on the other general grounds, and the lease may notwithstanding be valid. Fifteen days therefore, if time might be given, I should consider as not unreasonably given.

In like manner as to the clause of distress, I see no actual injury as likely to result from it in this particular case. I agree with several of the learned [426] Judges that it is not likely that 20s. of half-yearly rent would be suffered, if demanded, to remain in arrear; or if in arrear, that in the case of leases upon fines a distress to the value of 20s. would not be found. But this is a way of trying the question precluded by the very nature of the question itself. The providing for a particular event not only pre-supposes the possibility but even the actual occurrence of such event; it pre-supposes to provide for it; it anticipates and adapts itself to it.

The question therefore arises on what the parties have said and done, not on the reasonableness of doing it, or on the sufficiency or insufficiency, the weight and value, which we are not at liberty to consider; and therefore without looking out of the instrument, but to the instrument, and searching in it for the intent to be collected from what is there expressed, if sufficiently expressed, in other words, treating the question as your Lordships desire us to treat it, that is, as a question of construction arising on the instrument such as it is,—what is the legal effect of the lease compared with the power?

And first, to look to the power, (agreeing, as I do, that the intention of the party must govern,) as to be collected from the whole instrument. It directs a clause of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, and this merely; nothing is said as to time, nothing as to distress: nothing as to reasonable, nothing as to usual: nothing that refers to any former lease or leases in any way whatever, so as to furnish a rule, though reasonable and usual, ancient and accustomed, are terms to be found as words of reference in several parts of the instrument, directly connecting [427] themselves with former leases and for various objects and purposes.

First then as to time. That time may be as properly fixed by the occurrence of an event as by the express specification of time can scarcely be denied: and when rent is made payable on a particular day, connected with a clause of re-entry for rent not paid, I can only understand not paid on the day when payable. In this there is nothing ambiguous, nothing deficient, nothing to be implied to complete what is expressed. Nor has it been argued, that if the lease had been drawn in the very terms of the power it would not have been a proper execution of the power. But it is said in the same instrument twenty-eight days are given for payment on the leases at rack-rent, being a substantial and heavy rent, before forfeiture can attach for non-payment: and it is argued,—Could the party intend a provision so preposterous and harsh as that forfeiture should become the immediate consequence of a half-yearly rent of 20s. falling into arrear! To which I answer, that this suggestion of harshness appears to me to be imagination, and nothing more: for what of real harshness is there in making an estate liable to forfeiture upon nonpayment of a sum so small, as from its very smallness not to require time to be given to pay it! Fifteen days were scarcely necessary to put a party into condition to pay 20s.! And further why the party to receive could not judge if time were to be given as to the fifteen days as well as to the twenty-eight, I am altogether at a loss to conceive. If at liberty, therefore, to conjecture as to intent, independent of the words made [428] use of, my conjecture would be, that the party himself meant nothing as to the fifteen days beyond what he has said: that he meant only what he has said, and still less, if possible. Can I suppose that he actually meant time to be given, intentionally avoiding to decide what that time should be, and this merely to leave it open to the discretion of another to decide for him what he could just as well have decided for himself! In the particular case time may be of no moment any way: but as applying to future cases, and involving principles applicable to the construction of all instruments, it becomes of real magnitude and importance. It is not in the operation of the clause, as it applies to the lease, treated as a valid lease, that any difficulty arises, but in the application of the lease to the power, with a view to the validity of the lease.

But I go farther, and will suppose the question to be, whether the power should not be so construed as to imply a reasonable discretion to have been intended as to time. In such event, it has been asked who is to construe what would be reasonable time! Now, passing by all the difficulties that may arise in this respect, I am willing to answer— the competent tribunal according to the nature of the case. But which, according to the case, is the competent tribunal! This becomes a question. On the trial of this ejectment was it the Jury or the Judge! and though, in the result, which of the two might be ascertained, yet the result could only be got at through, as now, a doubtful controversy: and this uncertainty as to tribunal, with the additional uncertainty as to result, that result depending on the un- [429] certainty of opinion, which may be different with different men, and of which these proceedings have in every stage afforded ample proof, and, this day in particular, a striking instance, are all inconveniences introduced by holding the power to be indefinite, and would have been avoided by framing the lease in the words of the power. One way it would be certain: the other opens at least to question: and it is this substitution of uncertainty for certainty, this rule of discretion, which throws open the gate to litigation, that would otherwise be closed and fastened against it, that constitutes my fundamental objection so to understand and so to construe this power. If therefore the question be, whether reasonable or not should be implied, I should hold that it ought not to be implied, even if we were at liberty to imply it framed as the power is.

I come now to the second objection: and though in one light it is the most material, yet it will not be necessary in this late stage of the proceedings to discuss it at any length: I mean restraining the right to re-enter to there being no sufficient distress to be found on the premises. And with respect to this, all I have hitherto said as to time applies with increase of force. It is a further clog, not warranted by the original power, and it is one which, as to possible injury, does not rest in speculation merely. The case so often referred to in the Exchequer forms a practical comment. When resorted to as a remedy it shows the wrong which may result. The lessor of the plaintiff failed because some obscure corner of the premises had not been searched. That case is this: and in a similar proceeding the effect would [430] have been or would be the same. To the validity of this objection Core v. Day is in point. It is so, I conceive, in the decision; it is so beyond all doubt, as I apprehend, from what is said by Lord Ellenborough throughout the whole case. Whether to be fairly distinguished or not, in any respect, I have already examined, and will not repeat. The argument drawn from the statute, and the general nature of such a clause considered as a mere security for rent, was brought forward then, as now, but was mentioned only to be over-ruled, the point not appearing to the Court to be sufficiently tenable to admit of discussion.

To one or two other points I shall now barely advert. I can scarcely think that the question can be reduced to one of mere verbal consideration. But if so, I cannot myself feel the difference between "on" and "for;" "for nonpayment of rent," I consider to be equivalent to "on nonpayment of rent;" though I have no hesitation in admitting that "on" and "for" may be sometimes different and sometimes synonymous, and this depending on the context and the subject-matter. But looking at the subject-matter, and taking the whole of this instrument into consideration, I think there is no reason for distinguishing on the present occasion. In like manner, as to the term "beneficial," I conceive it to refer to the lessor or the remainder-man, and not to the lessee; and so understood, if there be any weight in the observations I have hitherto made, such a reservation would be less beneficial to the lessor than the direct clause unlogged with any conditions as to time or distress. [431] Taking, further, the words of the power to apply to former reservations, and that with this view former leases might be looked at, it seems to me the argument turns the other way. The power directs that there be reserved the ancient and accustomed rents, or as great or beneficial rents, duties, and services, thereby letting in, I admit, the former leases as evidence of what rent was ancient and accustomed; and so as to duties and services; but following up these general words with special and particular words, showing the powers were not intended to include the clause as to re-entry, particular words specially providing for this right, and in terms directing how it shall be reserved: and having mentioned former leases as admissible in these respects, I will only further say I think they were not admissible, except for the purposes as to which they expressly, or by necessary implication, refer. This is indeed a necessary consequence of all I have already said, and without therefore going at large into the wide field which the argument in this respect has occupied, but referring generally to the opinions and reasoning of those who think as I do, I will merely state the broad ground of my opinion, which is, that there being no ambiguity of any kind, nor any words of reference to any other or former leases as connected with this subject, nor any generality of expression, so as to let in extrinsic evidence to restrain or qualify or to exclude, but a clear, specific, and definite sense and meaning, such evidence is not admissible. This conclusion, it will be admitted, must follow if the premises are well founded, but whether so or not [432] depends, as far as my opinion goes, on the validity of the general grounds on which that opinion rests, and of which it is for your Lordships to judge.

Abbott, C. J. I am of opinion that the demise of the 5th September 1803, is not invalid.

The objection upon which it is now sought to avoid the lease is, that the clause of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent is not such as is required by the settlement: and this for two reasons. First, because it allows to the tenant fifteen days for payment beyond the days mentioned in the lease: and secondly, because it is restricted to instances wherein no sufficient distress or distresses can or may be had or taken upon the premises, whereby the same, and all arrearages thereof, if any be, may be fully raised, levied, and paid.

This objection is strictissimi juris, and as such is by no means to be favoured: though if the strictissimum jus be found upon due consideration to be with the objector a court of law is bound to yield to his objection. As I have already intimated I think the right is not with the objector.

In the course of the argument your Lordships attention was called to a supposed distinction in the construction of powers, between such as are created by the owner of the inheritance limiting a partial estate to himself, and to be exercised by himself as owner of such partial estate, and such as are created by the owner of the inheritance to be exercised by a stranger, to whom he may have limited a partial estate, or to whom he may have given the power as [433] a naked power, unconnected with any estate in the land. Such a distinction appears inapplicable to the present case, because the owner of the inheritance has here limited a partial estate, first to a stranger, and secondly to herself; and the words of the power must have the same meaning, whether the question had arisen upon an execution thereof by the stranger or by herself.

It was also argued, that the power of leasing being for the benefit of the tenant for life, the qualifications and restrictions imposed upon the exercise of the power are for the benefit of the remainder-man; and therefore that the clauses of qualification and restriction are to be construed most beneficially for the latter. This point also appears to have little weight in the present case; because, advertng to the amount of the fine paid upon the surrender of an existing lease, and to the amount of the rent reserved, I think it cannot be supposed that the purchaser of the present lease would have given one farthing less if the clause of re-entry had been strictly confined to nonpayment of the rent at the very day; or that the estate of the remainder-man would now be worth one farthing more if the lease in question had contained a clause to that effect, instead of the clause upon which these objections have arisen.

And being of opinion that the tenant for life could derive no benefit, and that the remainder-man sustains no prejudice as to the value of his interest, from the form in which the clause of re-entry is found in this lease, I think a court of law may reasonably regard the interest of the tenant, the purchaser of the lease, and put such a reasonable and liberal con-[434]-struction upon the words of the power in the settlement as will give effect to the lease, rather than yield to critical forms and subtle objections adduced for the purpose of defeating it. And this becomes the more important, if it be true, as has been suggested, that very many leases are in existence containing clauses similar to the present, and demised from powers expressed in language similar to that of the power from which this lease was derived. Considerations of this nature certainly ought not to control or vary the sense of plain and unambiguous words; but they may be reasonably entertained for the construction of words of doubtful import: not merely by reason of the consequences of a decision in a particular case affecting numerous other cases of the like nature, but because the fact suggested is evidence of the general opinion entertained by professional men upon the meaning of the words of a legal instrument.

These words, in the present case, are "a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent to be thereby reserved." And the first question is, whether these words may be understood to mean a reasonable power, or must be confined to a power which the landlord may exercise if the rent be not paid at the very day, and without regard to any property to be found on the demised premises, upon which he may levy his rent, and thereby compensate himself at his tenant's expense for his tenant's neglect.

If the words may be understood to mean a reasonable power, the only remaining question will be, whether the power of re-entry contained in this [435] lease be a reasonable power. I shall proceed in the first place to show, that in my opinion the words in question may be understood to mean a reasonable power. Nonpayment is a mere neglect or default, and if the words "a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent" are to be taken strictly and ad litteram, they will import a power of re-entry for the mere neglect or default of the tenant; but this cannot possibly be their legal import or effect, because by the common law of England a landlord never could enter for the mere neglect or default of his tenant in this respect under any power or clause in whatsoever language expressed. Some act is always required to be done by the landlord in order to entitle himself to exercise his power, and this is required to prevent the tenant from being surprized or injured. This act at the common law was an actual demand of the rent on the part of the landlord. And the common law required this demand to be in a most precise and peculiar manner. It was to be made just at the close of the last day of payment (allowing the tenant the whole day to prepare his money) at the time when so much day-light remained as might be sufficient to view and count the money, and no more. It was to be made at the door of the demised messuage, if any on the premises, and if none, then at such usual and notorious place of resort where the tenant might reasonably be expected to be found, if he was not altogether absent; and it was to be of the precise sum then accruing due, not including any former arrears, all of which, although due and recoverable by distress or action, were considered as waived by the landlord [436] on a question of forfeiture by his prior neglect to demand or enter for them.

Then if the words of the power, or rather of the qualification of the power contained in the settlement, cannot receive a literal construction, and be held to apply to a case of neglect or default only according to their literal purport, they must receive some other and different construction, which must in my opinion be a reasonable construction, and a construction properly suited to the object and purpose in view; that is, to secure and enforce the payment of the rent, so that on the one hand the tenant may not hold the land without payment to the prejudice of the landlord, nor on the other hand, be dispossessed of it, if either himself or the land, which is emphatically said to be debtor for rent, presents payment, or the means of payment, without unreasonable delay or prejudice to the landlord.

It has been objected however, that if the literal or strict meaning of the words be not adopted no other meaning can be, because, as it was said, courts of law cannot say what is a reasonable power or clause of re-entry. But I conceive that in this as in all other cases courts of law can find out what is reasonable, and that in some cases they are absolutely required to do so. In many cases of a general nature or prevailing usage the Judges may be able to decide the point of themselves: in others, which may depend upon particular facts and circumstances, the assistance of a jury may be requisite, and wherever such assistance is requisite there are ready modes of obtaining it. I will mention one instance in which courts of law are required by the Legislature [437] to discover and decide, if the point be litigated, a question upon the reasonable execution of a power. By the general inclosure act (41 Geo. III. c. 109, s. 38) a rector or vicar is enabled to lease his allotment under certain restrictions mentioned in the act, and among others, so that there be inserted in the lease, "power of re-entry on non-payment of the rent or rents to be thereby reserved within a reasonable time to be therein limited after the same shall become due." A lease of such an allotment must therefore provide, that if the rent be unpaid for some specified number of days or weeks after the day of reservation, the rector or vicar may re-enter; and if any question should arise, whether the number of days specified in a particular lease be or be not a reasonable time, the courts of law must necessarily find some mode of deciding the question.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the words of the clause in question may and ought to be understood to mean a reasonable power of re-entry. And taking this to be the legitimate meaning of the words, I proceed to show that in my opinion the power of re-entry contained in the particular instance of the lease in question is a reasonable power. Usage is of great weight in considering what is reasonable; and it cannot be denied that the power of re-entry, as expressed in this lease, is in form and substance such as was frequently found in leases before the execution of the settlement by Louisa Barbara Mansel, which was in 1757. This is a fact which must be in the knowledge of some of your Lordships, without recurring to the special verdict [438] for information as to the leases of this particular estate. If any space of time could be allowed beyond the days of payment prescribed in the reservation, the space of fifteen days, which is the period allowed in the present lease, will not I am persuaded be thought an unreasonable space of time. Indeed, although this objection was pointed out, it was not so much insisted upon, nor could be in the construction of a settlement allowing twenty-eight days for payment in leases to be made at a rack-rent. The main stress of the argument was applied to that part of the clause in the lease which narrows the power of re-entry to cases wherein no sufficient distress can or may be had and taken upon the premises, whereby the rents and services, and all arrearsages thereof, may be fully raised, levied, and paid.

Upon this part of the argument the case of Core v. Day (13 East, 118) was quoted and relied upon. It has however been discovered that the decision in that case is contrary to a prior decision of the Court of King's Bench in a case of Hotley v. Scot, reported in Lofft, and of which a more correct manuscript note was also cited. This earlier case was unknown to the counsel by whom Care v. Day was argued, and probably to the Court also; so that the decision of Care v. Day is not wholly free from question as to its own particular circumstances. It was certainly not thought applicable to the present case by the two surviving Judges of the Court when the present case was before them; and it is distinguishable from this by the difference of the language of the clause [439] upon which it arose. For in that case the words of the clause were not general, as in the present, "a power of re-entry for nonpayment of the rent," but special, "a power of re-entry, if the rent be behind for the space of twenty-one days," which words do not so easily admit the introduction of any other qualification or matter as the general words of the present clause; so that upon the whole the case of Care v. Day does not appear to contain a decision precisely in point to the present case. And therefore in respect of authority the question still appears to be left open,—whether in the absence of any words denoting a contrary intention in the mind of the framer of the clause, a restriction of the right or power of re-entry to the absence of a sufficient distress be a reasonable restriction in a lease like the present; for if it be, then a right or power so restrained is a reasonable right or power of re-entry, and the introduction of such a right or power into the present lease is a good execution of the leasing power contained in the settlement.

Such a restriction of the right had prevailed in practice before the execution of this settlement in 1757. It was known and in use, though probably less general or frequent before passing the statute 4 Geo. II. (C. 28, s. 2) in 1731. If the effect of that statute be (as at least one very learned person has thought) to alter entirely the common law, and to take away the right of re-entry under any circumstances of demand and refusal of the rent, where a sufficient distress can be found, then certainly the express introduction of the words of restriction cannot invalidate the lease, [440] because it is only an expression of a matter tacitly contained and implied by operation of law. But supposing the statute not to have this effect, still in my opinion the restriction is reasonable in itself in a case like the present. The instances of proceeding at the common law by demand of the rent since the statute was passed are very few: the proceeding is in itself troublesome and difficult, as will appear by the circumstances required, which I have already mentioned: it was indeed so troublesome and difficult, and found to be attended with so little benefit to landlords, that the statute was passed for their relief, substituting the absence of distress in the place of demand. Can it then be said that the reversioner is unreasonably restrained or prejudiced by the introduction of a matter which the Legislature has thought generally beneficial to landlords, and which in all probability he himself would have adopted, even if the terms of the lease had been such as to have allowed him to act otherwise? I say that in all probability he would have adopted it, because I presume his only wish, like that of every other reasonable person, must be to obtain the payment of his rent in the most easy and speedy manner. And whatever difficulty there may be in viewing a messuage or farm, so as to ascertain whether sufficient be found upon it to answer the arrears of a rent, bearing, as in this case, a very small proportion to the annual value of the tenement, still I have the authority of the Legislature, and of the experience upon which the statute was founded, for saying that this difficulty is less in practice than the difficulty of making such a demand as would authorize a reentry [441] at the common law. If any thing more be desired by the reversioner than a speedy and easy mode of securing and enforcing the payment of the reserved rent, I should say that he desires more than the framer of the settlement intended to give, and more than the law ought reasonably to allow. The power of re-entry, in whatever words it be expressed, can be exercised only in one of two modes: that is, either by making a demand at the common law, without regarding the value of distrainable goods on the premises, or by ascertaining that no sufficient goods are to be found on the premises, without regarding a demand of payment. For the reasons already given I think the latter must be considered as the most effectual and beneficial mode, and therefore, speaking generally of cases of this nature, I can discover no reason for resorting to the former, except a hope (certainly not entertained in this particular case) that the tenant, being taken by surprise, and not expecting a demand, may not be prepared for immediate payment of money, and a desire to take advantage of his want of preparation and deprive him of the residue of his term or harass him with a law-suit. To such a motive a court of law will never lend its aid. And a construction calculated to give effect to such a motive would be contrary to the general principles of the law. And it ought not to be omitted that the present question arises upon the construction of that part of a leasing power which is intended to create a forfeiture of the lease executed under the power. It is said in our books that forfeitures are odious in the law, and this is the reason assigned for requiring so much formality and [442] precision in the demand of the rent at the common law. And for the same reason, in addition to all others, I think such a construction ought to be put upon the words of the settlement as will tend rather to the exclusion than to the introduction of forfeitures of the leases to be granted under it.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the demise of the 5th September, 1803, is not invalid.

The Lord Chancellor. The question which is now brought before your Lordships for decision is undoubtedly a question of very great importance to the parties. We have to determine upon the validity of a particular lease, which is stated in the special verdict. The decision upon that lease however will not only give validity or invalidity with respect to the lease in question, but, as we have been informed upon the argument at the bar, will give validity or invalidity to the leases of a very considerable property. The plaintiff therefore has a great interest in your decision. The tenants of course have a very considerable interest in your decision; but the interest in your decision is not confined to the landlord and the tenants in this case, because I apprehend that if these leases are invalid, the tenants in this case, probably, as in a case from another part of the united kingdom, I mean the case of the Queensberry leases [5 Dow 293], will have a title to recover against the assets of the deceased lessor the value of the interest in the lease, if the decision should be against the validity; but however great the interest of any of these parties may be, it is most for the [443] public interest that you should take care to decide rightly.

If I could foresee that by asking for further time I might alter that opinion which it is my duty to inform you I have long entertained upon the question now before you, or if I could, consistently with my other important engagements and duties, hope to find time to lay down the statements which I am now about to make with more method, I should certainly wish your Lordships to delay hearing what I have to say on this subject. If I could hope to relieve myself from the pain which I do most sincerely feel in maintaining an opinion upon this subject different from that which has been expressed by persons for whose learning and abilities I entertain the greatest respect, I should for that reason also endeavour to press your Lordships to delay hearing what I have to offer.

I must confess, that, from the habits of my professional life, I felt at first considerable surprise indeed how it could be that upon some of the questions agitated in this House there could be any difference of opinion any where. With respect to the authorities, you have heard observations which are perhaps much more apt than any I could presume to offer to your attention upon the conflicting cases of Hotley v. Scot and Core v. Day, and the negative authority of the case before L. C. J. Willes, who I believe was a very great lawyer. Those authorities, I hope I shall not be thought to treat with any disrespect, which certainly I do not mean, when I avail myself of what has fallen from the two learned Chief Justices in their observations on [444] Core v. Day. If Core v. Day is an authority one way, Hotley v. Scot is an authority the other way; and the judgment of two of the Judges in the court below on this very case conflicts with the case of Core v. Day. But such have been the habits of my professional life that I cannot think that we have attended to all the authority which deserves consideration. That the practice of conveyancers amounts to a very considerable authority on this subject I am justified in saying, by the opinions of the greatest lawyers in Westminster Hall, who I am persuaded, in many instances, would have come to a different decision from that which they thought proper to adopt, if they had not taken notice of the practice of conveyancers. But upon this subject I take the liberty, with very great respect, to intimate an opinion, that upon cases of this nature it might not be much amiss if courts of law would inquire a little more what has been done in courts of equity, for the purpose of knowing how far Judges who have sat in courts of equity have determined the legal point before they have applied themselves to those directions, and decrees, and orders which they are daily in the habit of pronouncing. Between the year 1772 and a period approaching the year 1780, I spent many of the most profitable years of my life in the office of a conveyancer, and I was led at that time to a knowledge not only of the practice, but of what were the sentiments of the great conveyancers of those days; and I am sure it never would have occurred to any one of them, if there was a leasing power in any marriage settlement requiring such a power as this, [445] that to give the time of fifteen or twenty days was making the execution of the power invalid. I am sure all practice was the other way, and practice in this respect is evidence of what is reasonable.

But it does not rest there, because you have to consider the question as applied to marriage-settlements which are framed in different ways. You have marriage-settlements where an estate for life is granted to A, with remainder to the wife for her life, with an interposition of trustees to preserve contingent remainders before the limitations to the issue. In some settlements there is a power to the tenant for life to make leases, which is given not only for the benefit of the tenant for life, but it is a power which you are permitted to insert in the settlement for the purpose of the due cultivation and management of that estate which they are first to enjoy, and others after them; but that power of leasing in a well-framed settlement is not merely given to the tenants for life, but frequently to the trustees, while there are infants who do not as yet take an interest entitled to the benefit of it, but who are not capable of managing the estate. Suppose the father and the mother to die, and then there being trustees to preserve contingent remainders, it becomes necessary to make leases. Or suppose that a settlement is made, in which the legal estate of inheritance, the legal fee, is entirely vested in the trustees; where therefore a legal lease cannot be made by the equitable tenant for life, nor the remainder-man, nor the issue, but during the infancy, it may be made by the trustees. In both those cases it frequently happens that the trustees in the one case to preserve contingent remainders, in the other [446] case the trustees of the inheritance are called on to make leases, and in most of those settlements there is no mention of the period of forbearance which shall be given; some do, but there is an infinite majority which do not mention any days at all. I venture to say this as matter of my own knowledge. The practice as to leases made by such trustees would, I say, of itself form a weighty consideration here; but in leases of that kind, made under such powers by the authority of the Court of Chancery, you must permit me, for my predecessors and successors, though not for myself, to say, in every one of those cases there is an authority of law that that is a due execution of the power, because the Chancellor has no right to direct such a lease to be made, if when it is executed it is not according to the power; he is a judge of law and equity, and when he has determined as a judge of law that such is a due execution of the power, then and then only has he authority, according to the constitution of this country, to direct any such trustees to make such leases. I should be glad then to know whether the constant practice of that court is not to be looked at as a practice fixing what is the legal construction of such a power to lease.

It does not rest there; for in the case put by one learned Judge, suppose the tenant for life here had agreed with this occupying tenant to make him a lease, with a power of re-entry giving such an extension of time, and then the tenant had filed a bill in equity to compel him to make a lease according to the agreement. No Chancellor could possibly have directed a lease to be made with fifteen days time in case of a nonpayment of rent, unless he was satisfied [447] according to law that would be a due execution of the power; he could not have done it in the numerous cases in which there have been such decrees made. I disclaim, for those who have gone before me, and those who are to come after me, the charge that it was not done upon the authority of cases which have at least as much, if not a great deal more, authority than those which have been stated.

Suppose the case where commons are divided under the General Inclosure Act (11 Geo. 3, c. 109, sec. 38). There are certain persons having a portion of those commons, who though perhaps seised of a large property yet only have an enjoyment for lives, I mean parsons and vicars. A parson or vicar under the inclosure act is authorized to make leases in which there must be a power of reentry within a reasonable time. We have acted under that general inclosure act ever since it passed. Parsons and vicars have been making leases ever since; and I believe you will find that the universal practice has been to give days in the manner days are given in this lease. It is truly said, that is within reasonable time which is authorized. But I should be very glad to know what difficulty there can be in courts of justice deciding what forms reasonable time, when the Legislature has expressly said all these leases shall be made with allowance of a reasonable time. In the very parish in which parson and vicar have this sort of power there may be fifty tenants for life for successive estates in land. In such a case the course of proceeding is, that the allotments are to be enjoyed [448] according to the limitations of the settlement of that land in respect of which they are made. What is the consequence? The consequence is, that the power of leasing in the settlements under which those respective persons (lay persons, not ecclesiastical persons) are made tenants for life, apply themselves to the whole of the lands after the allotment is made; and a most singular thing it would be to say that fourteen or fifteen days is a reasonable time for a power of re-entry for a parson or vicar, but a direct breach of all that is reasonable with respect to the tenant for life claiming under a settlement, which settlement has a new object to operate upon in the allotment made under that very act of inclosure. I say therefore, as to this case, that if it does not stand on peculiarities in this settlement, there is a weighty authority to be found in practice of long endurance, which I will venture to say would make your decision one of the most mischievous that ever was pronounced in this House, if you were to decide against such practice.

But I think we may lay out of the question the authority of practice. I proceed to comment upon the terms of this settlement, taking it for granted that it is understood on all sides that this special verdict completely finds every thing that ought to be found. I put that upon the understanding of the parties. We have had in the course of argument at the bar a great deal of discussion upon the admissibility of extrinsic evidence. Now, with reference to extrinsic evidence, my humble opinion is, that this is a case in which you must admit some extrinsic evidence; you ought not to admit [449] any extrinsic evidence which falls within the range of the principle, which says that you must construe instruments by what is to be found within the four corners of them, generally speaking; but it is impossible, in my judgment, in this case, for the reasons I have stated, that you can come to a conclusion without looking at a great deal more than the lease itself; because, when you are considering the question whether the lease is conformable to a power in another instrument, you must look into that instrument which contains the power, and if you must look into that instrument which contains the power, then, in order to get at the true construction of the power itself, you must look at every part of that instrument; and if the instrument which contains the power be referred to by the instrument which is the execution of the power; if the instrument which contains the power also refers you to other instruments, which you must look at, as appears upon the face of the instrument which contains the power, for the construction of the power, you must then look at other instruments to see the meaning of the power.

I think in this case you might state it thus:—Here were leases made prior to 1757: the settlement refers to existing leases at the time when the new instrument is made, it refers in that part of it which gives the power of making future leases to the existing leases. I do not carry it so far as to say you shall go back to a great length of time to see what were the habits of leasing prior to those existing leases, but I say you must go to those existing leases, or it is impossible to collect [450] what the meaning of that power is. I say also, that if the instrument in which the power is contained shows what was the nature of the estates that the persons had who were making that settlement in which the power of leasing is contained, you cannot shut your eyes against that part of the instrument which shows what was the nature of the estates.

With these general observations I call your attention to what this case is. A lady, named Louisa Barbara Mansel, afterwards Louisa Barbara Vernon, was tenant for life of the estates, with several remainders over. The will under which she claimed as tenant contained a power to her in consideration of marriage, either before or after marriage, of revocation and appointment, as afterwards pursued by her in the deed of settlement. The special verdict states, that upon the 20th of July 1757 she intermarried with Mr. Vernon; that before the marriage, upon the 2d of July 1757, she by her deed revoked the uses and devises contained in the said will concerning the said premises, and appointed and limited the same to Francis Earl of Guildford, and Charles Montague, and their heirs, in trust, to hold the same to the same uses as before limited, until after the said marriage, and then to the uses of the said George Venables Vernon for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to the said Louisa Barbara for life, without impeachment of waste, and in the mean time to the said Francis Earl of Guildford, and Charles Montague, and their heirs, to preserve contingent remainders, and to permit the said George, during his life, and afterwards the said Louisa Barbara, during her life, to [451] take the rents, etc. and after the decease of the survivor of them, to divers other uses for the benefit of their issue, and in default of issue to the use of the will of the said Louisa Barbara, and subject to the powers and limitations to be thereby directed and appointed, and in the mean time to the use of the said Louisa Barbara, her heirs and assigns for ever. And then follows the clause upon which this question principally arises.

Before I state that clause I will mention another head of authority, which I confess has disturbed me a good deal with respect to these fifteen days. By a statute (43 Geo. 3, c. 75, sec. 3 and 4) made some years ago the Legislature empowered the committees of lunatics, by authority of the Court of Chancery, where those lunatics were tenants for life, with powers of leasing, to make such leases as the tenants would have made if they had been of sane mind; and I never had the least doubt, in consequence of the habits of my professional life, in directing them to make leases with this ordinary reservation of fourteen or fifteen days, with respect to the time of forfeiting the estate. I certainly did, however, think it right, in deference to the opinions which I understood had been stated in the Exchequer Chamber, to check myself in that practice, and to take care that that habit should no longer be acted on. So, if a parson or vicar should be a lunatic, who had an allotment under an inclosure act, and it should become necessary for the Court to act, I should have directed the execution of the power in a similar manner.

Where a power of this sort is given in a marriage-settlement it is part of the contract which all the parties in the marriage-settlement are understood to enter into with respect to each other; it is for that reason to be construed in questions between the parties to the settlement and those taking under it according to the intention of the parties. In a question, between a landlord for the time being and a tenant, I apprehend the landlord for the time being is to be considered, in an instrument of this kind, as acting on the behalf of all the parties who have interest in the inheritance of the estate; and that therefore there must be that bona fides on his part with respect to the tenants which would be required in other cases, and upon a question of forfeiture, if the parties really are dealing bona fide according to what they conceive to be the intention of the parties, (not misconceiving that intention, which would vitiate the lease;) but if a fair construction will authorize you to say they have not misconceived it, you are not to look astutely to defeat it.

In this case there were three species of estates of which leases were to be made: one of these estates, as I understand, usually demised for lives upon payment of a fine, which payment of a fine is in truth a great portion of the consideration which is paid for such leases; and the small annual rents and other services, though of some value positively speaking, are of little value compared with that other part of the consideration; they are a sort of rental, which is rather from time to time calculating a small sum of money off the value, than paying any part of the value of the estate. The next species of lands are lands to [453] be let at rack-rent for years absolute, and with reference to them it is very easy to reserve a power of re-entry; and the third is of mines; with regard to which, unless conveyancers are more able at this time of day than some of the old ones used to be in the last century, it would be difficult to find out what sort of power of re-entry you could apply to it; they are therefore in general obliged to content themselves with alluding to proper and reasonable modes of working the mines.

The condition to which we are particularly to attend is this; "and so as there be contained in every such respective lease, demise, or grant; and so as on every such respective lease, demise, or grant for a life or lives, or for years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives, there be reserved and made payable, during the continuance of the estates and interests thereby to be demised, leased or granted respectively, the ancient and accustomed yearly rents, duties, and services, or more, or as great or beneficial rents, duties, and services, or more, as now are, or at the time of demising or granting the premises so to be demised, leased, or granted respectively, were reserved or made payable for or in respect of the same premises respectively, or a just proportion of such ancient or the present reserved rents, duties, and services, or more, according to the value of the premises so to be demised, leased, or granted respectively;" and then come the exceptions with respect to the heriots, and the usual clause, that these were to be for the benefit of the persons entitled from time to time. [454] Now, let us suppose ourselves sitting down to make a new lease of these premises after the year 1757, of premises which in the year 1757 were held under a then existing lease, addressing ourselves to the execution of that power. Is it possible to deny, that in order to see how the power is to be executed you must look at that existing lease which is the lease immediately preceding that which you are to execute? I do not carry it farther; I do not enter into the question whether you are to go back into the more remote periods of time and see what was the habit in all times past; but I say you are bound to receive the evidence to which the language of the power refers you; and you are bound to receive the evidence of the deed containing the power. If you mean to demise the lands according to the ancient and accustomed rent you must go to former leases to know what it is; so as to the duties and services. It is not necessary they should be the same yearly rents, duties, and services, or more, but they may be as great or beneficial rents. I have no difficulty in saying, that under this clause you might reserve as great a rent, or as beneficial rents. I have a right to look at this word "or" as being of some signification. I find in other parts of the lease as great and beneficial. This is to be as great or beneficial; and I cannot help expressing the opinion, that I entertain a very considerable doubt whether, if this clause as to the distress had not been contained in the new lease, the new lease for that reason would not have been bad.

If it be argued, that demising for a rent of £2, [455] and instead of reserving a power of re-entry for the nonpayment of the rent, in the sense which has been put on the words, reserving a power of re-entry on nonpayment of the rent for fifteen days, that you thereby affect, though in a small degree (and I agree entirely with what the Lord Chief Justice says, that it is not the degree, if you affect) the principle on which you ought to act; I answer if this power authorizes me to make a lease, provided the rent is as beneficial, if I demise upon the same rent, in the same way, do not I reserve as beneficial a rent as formerly. The stress laid on these words would go a great way to convince those who consider what the case would have been if there had been no such words; the former leases having that power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, would not this power have been the same in construction whether those words formed part of the instrument or not, because without that power of re-entry the rent would not be so beneficial as under the former leases.

Then, come these words, and let us suppose that they are necessary: "and so as there be contained in every such lease a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent thereby to be reserved;" and this occurs in an instrument, where with respect to property upon which the best and most improved yearly rent was to be reserved, and where, with respect to that rent which was to be so reserved a rent which was de anno in annum, and from half year to half year, rendering to the landlord the value of the enjoyment for those periods by the [456] tenant, the authors of this settlement say that in such a case as that there shall be nonpayment allowed for twenty-eight days.

I take it now upon the first objection as to the fifteen days; and I should be very glad to ask whether a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent in fifteen days is not a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent? No man can deny to me that it is a power of re-entry; no man can deny that it is a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent. It is not the same power as it would be if it was twenty days, or twenty-five days, but still it is a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent; and where are the words on which the parties insist there shall be an unconditional power of re-entry for non-payment of rent. They have said no such thing.

Now, to recur again to the impression that old habits make on one's mind, it would have appeared to me, previous to the agitation of this case, one of the most astonishing things, having had a good deal to do with decisions at law, that where powers are so generally expressed as to leave it in the party to say this is a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, that these words generally expressed, considering the practice, are to be an actual execution of the power: it would be most astonishing to me, that if there was a lease to be made, the lessor could insist it should be no lease, but a lease giving a power of re-entry at the day. I should say that was contrary to the habit and usage of a Court of Equity. Speaking from that [457] habit and usage, the language of the law, before it made any order or decree, the Court ought to decree in favour of the tenant if he were willing to execute a lease upon a reasonable period of days for the nonpayment of the rent; and I cannot help thinking that from the circumstance of pointing out the twenty-eight days in the other case, you are bound to see a difference between the reservation of a rent which is the actual value from year to year, of the land that is occupied, (as far as a tenant ever pays the actual value;) and where a tenant pays a great fine. It does appear to me that this deed affords sufficient evidence, particularly with reference to the words I have before commented on, that if the rent was as beneficially reserved as in the existing lease, that it is a due execution of the power unquestionably.

But that does not touch the question about distress, I admit, save as it touches the question if the same qualification of distress was in the former lease: because if the same qualification of distress was in the former lease, then the same arguments that you build on giving the period in the former lease applies to giving the distress; but if this means a reasonable power of re-entry, and if that has been the construction usually put on it, it is the same as if the lease was directly conformable to the power. The practice has applied that quality to the reservation of a power; and I know no difference between determining what is reasonable with reference to that object, and what is reasonable as applied to the other objects: when you speak of a reasonable [458] rent, that means the quantum of rent; but a reasonable power admits of different considerations.

I might stop there, because though I cannot agree with the learned Judge, who thinks that the statute of 4 Geo. 2 is imperative, yet it is impossible for me to deny that the statute of 4 Geo. 2, and the General Inclosure Act, and all the practice to which I have been alluding, does establish, beyond all question, that it is a reasonable execution of a power even where this clause of distress is put in; and when we are considering these circumstances let us attend to the extreme importance of the question before us in one respect. You are not merely in the execution of a power to consider what is most beneficial as between A, the tenant for life, and B, the remainder-man, but what is most beneficial to both, and to each with reference to the terms on which tenants are to be procured; and though in this case there is very little difference, perhaps, of convenience or inconvenience to the tenant, whether he is to pay on the day it is reserved, or fifteen days afterwards, yet on the one hand, if there be that little inconvenience, I say that is a ground why if the words of the power contained in the settlement will allow you to give those days, you shall not say that it is a forfeiture of the lease; and on the other hand I say, though the quantum of convenience be ever so small, yet that the principle in deciding these cases requires you to consider, not merely what is for the benefit of a person having an interest in one parcel of the [459] inheritance, but what is for the benefit of the whole inheritance, and all the persons to take in it.

There is another way of putting it, which is material, if I am not wrong in my notions of the practice, if powers are to be executed for the benefit of all persons having an interest in the inheritance, what will be the situation of persons who have those powers is a most serious consideration; and I cannot agree with those who profess to have paid less attention to the state of titles than they ought, because, unless I mistake, nothing requires more attention; so as to what practice has introduced, and what would be the inconvenience of shaking that practice; and you are to consider, too, that unless you are to adopt the principle, that in a settlement where a power is given as nakedly in the terms of it as here, you are to execute that power in the precise terms; that no tenant for life, no trustee, nobody, in short, who has not an absolute inheritance in the estate, will ever think of executing a power without the direction of the Court to tell him whether it is right or wrong; the inconvenience of which would be infinitely great. But I am of opinion that these words are words of course; in the language of Mr. Justice Bayley, (and the diversity of powers is acknowledged in Brook;) that this is an entry for nonpayment of rent; that the words of the settlement do not condemn such a power for re-entry for the nonpayment of rent as is here reserved; and I think the qualifications in this power have had the authority of the Legislature for saying that they are reasonable; and therefore on these grounds I shall offer my opinion that these leases are valid. [460] Whether your Lordships may think proper to adopt that opinion it is not for me to say: it is my duty to express that opinion.

Lord Redesdale: Having attended throughout the discussion of this question, and having from a very early period of life had much converse with that part of the law which enables me more particularly to consider cases of this description, I mean conveyancing, I think it my duty to offer a few words to your consideration.

With respect to what has been said as to general opinions upon the subject, and the practice of conveyancers, I cannot agree with much that has been said, because I do conceive that the law has frequently been decided even in the construction of Acts of Parliament upon what has been the general understanding of lawyers as to the true construction of these Acts of Parliament; and I will instance such a case under the statute of jointure. This House determined in the case of Drury v. Drury * that a rent-charge settled on an infant was within the statute (27 H. 8. c. 10. s. 6) of jointure a good bar of dower, not because such was the literal interpretation of the statute, but because such had been the constant practice of conveyancers and others touching the subject, and it was expressly upon that ground that the decision at that time went; and I do conceive that it is of the utmost importance that the House should use its judgment by such a criterion whenever the case occurs, for otherwise all property must be in [461] hazard. It is more especially so with regard to settlements which are ordinarily prepared by those persons who employ their minds in the construction of deeds, and what persons of that description consider to be the law thus acted upon for a length of time, and not disputed in courts of law, should be taken to be the general impression upon the minds of lawyers upon the particular subject, and more particularly it must have reference to that construction which ought to be put upon settlements prepared by persons of that description. How are you to understand the intent of parties in a settlement which really and truly is as much, I may say, the view which the person who prepared it has upon the subject, as the view of the parties; for the parties to a certain degree are ignorant of the words that are used, unless they are advised by the persons they may consult; and therefore the practice of conveyancers upon subjects of this description is, I conceive, a most important consideration, and whenever that has prevailed for a great length of time without impeachment in a court of justice, I take it it ought to be considered as a true exposition of the law.

I have thought it necessary to say so much upon that part of the case, because I think it would be highly dangerous to treat it in the manner in which it has been treated by a learned Judge, and, with great deference, I cannot agree to what the learned Judge said, because I think that practice is most important to the consideration of the case if you wish to preserve property to persons who are in possession, [462] which may be defeated upon the construction of deeds and instruments, unless you give them that construction which lawyers have constantly put on them, though not conformable to the precise rule, supposing the language to be literally understood.

With respect to the case before you, it appears to me that it is necessary only to consider, for the purpose of the final decision of this question, the very words of the instrument. Words used in an instrument of this description must be construed according to the subject to which they are applied. The words here used, and which are in question, are applied to a power over a particular description of property. The power is one power applying to three descriptions of property, and varying according to those three descriptions: First, of property which was under the settlement, let upon leases for life, or lives, or for years determinable upon life or lives: Secondly, of property that consisted of lands not under such leases, but under rack-rent leases; and thirdly, of mines. Now is not that evidence that the persons who framed this instrument contemplated those three species of property under the different circumstances in which they stood; and what is the manner in which they contemplated that property which was leased for lives, or for years determinable upon lives? what did they mean to give by the power? As to that property they meant to give the same power of enjoyment which the person who had gone before had of the property. By the nature of that property no benefit could be derived from it for a considerable term of years [463] but by renewing the leases from time to time as they dropped, and therefore they gave a power to grant leases of that part, reserving what had been before reserved, in as beneficial a manner in all respects, or more, giving them the power to reserve more, but not to reserve less, not only as to the rent but as to the services. The services in every instance of a particular lease, every thing, was to be reserved exactly in the same manner as it had been reserved by the prior leases. With respect to the second description of property, there the power is to lease at the best and most improved rent, the words are added, "that can be reasonably had or obtained;" does that word reasonably, really, and truly, though perhaps introduced from caution into it, vary the instrument the least in the world? would it not be a sufficient execution of the power if the best and most improved rent had been obtained according to a reasonable estimation of the best and most improved rent? I should consider that, although the rent reserved may not be the very best rent that could be got, yet if it is fairly, and honestly, and reasonably, the best rent that can be reserved, without any fine derived by the person who granted it, that it is a good lease. The word reasonable therefore, though introduced in this part of the instrument, is a word merely of caution, and would not alter in any degree whatever the construction of the power under the settlement.

With respect to the two parts of the property, that which is on leases for lives, or for years determinable on lives, and that at rack-rent, there were introduced [464] words with respect to a power of re-entry on non-payment of rent; the first is expressed in one way, the second in another way; we find different terms used, obviously, as it seems to me, for this reason; with respect to the second description of property, the words are precise; and so as that a clause shall be inserted, containing a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent for twenty-eight days after it becomes due; the words there are precise; why were they not precise in the other case? for this manifest reason, because the other power referred to existing leases; they referred to that which was the ordinary mode of executing the power with respect to such property; namely, that on the dropping of one life the lease shall be surrendered, and a new lease granted for three lives. The powers which were contained in the former leases of every description were the very powers to which the settlement meant to refer. If in any of the leases that existed there was not a power of re-entry for non-payment of the rent, they meant that such a power should be contained in future, and therefore the words there used are of loose description. I think it is a mistake to suppose the words are precise; the words are not precise; the words are loose; and the great error, as it seems to my mind, in the opinions that have been formed that this lease is invalid, is in the supposition that the words are precise; I repeat they are not precise, they are merely a note or memorandum intimating that a power of re-entry is to be reserved, and if in the former leases such a power has not been reserved, (and probably the person who made the settlement [465] had not an opportunity to look into all the leases, to see the form in which they were made) if such power was not reserved, then there should be such a power reserved, but in any other respect that they should be in conformity to the prior leases. It appears in the case of the lease in question that the power of re-entry was reserved in the former lease, not simply on the non-payment of rent, but it was reserved on the non-performance of the services, a service at the mill, a reservation of a capon. If the engagements were not observed the power of re-entry extended to the whole. Taking it, therefore, that the meaning of the settlement was this, not to give any precise direction with respect to the nature of the power, but to give a general direction in the nature of a memorandum, if I may so express it, that there should be a power of re-entry: is not that the natural construction of the words, and is not the construction which is attempted to be put upon the words a forced construction, an attempt to make them more strict than they really are?

Suppose a contract was entered into between two persons, the one having the property, and the other willing to take that property, and that contract was so executed as that it purported there should be in the lease to be granted under that contract a power of re-entry for the non-payment of the rent, how would that contract be executed if it was to be specifically performed under a decree of a court of Equity? would a court of Equity have ever thought they were compelled under the terms of that contract, by those words to require that the power of [466] re-entry should be a power of re-entry absolutely upon the nonpayment of the rent at the day, and without the common and ordinary provision that it should only be in case there was not a sufficient distress? would not those words be construed by what was the common and ordinary practice? The common and ordinary practice certainly is to frame a power of re-entry in the manner in which the power of re-entry in this lease is framed. What then must have been the mind of the person who prepared this settlement, the conveyancer who prepared that settlement, when he inserted in the settlement that a power of re-entry for nonpayment of rent should be reserved, without expressing more? It must have been in his mind, according to the usual habit of persons of that description, and you must take it to have been in the mind of the parties to the settlement, (for it is the mind of the person who prepares the instrument that ought to give the construction of the instrument;) you must take it to have been in the mind of the person who prepared the instrument that this was a species of note or memorandum which would have been more fully expressed in the lease to be executed.

I conceive, therefore, that in this case it must be taken to be the intention of the parties to the instrument not to be precise with respect to the terms in which the power of re-entry was to be reserved, but merely to give a note signifying that a power of re-entry should be reserved for nonpayment of rent, meaning thereby that that power which was contained in the former leases, should be inserted [467] wherever that power did exist in the former lease of the same lands; but where no such power was reserved (if that was the case) then that a power such as would be a reasonable power in such a contract as I have mentioned should be inserted in the lease. If a power of re-entry was before reserved, the words were not necessary, because the rent was to be reserved in as beneficial a manner, and therefore if there was a power of re-entry in the former lease, that same power of re-entry, and no other, could be reserved; and therefore I do conceive that when you come to apply your minds to this particular case there really is no ground of doubt, because all the doubt that has been suggested upon the subject has been founded upon a construction of the words of this instrument, which I submit they do not by any means bear; they were not intended, as it has been supposed they were intended, to express precisely and positively what should be done; they were intended to refer to the leases that had been previously executed of the same property, that the rent should be reserved in as beneficial a manner in every respect as before; and if there was an exception in the former leases of the power of re-entry, that a power should be given, that is, such a power as a Court of Equity would insert in a lease, under a contract, in these loose words directing a power of re-entry to be inserted in the lease. I take it there can be no doubt whatever that upon a contract of that description so would a Court of Equity act.

But suppose this had not been a question before a Court of Equity, but before a Court of Law: [468] suppose the person who entered into that contract had executed a lease, with a power in the terms in which the power is conveyed in this case; or suppose, on the contrary, he had executed it with a power of re-entry upon nonpayment of the rent at the day, and the question had been whether in either of those cases the contract had been properly executed, or not, if the lessee had in one case objected, you have made it too strict, not according to the intention of the parties in the contract; if on the other hand it had been made in the present form, and had been objected to, that the lease was invalid, and the question had come to be agitated in a Court of Law, would a Court of Law have differed from a Court of Equity on the subject, if they had inquired in what manner will a Court of Equity execute such a contract as this? in what manner would a person employed as a conveyancer in the habits of business have framed a lease under such a contract? and then taking it to be a proper or an improper execution of the contract according to that which the habits of men engaged in the business would have led them to consider proper.

Upon the whole, therefore, it appears to me that the lease is a valid lease, because it is made, as it is found by the special verdict, in conformity to the other leases; and I consider the words of the settlement referring to those leases to have the effect of saying in this particular case,—if in any of the renewals of a lease, where there had been no power of re-entry in any particular case of that description, the question should arise how that power of re-entry was to be reserved, that it was to be reserved according to that which had been the practice of the owner of the estate in letting leases of other parts. Because in a case where the power of re-entry was actually reserved in the former leases, for the purpose of making them conformable to the former leases, which it was evident was the manner intended, it must be made conformable to a former lease, but if there was any lease in which a power of re-entry had been omitted, then it could not have reference to that lease; but the way in which a court ought then to act would have been to see what was the manner in which leases of property of the same description, under the same settlement have been granted, reserving a power of re-entry; and that that would have been deemed a sufficient execution of the power under the settlement; and that the words of the power ought not to be construed as meaning that precise and positive reservation of a power of re-entry which has been contended for in this case.

Therefore it is upon the particular words of this instrument, the settlement of 1757, and not upon any general view of the case, that I conceive that this lease ought to be supported, and that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber should be reversed, and the judgment of the King's Bench affirmed.

Ordered accordingly.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

CHARLES WARD,—Appellant: ROBERT HARTPOLE,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 236; viii. 863; x. 1650. On point as to execution of power, discussed in Muskerry v. Chinurry, 1835, 11b. and God. t. Sugd. 185 passim. On point as to frauds, see Edwards v. Meyrick, 1812, 2 Ha. 60.]

G. H., a tenant for life in a marriage settlement, is thereby empowered to make leases for lives of lands in Ireland, at the best rent, without fine, and a power was also given, with the consent of trustees, to raise any sum of money. The trustees, in pursuance of the power, consent that G. H. should, by mortgaging all or any part of the lands, or in any other manner he should think fit, raise any sum of money not exceeding £5000.

Under this power and consent G. H., in consideration of £300 and a rent, grants to V. W. part of the lands in settlement upon a lease for lives. The grant, and a receipt expressing that the £300 was raised under the power and consent as part of the £5000, were duly registered.

Before, and at the date of this grant, V. W. was the solicitor of G. H., who was involved in litigation, and in distress.

The rent, with the premium calculated at six per cent, were considerably short of the annual value of the lands.

Upon a bill, by a tenant in remainder under the settlement, to set aside the lease, and on appeal, held, that the lease was a good execution of the power to raise money; but void, as obtained by a solicitor from his client, in circumstances of embarrassment, and at an under-value.

William Hartpole, deceased, being seised of lands in Queen's county, under a grant from the Crown on the 5th and 6th of December 1707, mortgaged the premises to Thomas Tilson for £3000, which were already subject to a prior mortgage for £2394 and to other encumbrances to the amount of £7000 and upwards. William Hartpole died in 1713, leaving Martha his widow, and George his only son, an infant.

* In this case the lease, having been made by appointment under a power, was disputed on two grounds: first, that it was not conformable to the power; secondly, that it was obtained by the undue influence of an attorney over his client, and at an under-value. The decision was against the validity of the lease, on the latter ground. On the question of conformity to the power the lease was held valid.

[471] Martha married Maurice Cuffee, who was appointed guardian to the infant, and resided in the mansion-house, and managed the estate.

In 1731 George Hartpole levied a fine.

On the 11th of March 1731 marriage articles were executed between George Hartpole and Mary Wemys, containing a power reserved for George Hartpole to make leases of the premises, or any part thereof, for any term or number of years, or for one, two, or three lives certain, or renewable for ever, at the best and most improved rent, without fine: such leases to commence in possession and not in reversion; with power also for George Hartpole, with consent of Henry Coddington and James Agar (the trustees) and the survivor of them and their heirs, and of Patrick Wemys, (father of Mary Wemys) during his life, and after his decease, with the consent of his eldest son Henry Wemys, to raise any sum or sums of money for such uses and purposes as he George Hartpole should think fit, so as not to prejudice the jointure thereby agreed to be provided for Mary.

In 1731, shortly after George Hartpole's marriage, Vere Ward, the father of the Appellant, who was a practising attorney of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, went to live near the residence of Mr. Hartpole. An intimacy commenced between them, and Mr. Hartpole, who was then involved in law-suits instituted against him for debts due from his father, and charged upon his estate, employed Ward, as his agent to defend several of these suits, and to adjust and settle various accounts and demands with his tenants and others: by which means Ward became acquainted with Hartpole's situation, the circumstances and value of his estates, and the extent of his power under the marriage articles.

On the 19th of December 1732, George Hartpole agreed to demise to Vere Ward the lands of Ballyharmer, etc. for three lives (renewable for ever) at £80 per annum.

In the year 1735, George Hartpole applied to Patrick Wemys, his wife's father, and to Henry Coddington, the surviving trustee named in the marriage articles of the 11th of March 1731, (James Agar, the other trustee, being dead) for liberty to raise a sum of money pursuant to the power for that purpose contained in these marriage articles.

Patrick Wemys and Henry Coddington, the surviving trustees in the said marriage articles, on the 29th of November 1735, [472] executed a deed to George Hartpole, whereby, after reciting the marriage articles of George Hartpole and Mary Wemys, and the power and uses therein mentioned, and also reciting that James Agar the said trustee was dead, and that the said Henry Coddington survived him; and that the estate of George Hartpole was much encumbered with debts, which could not be discharged without raising money for that purpose, with the consent of Henry Coddington and Patrick Wemys, they, Henry Coddington and Patrick Wemys, in pursuance of the power reserved to them by the said articles, did at the request of George Hartpole consent that he should and might, by mortgaging all or any part of his lands in the Queen's county, or in any other manner he should think fit, raise any sum or sums of money not exceeding £5000 in the whole, which when raised was to be by him applied towards discharging the debts affecting his estate, and for such other uses and purposes as he should think proper, which deed or instrument was duly registered at Dublin.

Vere Ward in the year 1735, continuing to practise as an attorney, was occasionally employed by Mr. Hartpole; but he had another solicitor who was principally employed by him. About this time Vere Ward was induced by Hartpole to build a house on part of his estate: and the lands of Acregallen (now Hollymount) containing about thirty-three acres, being untenanted, were proposed as an eligible situation.

About the months of February or March 1735, George Hartpole being desirous of raising a sum of £300, part of the £5000, pursuant to his power and the consent of the trustees, he and Vere Ward came to an agreement for a lease of the lands of Acregallen, etc. containing about 250 acres.

On the faith of this agreement Vere Ward proceeded at a great expense to build a dwelling-house and several outhouses, to form a garden, and made many other valuable improvements on the premises.

By deeds of lease and release, bearing date the 12th and 13th days of November 1736, George Hartpole, in consideration of £300 paid by Vere Ward, granted, bargained, released, and confirmed unto Ward, his heirs and assigns, all the before-mentioned lands for the lives of Vere Ward, Lucy Ward his wife, and Nicholas Ward his son, and the survivors and survivor of them, with a covenant of renewal for ever, on the fall of each and every [473] life or lives, at the yearly rent of £42, payable half-yearly, clear of all taxes, quit and crown-rent only excepted. The lease and release were registered in 1736.

George Hartpole on the same 13th of November, gave the following receipt for the sum of £300: "I, George Hartpole, of Shewle, in the Queen's county, esquire, do hereby acknowledge to have received from Vere Ward, of Knockbegg, in the said county, gentleman, the sum of £300 sterling, being the sum mentioned in the said deed of release, by me this day executed to the said Vere Ward, of the lands of Bohernesyre, and other parcels of land therein mentioned, for three lives, with a covenant of renewal for ever, at the yearly rent of £42 sterling; which said sum of £300 I do acknowledge to have been by me raised and taken in part of the sum of £5000, which I am empowered to raise on my estate, by virtue of a power contained and reserved in my articles of marriage, and a consent for that purpose, bearing date the 29th day of November 1735, under the hands and seals of Patrick Wenys, esquire, and Henry Coddington, esquire, trustees in the said articles mentioned," which receipt was registered in the words above stated.

This sum of £300 was the first sum raised by George Hartpole under the power in his marriage articles.

On the 25th of January 1755, Vere Ward conveyed his interest to Robert Birch, in certain leases, dated in 1745 and 1750, which had been substituted for the lease of 1732.

George Hartpole died on the 4th of December 1763, leaving the Respondent, Robert Hartpole, his eldest son and heir, a minor.

Robert Hartpole having attained his age of twenty-one in Hilary term 1765, levied a fine, and suffered a recovery of the lands.

On the 24th of April 1765, Robert Hartpole filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against Vere Ward, Robert Birch, and others, stating among other things the several matters aforesaid, and praying that the several sales therein mentioned to have been made by George Hartpole might be set aside, as not warranted by the power in his marriage articles; and that the leases made to Vere Ward might also be set aside, as having been obtained by fraud and at great under value; and that the other leases therein mentioned to have been made by George Hartpole might also be set aside, as having been obtained by fraud and at under value; and that the deeds of purchase and leases afore-[474]-said might be brought in to be cancelled, or disposed of as the Court should direct; and that Robert Hartpole might be decreed to the mesne rates and profits thereof, severally from the death of George Hartpole, his father.

On the 18th of November 1765, Vere Ward put in an answer, stating among other things, that the fines paid on the leases were applied to discharge encumbrances affecting the estates of the Respondent; that George Hartpole had power to make the leases upon fines; that the rent reserved was the full value; that he had expended large sums in the improvement of the premises, and that the leases were fairly obtained without fraud, misrepresentation, or improper influence.*

Vere Ward on the 30th of May 1771 filed a cross-bill against Robert Hartpole, stating the several matters in the answer to the original bill, and particularly stating that Lucy Ward, one of the lives in the leases, was dead; and that Vere Ward soon after her death had tendered the rent and fine, and a deed for renewal, pursuant to the covenant contained in the lease of 1736, by inserting the life of the Appellant, Charles Ward, instead of Lucy Ward, which Robert Hartpole refused to execute, or to receive the said fine; and further alleging that forcible possession of the lands demised had been taken by the Respondent, and rents improperly received from the under-tenants : prayed that the Respondent might be obliged to confirm all the leases made by George Hartpole, and deliver up the lands of Bohernesyre, and account with Vere Ward, and pay him the sum of £167 10s., and such other sums as he, Robert Hartpole, had received, or should receive thereout, and execute a renewal of the lease of the 13th of November 1736, and the leases assigned by Vere Ward to Robert Birch. And that in case Robert Hartpole should refuse the same, he might set forth a full account of the personal estate of George Hartpole, and how the same had been disposed of, and whether he died intestate, or made any will, and who acted as executor or administrator : and also what debts affected the real estate of William Hartpole and George Hartpole ; and which of them had been discharged by George Hartpole or his guardians, and what [475] assignments had been executed, and that all proper accounts might be taken.

The Respondent, on the 24th of February 1770, put in his answer to the cross-bill, thereby stating a grant of the premises in question from King Charles the Second to William Hartpole, his grandfather, and his heirs male (Quære, heirs male of his body), and that he died in 1713, leaving George Hartpole, his son, an infant, who became seised, and that he died in 1763, leaving him, the said Robert Hartpole, an infant, who became entitled to an estate-tail in the premises. He admitted that George Hartpole, his father, obtained the power before stated from the trustees to raise £5000 by leasing or otherwise ; and that by the instrument of the 19th of December 1732, Vere Ward obtained a demise from George Hartpole, for lives renewable for ever of the lands therein comprised, and admitted the leases of the 13th of March 1745, and 2d of May 1750 : and admitted that the demise of 1732 was surrendered by Vere Ward : on the execution of the leases of 1745 and 1750 : and by such answer admitted that V. Ward had made several valuable improvements, and plantations, as in the cross-bill stated, to a considerable amount : and he also admitted the lease of 1736, and that the lands were not then in an improved state, but were encumbered with briars, thorns, and stumps of trees. He also admitted that on the death of Lucy Ward, Vere Ward had tendered the rent and a deed of renewal, pursuant to the covenant in the said lease, and the fine for renewal. And the Respondent by such answer admitted that Vere Ward did not owe any rent for the lands held by Thady Moore, but that the Respondent had not only received all the rents to May 1767, but also £167 over and above : and thereby admitted he refused to renew Vere Ward's lease : and that his father made his will and appointed executors, who had declined to act, and that no person had administered : that his father left some personal estate : and that his father and his guardians had paid judgment and other debts affecting his real estate : and he set out a schedule of his father's personal estate, and into whose hands it had come, and how it had been disposed of : and admitted that he had to that time administered his assets.

Vere Ward replied to the answer to the cross-bill, and the Respondent replied to Vere Ward's answer to the original and [476] amended bills, and issue being joined in both the causes, witnesses were examined on both sides to the points in issue* ; publication passed in both the causes, and they came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the 28th of January 1774, and on several other days ; and on the 25th of February 1774, by decree in the causes, bearing date the same day, it was ordered and decreed, That the Respondent's original bill should be dismissed as to the defendant Robert Birch, without costs, by consent ; and as to so much of the said bill as sought to set aside the lease of the 13th of November 1736, it was decreed that the Respondent was entitled to relief : and that the said lease should be set aside : and that the Respondent was entitled to an account of the profits of such parts of the lands in question as Vere Ward was in possession of from the time of the death of the Respondent's father ; and it was referred to one of the Masters of the said court to take the said account, on the taking of which the parties were to have all just allowances. And it was thereby further ordered and decreed, That an injunction should be awarded in the original cause, to put the Respondent in possession of such part of the lands as were not then already in his possession, but not to issue as to the house, garden, and demesne, until the 1st day of then next Easter Term, or further order, but without prejudice to any remedy which Vere Ward might have against the representatives of George Hartpole, or his covenant in the said lease of the 13th of Nov. 1736; and that the Respondent should have his costs in the original cause to be taxed by the Master: And it was thereby further ordered and decreed, That the cross-bill should be dismissed with costs, not only as to that part which sought to have the lease of 13th of Nov. 1736 confirmed, but also that part which sought a renewal thereof; and as to such part of the cross-bill as sought a satisfaction out of the personal assets of George Hartpole, it was ordered that the same should be also dismissed, no personal representative of George Hartpole appearing before the Court.

Vere Ward, after the pronouncing of this decree, and on the 1th of April 1774, died intestate, whereby the suit, decree, and all the proceedings, became abated.

[477] Nicholas Ward, the eldest son, and next of kin of Vere Ward, became his administrator.

The suit, decree, and proceedings were revived by an order of the 8th of June 1774. Nicholas Ward, after exhibiting the original appeal, died before the hearing, and the Appellant, Charles Ward, as his heir at law, devisee, and residuary legatee, took administration, with his will annexed, and also administration de bonis non; and the appeal of the original testator was revived by the Appellant Ward.

The case was argued for the Appellant by Mr. Wedderburne, (then Solicitor General) and Mr. Dunning, on the following grounds:

1. Because from the Respondent's statement in his original and amended bills of the time of his grandfather's death, and the age of his father at that time, it was impossible his father could have been of full age at the time of his entering into the articles of the 11th of March 1731, and therefore he could not be bound by those articles.

Supposing George Hartpole to have been properly bound by the articles made on his marriage, yet as he had thereby a power to let leases of his estates comprised in those articles in the manner therein mentioned, and had also by those articles a power to raise any money thereon, with the consent of the trustees, or the survivor of them, and his wife's father, or if he should be dead, her brother; and as the surviving trustee and his wife's father executed such instrument as above stated, signifying their consent that he might by mortgaging his estate comprised in such articles, or in any other manner he should think fit, raise any sum not exceeding £5000, such lease so made by such deeds of the 12th and 13th of November 1736, in consideration of £300 really paid by Vere Ward, ought to be considered as a good lease, as being a proper execution in part of the power for raising money, so far as to raise £300 in part of the £5000 he was so empowered to raise, and the receipt given by George Hartpole shows that was the intention of taking such sum of £300.

It is objected that as there are two distinct powers contained in the marriage articles,—one for letting leases of estates therein comprised, and the other for raising money on those estates,—it was to be presumed that it was not intended that the power for [478] raising money should be executed by letting leases, the power for letting leases only enabling George Hartpole to let such leases at the best improved rents, without taking any fines. And the lease in question having been made in consideration of £300, would not be a good lease within the power for making leases; and as being a lease it would not be a good execution of the other power for raising money.

But it does not at all follow that because the power of letting leases of the estate was in the common form, they should be leases in possession and not in reversion, and should be let at the most improved rents without taking fines, therefore the other power for raising money, which was general, and only limited as to the mode of executing it, to be with the consent of the trustees or the survivor and the father, or if he should be dead, the brother of the lady, might not with their consent be executed for raising such money, either by letting parts of the estates for terms of years, or selling or mortgaging any part of the estates, or in any other manner whatever; and as the surviving trustee and the lady's father did, by the instrument of the 29th of November 1735, consent that George Hartpole might by mortgage, or in any other manner he should think fit, raise any sum not exceeding £5000, it was presumed he had thereby power to raise any part of it by taking a sum of money for letting leases, or in any other manner he should think proper; and that therefore the lease in question, made in consideration of £300, being a fair lease, and made for a fair and valuable consideration, is a good execution of part of that power, and as such, a good and effectual lease.

It is further objected, that the £5000 which George Hartpole was so empowered to raise was all actually raised by mortgage of the estate; and therefore the £300 raised on making such lease is more than he had power to raise.

But it appears by the pleadings in the cause, that the fact of the money having been raised by mortgage was not properly put in issue by such pleadings, and that therefore the evidence to it ought not to have been read; and when such evidence was read, it thereby appeared that the money was not so raised by any such mortgage till the year 1742, which was six years after the lease in question was made; and therefore, if the lease in question was a good lease within the power for raising money at the time of making it, nothing that was or could have been done afterwards by any of the parties could any ways prejudice or invalidate that lease. And the rather that such lease and the receipt for £300, which showed that it was made in pursuance of the power for raising money, were both registered; so that any person afterwards advancing money under that power might see that such sum of £300 had been then already raised in part of such £5000; and there was the more reason to support the lease in question in a court of equity, as the same was really made for a good and valuable consideration. And although the Respondent in his bill charged that it had been obtained by fraud and undue means, and at an undervalue, yet he had not attempted to support such charges by any proof. And it appeared on the contrary, by the most respectable evidence on the part of the Appellant, that the estate at the time of making such lease was in a very bad condition; and that the lease was made for a good and valuable consideration; and that the rent and the consideration paid for such lease was a full and fair value and consideration for such lease. And as the Respondent's grandfather was entitled to the estate comprised in such lease only under a grant from the Crown to him and the heirs male of his body; and he had not at the time of granting such lease, nor for several years afterwards, any son born; so that if he died before he had a son the estate would have reverted to the Crown. He had no other way of raising any money under such power than by granting leases of estates at rents something below the full value, and taking considerations for such leases, as nobody would then have lent any money on a mortgage of such estate under so precarious a title; and it appeared that he did not raise any money on any mortgage of the estate till six years after granting such lease, and after he had issue male.

If the lease in question had not originally been a good lease, yet as the Respondent after the death of George Hartpole his father, and after the Respondent had levied a fine, and suffered a recovery of the estate in question, actually received rent of the premises from Thady Moore, on Vere Ward's account, in the same manner as the Respondent's father had done, and Thady Moore was then tenant of part of the premises to Vere Ward, and paid the rent to the Respondent up to the 1st of May 1767, which is admitted by the Respondent's answer; and also £167 10s., over and besides the rent incurred to that time: the Respondent ought to be considered as having thereby confirmed that lease, and as being thereby barred and estopped from impeaching such lease, and consequently ought to renew the same according to the covenant therein contained.

If the lease in question could not be supported by the powers in the articles of the 11th of March 1731, and the same was on that account to be set aside in a court of equity, yet as the same was not, nor could be set aside on account of any fraud, or as having been granted at any undervalue, Vere Ward ought to have had an allowance for the pecuniary consideration he paid for such lease, and the monies he laid out in buildings and improvements on the premises, for which no provision was made by the decree.

The cross-bill ought not to have been dismissed on account of no personal representative of George Hartpole being before the Court; for as Vere Ward was certainly, in case the lease in question was to be set aside for want of George Hartpole having power to make it, entitled in a court of equity to have satisfaction out of George Hartpole's estate for the money paid by Vere Ward for such lease, and for the money he laid out in buildings and improvements upon the estate; and as it appeared by the Respondent's answer to the cross-bill, that although he was not the legal personal representative of his late father, yet he had actually possessed and administered his father's personal assets in the same manner as if he had actually been the personal representative; so that such personal representative, if there had been one, would only have been a proper party in point of form for taking the account, which in substance must and could only have been taken against the Respondent, who had alone possessed the assets. The Court might have directed such account to have been taken against the Respondent, giving Vere Ward leave to bring a proper legal representative of George Hartpole before the Master to substantiate the proceedings. Or the Court might have ordered the case to have stood over, with liberty to Vere Ward to have amended his bill, and brought proper parties before the Court, upon his paying the costs of that day's hearing.

For the Respondents, Mr. Thurlow (Attorney-General) and Mr. Skinner. (The case was also signed by Mr. Fearne.)

[481] It is in proof that George Hartpole was of age at the time of entering into his marriage articles in March 1731, and consequently he was bound by them. Under these articles he became only tenant for life of the lands leased by him to Vere Ward in 1736, without any other power of granting leases to exceed his own life than what was reserved to him by these articles. The leasing power reserved to him by these articles was confined to the granting of leases at full and improved rents, reserving no fine, and to commence in possession, and not in reversion. The lease granted to Vere Ward in 1736 had no one of these requisites to give it any validity; it was a lease granted at a considerable undervalue upon a fine of £300, and not to commence in possession, but in reversion, there being prior leases of the same lands then subsisting. And to contend that a lease by a tenant for life, so totally inconsistent with and repugnant to the only power of leasing reserved to him, can be supported against those in remainder, is in effect to maintain that to reserve a leasing power to a tenant for life is nugatory, and that such tenant is neither restrained nor benefited by it, but may grant what leases he pleases without regard to such power or its restrictions.

But it is alleged that the lease in question was not granted in pursuance of the power of leasing reserved to George Hartpole by his marriage articles, but in exercise of the power contained in the same articles for enabling George Hartpole, with the consent of the trustees, to raise money for such purposes as he should think fit: that George Hartpole accordingly obtained the consent of Patrick Wenys and Henry Coddington, by the instrument or deed of the 29th of November 1735, for raising £5000; that the lease to Vere Ward was made in pursuance of this power and consent; and that the fine of £300 taken upon that lease was raised as part of the said £5000. And in support of this, we are referred to a receipt said to have been given by George Hartpole to Vere Ward for the said £300 fine, expressing that the said fine was raised and taken as part of the £5000 mentioned in the said deed of consent; and (what is more extraordinary) this receipt itself appears to have been registered.

It plainly appears that the lease in question was not intended or supposed to be made in pursuance of the power given to George Hartpole for raising £5000, because that power is not at all mentioned or referred to in that lease, nor does the lease [482] itself afford any the most remote suggestion of an intended or supposed execution of that power: an omission which it is impossible to account for, if that lease was really intended as an execution of that power, and to derive its validity from it. As to what is mentioned in the receipt, it appears to have been a contrivance of Vere Ward to give a false colour to the transaction. The unusual artifice of registering a receipt of this nature seems plainly calculated to answer a purpose which a transaction fair and justifiable upon the face of it stands in no need of. And indeed what is stated in the Appellant's answers and cross-bill, that the lease of 1736 was granted in pursuance of an agreement of 1735, seems to put an end to the pretence of this lease being made in execution of the power required by the deed of consent. And there is another very material circumstance, which seems to prove that this fine of £300 taken upon the granting the lease to Vere Ward could not have been taken by George Hartpole himself as any part of the £5000 which he was so empowered to raise, which is, that George Hartpole did actually raise the sum of £5364 in pursuance of that power, by three several sales of different parts of the estates over which such power extended. Now this fact leaves no room at all for any constrained construction to bring the £300 fine taken upon Vere Ward's lease within the description of any part of the £5000 raised by George Hartpole in pursuance of his power. The whole of that sum, and more, having been thus raised accordingly in a manner more direct, and pursuant to that power, than the extraordinary mode of granting leases upon fines.

The power for raising £5000 could not enable George Hartpole to grant the lease in question: the leasing power contained in the marriage articles expressly restrained George Hartpole from granting any leases at an undervalue, or upon fines, or in reversion. Now is it possible to imagine that the power immediately following was intended to reduce the preceding power to a nullity by removing these restrictions, and establishing those very leases which were so expressly provided against in the leasing power? Powers for raising money are usually executed by sale or mortgage of the lands, and are not supposed to impart a leasing power, which is always provided for by a distinct and very different clause. The manner in which the execution of the power is guarded by the different consent of trustees, mani [483]-fests the intention to prevent the issue or those in remainder from being unreasonably or unnecessarily prejudiced by the execution of it. Such intention is answered by the usual mode of raising money by sale or mortgage, because in those cases the value of the estate is diminished no further than to the amount of the sum raised by the execution of the power; but if the power for raising £5000 enabled George Hartpole to do it by leasing the lands upon fines, it is evident that he might, in order to obtain an immediate supply of the £5000, have prejudiced the estate to the amount of £20,000 or upwards, by procuring the desired fines upon leases, without reserving one fourth of the annual rent which the lands were fairly worth, after allowing for the fines paid upon such leases. But it cannot be imagined that a latitude of power which might eventually prove so prejudicial to the issue could ever be consistent with the obvious intention of marriage articles, which were meant to secure a provision for such issue.

It is insisted, that if the lease granted to Vere Ward in 1736, did not pursue either the leasing power, or the power for raising the money, and is therefore to be set aside, yet the Appellant is entitled in equity to be repaid the fine he originally paid for the lease, and also to be allowed for the money he has expended in real improvements on the lands.

Whatever attention might have been paid to a claim of this nature in behalf of a lessee taking lands at a fair and full value, without notice of marriage articles, and entirely innocent of any fraudulent or undue practices in the obtaining his lease, it certainly cannot be urged with any degree of propriety or weight in the present case, where it is in full proof that Vere Ward had notice of the marriage articles at the time of obtaining the lease, and then and for some years before acted in the capacity of law-agent to the lessor, and for part of the time received his rents, and managed his estate, where it appears that he availed himself of the advantages of his confidential situation to impose upon his employer, and prevail upon him, under the pretence of assisting him in his pressing circumstances, to grant him the lease in question at a very considerable undervalue.

At law it is clear the Appellant would be entitled to no compensation or allowance in respect of the insufficiency of a title of which his father had notice at the time of taking the lease. And it must be submitted that for an agent to take advantage of [484] his intimacy and influence with the person employing him, and to avail himself of the opportunities afforded him by his situation, as well as of the necessities of his employer, to obtain from him at a great undervalue a lease of part of the lands intrusted to his agency, appears to be such an abuse of confidence, such a flagrant breach of trust, as can give no claim to the favour, encouragement, or countenance of a Court of Equity.

The case having been argued on the 24th, 25th and 31st of January 1776, the judgment was moved in the House of Lords to the following effect, by

Lord Mansfield*: The Bill upon which this decree was made was brought by the Respondent against the Appellant's father, Vere Ward, to set aside a lease granted to him by the Respondent's father, George Hartpole, of certain lands in the Queen's County in Ireland, in consideration of a fine of £300 and a rent of £12 a year, and the grounds upon which it is sought to set aside the lease, are—

* For this Note of the Judgment I am indebted to Mr. Palmer of Gray's Inn.

"1st, That George Hartpole was only tenant for life of the lands in question under his marriage articles, with power 'to make leases for any term of years, or for one, two, or three lives certain, or renewable for ever, at the best improved rent without fine. Such leases to commence in possession, and not in reversion.' That the lease in question was granted on terms contrary to that power, and that therefore it is void.

"2dly, That this lease was obtained by fraud, imposition, and misrepresentation of the value."

The Appellant's father by his answer insists that the lease is good under the power reserved to George Hartpole by the marriage articles, enabling him "with the consent of the trustees, to raise any sum or sums of money for such uses and purposes as he should think fit." And the subsequent instrument executed by the trustees by which they consent "that he should raise the sum of £5000 by mortgaging all or any part of his estate, or in any other manner he should think fit." He says, that the lease was granted at the full value, and denies that he made use of any fraud or misrepresentation in obtaining it.

[485] The first question in this case is, whether the lease now impeached, as having been granted upon a fine, is at all within the substance or meaning of the power for raising money, or can be considered as any execution of it?

Powers, especially those in family settlements, being considered as reservations of so much of the absolute dominion of the estate, are to be construed equitably, and most favourably for the grantee; and therefore, where through mistake or inadvertency the several circumstances required by a power are not strictly and formally complied with, equity will interpose and supply the defect. The power indeed cannot be exceeded; but within the extent and compass of it, a Court of Equity will aid all defects of circumstances, and even where powers have been exceeded the execution is not absolutely void; for the court will correct the excess, and supply the execution as far as the power warrants.

In this case I am strongly inclined to think the decree proceeded chiefly on the ground of the lease not being warranted by the marriage articles. It is certain that the lease is not within because not made according to the power of leasing; but, upon the true construction of the power to raise money, and the consent of the trustees, and considering the known and long-established usage in Ireland, I think that this mode of fining-down might be one way of raising the money: the articles reserve a power to make leases for any term of years, or for one, two, or three lives certain, or renewable for ever; for a notion then prevailed in Ireland that granting leases for lives renewable for ever was a very advantageous manner of letting lands; it has however been found exceedingly detrimental and inconvenient.

The power to raise money enables George Hartpole to raise any sum for such uses as he should think fit, with the trustees consent: the trustees give their consent, and authorize him to raise £5000, by mortgage or otherwise, as he should think fit. Now, I am of opinion that by the terms of this power and the trustees consent he was clearly warranted to raise it by fines. The power is very remarkable and very uncommon; he is enabled to raise any sum of money for such uses and purposes as he should think fit, with the trustees consent. There is no sum mentioned; no particular mode prescribed for raising it; no restriction whatever as to the execution of the power, but that it should be with the [486] trustees consent. Now this power operates as an exception, and so far as respects the execution of it, the power of leasing does not extend or interfere. When the power for raising money is satisfied, then indeed all leases afterwards made must be in conformity to the terms of the power of leasing, but those made in execution of the power of raising money cannot be affected by it. The trustees, as I have observed, tie the tenant for life down to no particular mode, but leave it to his discretion to raise it by mortgage, or in any other manner as he should judge proper; fining-down the rents was one of those other ways; selling was another; there was no way of raising money but by mortgaging, fining-down, or selling; he was left at his option. Great part of the lands he sold; they are quietly enjoyed, and no question is made as to the validity of those sales; why then might not money be as well raised by fines? It can make no difference by what means it is raised provided the value is given. I am clearly of opinion that it might be raised by finer, and that so far the lease is a good execution of the power under the trustees consent.

There was an argument made use of that the whole money and more had been raised by sale of the lands, and consequently that the £300 paid for the lease could not have been raised as part of the £5000. But this will not hold, for that money was not raised for some years after granting the lease, and the lease takes notice that the £300 was raised as part of the £5000; and if the lease was good at the time of making, nothing done afterwards can invalidate it, if then the lease was within the power.

The next question is, whether there was any collusion or connivance between George Hartpole and the Appellant's father in making this lease, or any practice or fraud made use of by Ward in his relation of agent to the Respondent's father in obtaining it.

If there were any collusion between the tenant for life and the lessee, or any undue practices on the part of the latter to the prejudice of those in remainder, that would afford a sufficient ground for setting aside the lease, but it does not appear there was: there is no proof of it; the fine taken is no secret; it is rected in the body of the deed, and in the receipt it is mentioned to be raised as part of the £5000 under the trustees consent and the [487] power. It is a strong circumstance also that the receipt is registered: for though this is taken notice of on the part of the Respondent as a contrivance to answer some unfair purpose, yet here it was highly proper, in order to show that the sum of £300 had been raised in part of the £5000; there is no evidence of any misrepresentation; and it is not pretended that the Respondent's father was a weak extravagant man, liable to be easily misled or imposed upon, or that he did not apply the money thus raised to a good use; on the contrary, it appears that he very laudably applied it in paying off debts and discharging encumbrances to a very large amount, which descended upon him with the estate.

The last question, therefore, is, whether there was any fraud in this transaction as to the rent reserved by the lease? for if there was, it being to the prejudice of the heir, or person next in remainder under the articles, the lease would not be good as against the Respondent.

Now with respect to the value of the lands there is a good deal of contradictory evidence, and if the decree turned upon that point further inquiry might be ordered to ascertain the value: an issue could be directed. But I am unwilling that the parties should continue any longer in litigation, especially as upon the most attentive consideration of the evidence I am of opinion that sufficient appears to show that the rent reserved upon this lease was not the full value. From the evidence of one of Ward's own witnesses, and by his own accounts, as stated in the Appendix to the Respondent's case (which seems to be accurate,) it appears most clearly that the lands were let at an undervalue.—[Here his Lordship stated the calculation of the value of the lands from the Appendix, observing, that six per cent. should be computed for the interest of the fine of £300, that being the legal interest in Ireland, instead of five per cent, which was only allowed in the calculation.]—The account of Ward himself proves that the lands were worth £80 17s. 8d. a year, whereas the rent reserved by the lease, together with the interest of the fine at six per cent, is only £60, so that either the fine was inadequate, or the rent considerably below the value. If then the lease was not taken at the best improved rent, but at an undervalue, it ought not to stand, especially if any advantage [488] was taken of George Hartpole's situation, of his necessity and distress in obtaining this lease, equity will relieve against it. That such an advantage was taken I am strongly inclined to believe; and what weighs with me is this.—the Respondent's father was a gentleman, like many others, involved in a great number of law-suits and difficulties (see Kenrick v. Hudson, in the House of Lords, 1773), and his affairs were exceedingly embarrassed: Ward was his agent and attorney, and consequently well acquainted with his situation, and seems to have been very ready to take advantage of it. This appears from a remarkable letter of Ward to Hartpole, dated the 8th November 1733, which is proved in the cause, and stated in the Appendix to the Respondent's case: in this letter Ward recommends "Fortitude to Mr. Hartpole in the gloomy appearance of his affairs, and vigour in opposing the various suits and difficulties he was engaged in:"—takes notice of his own conduct, and the expense of the suits, and desires to know "Whether Mr. Hartpole would have the accounts between them appear in the shape of bills of costs, or fix a certain annual sum in lieu thereof." What, an attorney requires a certain annual sum? Why not his bill? But your Lordships will find he did not forget his bills. In one bill, amounting to £75 11s. is this article, "For attendance and care of several affairs relating to Mr. Stevenson, and other creditors, from 1731 to 1734, £30." And in another bill, the amount of which is £25, there is this charge, "Attendance on Mr. Hartpole's affairs, in general, etc. from July 1731 to May 1736, £15." Such general charges as these most certainly would not be allowed to any attorney here.

We see then the distresses which Mr. Hartpole laboured under, and the disposition of Ward. In this situation the one was very apt to give, and the other too ready to take a good bargain. And if an attorney, knowing his client to be in such circumstances, takes from him any reward, or any security by way of gratuity or reward, pending the suits or business in which he is concerned, though no particular express act of fraud is proved, yet it shall not stand; it would be attended with dangerous consequences, and therefore it shall not be allowed. I remember the case of one Japhet Crook,* a most vile miscreant, who had been engaged in various suits and scrapes, indicted for per-[489]-juries, forgeries and other crimes, and promised his attorney, who had been useful in procuring bail for him, and otherwise, as a compensation above his bill, to leave him £1000 by his will; and he gave the attorney instructions for preparing his will, with such a legacy, which he executed. The attorney afterwards, lest Crook should change his mind, got a bond from Crook, to oblige him to leave the £1000 by his will. They afterwards quarrelled, and Crook made a new will, in which he omitted the legacy, stating as his reason that he had been imposed upon by his attorney; and he soon afterwards died possessed of a considerable fortune. The attorney sued the representative, who filed a bill to set aside the bond. The attorney put in his answer, and the cause came on to be heard before Lord Hardwicke. At first it did not stand a minute; no fraud was proved to have been made use of by the attorney, and the bill was dismissed. I, however, advised a re-hearing, and the cause came on again; and though there was no proof of fraud having been practised in obtaining the bond, yet from the general danger of establishing a precedent of an attorney taking such a security from a client in distress, as well as from the particular circumstances under which the bond was given, Lord Hardwicke reversed his own decree, and referred it to the Master to consider whether the attorney was entitled to any and what allowance.

The lease in question was granted for a consideration grossly inadequate; Hartpole knew it, but his distress compelled him to give way. Ward availed himself of the advantage of his situation, and thus obtained it at an undervalue. I am, therefore, of opinion that upon the ground of undervalue, coupled with the other circumstances which I have stated, the lease is void as to the Respondent, and that it should be set aside. But upon what terms should this be done? It is a maxim, that he who demands equity must render it; and when a man lays out money in lasting and useful improvements, and has not the benefit of them, why should he not be allowed for it? It is surely but just, as the Respondent has the advantage of the improvements made by the Appellant's father on the lands, and the Defendant is prevented from enjoying them, that some compensation should be made to him. Why should not the fine be paid back?

[490] The decree saves a remedy against the personal representatives of George Hartpole on his covenant, and yet dismisses the cross bill for want of a representative being before the Court, although it is clear that the Respondent had possessed and administered his father's assets, and thereby became executor de son tort, so that such representative would have been necessary in point of form only, for the account must have been taken against the Respondent, and therefore the bill should not have been dismissed upon this ground. But the account might have been taken against the Respondent, giving the Appellant liberty to bring a legal representative before the Master, or have ordered the cause to stand over, with liberty to amend the bill.

* See Walmesley v. Booth, 2 Atk. 25, 27.

and bring the proper parties before the Court. But what I shall propose will render this unnecessary.

There is another circumstance,—the costs. Costs, I take it, were given upon the ground of the lease having been obtained by fraud; but I think in this case each party should bear his own costs. I therefore submit the following variations; viz.

1st. That the lease be set aside upon payment to the Appellant of the fine of £300, and the money laid out in the lasting improvements, with interest from the death of George Hartpole; and that an account be taken of the said £300 and money laid out in improvements.

2dly. That so much of the decree as gives costs in the original or cross-cause, or saves any remedy against the representatives of George Hartpole, or enjoins the Respondent to be put into immediate possession, be reversed.

Which variations were agreed to by the House.*

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

BOYES.—Appellant; BAILLIE.—Respondent [23d May 1821].

PROOF of indecent familiarities between a wife and a medical attendant in the family of the husband, held to afford a presumption of adultery, and a sufficient ground for a divorce.

After sentence of divorce in the Commissaries Court, affirmed by the Court of Session, a verdict and judgment subsequently obtained in an action for damages, finding the adultery not proven, is not admissible, upon an appeal, to affect the sentence or the judgment of affirmance. Such subsequent facts may be stated by leave of the House in an additional case.†

This was a proceeding which originated in the Commissaries Court of Edinburgh to obtain a divorce for cause of adultery. The case on the part of the Respondent was supported by evidence of the grossest acts of indecency, affording inferences, short only of ocular demonstration, that a criminal intercourse had existed between the Appellant and a person who visited in the family, partly as an acquaintance, and occasionally as a medical attendant.

[492] Upon the presumptive evidence in the cause the Court of Commissaries, on the 19th of May 1815, pronounced a judgment, finding "facts, circumstances, and qualifications, proved relevant to infer the Defender's guilt of adultery with James Bryson, etc. find her guilty accordingly; therefore divorce, etc."

In the course of the proceeding, before taking proof on the condescendence of the Respondent, a protest, of reprobaters, was instituted by the Appellant against the Respondent's witnesses, on the ground of insanity, immorality, and undue in-

* See the order in the printed cases of 1776, No. 7.

One of the arguments made use of at the Bar, to show that the lease was not within the leasing power, was, that it did not commence in possession; but this was not supported, for the proof offered, viz. memorials of the leases of part of the lands which were subsisting when this lease was made, could not be read, because it did not appear by the register's notes that they were read on the hearing below; and it is a rule that no new evidence can be read on an appeal, except where the refusal of permitting evidence offered to be read on the hearing is complained of by the appeal. But had the evidence been admissible, it would not have affected the decision.

† Other points were decided by the interlocutors in the Court below; viz. that reasons of reprobaters against the Respondent's witnesses on the ground of insanity, immorality, and undue influence, were irrelevant; that objections to the competency of a witness were admissible only to her credibility; and that the costs of an agent in Edinburgh, to conduct the defence of the Appellant, ought to be disallowed.

fluence; and after the proof had been taken for both parties the Appellant was allowed to give in a condescendence of reprobator; upon advising which the Commissaries found the reasons of reprobator as condescended on not relevant: to which judgment they adhered upon a reclaiming petition.

The Appellant thereupon petitioned for leave to present a bill of advocacy to the Court of Session on the question of reprobaters, which was refused.

Objections were also taken by the Appellant to the admissibility of M.W. when brought forward for examination as a witness for the Respondent: her deposition was allowed to be taken, but appointed to be sealed up, and to lie in retentis.

On advising the pleadings of the parties as to the admissibility of her evidence, the Commissaries "allowed the depositions of M. W. to be opened, and to form part of the process, reserving to the Court to consider what effect any apparent inconsistency in the depositions of the witness, already in process, may have on her credibility when the [493] merits of the cause come to be advised;" to which judgment they adhered on petition, and refused to permit the Appellant to bring this point under view of the Court of Session by bill of advocacy.

Upon the question of costs, objections having been taken and sustained to the Appellant's account of expenses in conducting her defence, she petitioned the Commissioners that they might be allowed, or at least to remit, the account to the auditor, with directions to allow the expenses of the Appellant's agent in Edinburgh. The prayer of this petition was refused, and thereupon the Appellant presented a bill of advocacy to the Court of Session, praying "a remit with instructions to the Commissioners to alter their interlocutor of the 19th of May 1815, etc. and to allow a proof of the circumstances she has relevantly offered to establish, both in reprobator and as additional evidence, etc. and to find her entitled to full expenses, conform to her agent's accounts, which are not alleged to be improperly stated, but modified in respect she should not have had the aid of an agent, and also to sustain the other charges disallowed." The Lord Ordinary having refused the bill, the Appellant presented a petition to the Lords of the second division of the Court of Session, praying them "to remit to the Lord Ordinary to alter his interlocutor, and to the Commissioners to alter, etc.; and to find that the facts, circumstances, and qualifications proved, do not infer the defender's guilt of adultery; or etc. to allow the defender a proof of the reprobaters, and also of the alibi of Mr. Bryson on the night and morning particularly condescended on [494] in the body of the petition." The prayer of this petition having been refused, an appeal to the House of Lords was presented from the several interlocutors of the Commissioners the Lord Ordinary, and the second division of the Court of Session. After the appeal had been presented, and the cases laid on the table of the House, the Appellant obtained leave to print, and accordingly printed and presented an additional case, stating the following facts:

The Respondent, in June 1812, brought his action in the second division of the Court of Session against James Bryson, for reparation and damages in regard to the alleged adultery; concluding that the defender, Mr. Bryson, should be decreed to make payment to the Pursuer of the sum of £10,000 of damages, with £500 of expenses of process.

After various proceedings in this action the Court directed an issue therein to be sent to the Jury Court to be tried by a Jury. In consequence of this direction the following issue was settled for the purpose of trying the question between the parties:

"Whether the defender did on the 1st day of January 1808, or at any time between that time and the 1st day of January 1812, seduce and maintain an adulterous connection, and did commit adultery with Mrs. Elizabeth Cross, or Boyes, then the wife of the Pursuer, at the Pursuer's house of Carnbroe, or in the neighbourhood thereof."

A trial was accordingly had upon this issue, before the Jury Court, on the 12th and 13th days of March 1818: when a verdict was given by the jury impanelled to try the said issue, finding "that [495] in respect of the matters of the said issue proven before them, they find the fact of adulterous connection between the 1st of January 1808 and the 1st of January 1812 is not proven."

When this verdict was reported to the Court of the second division, the Pursuer applied to the Court for a new trial, upon two grounds:—first, that the verdict had been given contrary to the evidence; and secondly, that certain facts which he alleged, and offered to prove, as showing the defender's guilt, had come to his knowledge since the trial. Upon this application the Court directed counsel to be heard in their own presence.

After hearing counsel accordingly, the Court, on the 10th of July 1818, pronounced an interlocutor, refusing the application for a new trial, in so far as the same is founded on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence; but before further answer, ordaining the Pursuer to put in a special articulate condescendence of the facts which he alleges to have come to his knowledge since the trial, and which he avers and offers to prove, and also of the circumstances which he avers, and offers to prove, in order to establish that the said facts were res noviter venientes ad notitiam, with certification.

In consequence of that interlocutor a condescendence was given in by the Pursuer which was followed with answers, replies, and duplies. The Court thereupon, after hearing counsel on the 2d of February, 1819, pronounced an interlocutor, sustaining the verdict, and refusing the application for a new trial, etc.

The matter of the application for a new trial [496] having been thus disposed of, the Court afterwards, on the 9th of February 1819, pronounced this judgment in the cause:

‘The Lords having advised the verdict of the jury find the fact of adulterous connection between the 1st day of January 1808, and 1st day of January 1812, is not proven,’ etc.

Upon the facts appearing in this additional case it was insisted, on behalf of the Appellant,

1st. That in the action against Mr. Bryson the very same point was at issue which was tried in the action of divorce, namely, the alleged adultery between her and Mr. Bryson during the same period of time, and on the same specific facts, attempted to be proved by the same witnesses who had been brought forward in the question of divorce out of which this appeal arises.

2d. That the trial in this action of damages was had in that Court, which is best fitted to investigate and pronounce upon all questions of fact: that the Pursuer in that action examined all such witnesses as he chose to bring forward: and in that trial the Defender obtained a verdict with expenses.

3d. That the application made by the Appellant for a new trial was made in the same division of the Court of Session which previously had under its consideration the question of divorce: and though such application was pressed upon every ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence, and of res noviter venientes ad notitiam, the Court rejected such application for a new trial, with expenses in favour of the defender.

[497] For the Respondent:

The presenting an additional case, stating matters which occurred subsequent to the appeal, is contrary to practice and to principle: The action of divorce and the action for damages are distinct processes pending in different Courts. If the Appellant had reason to object, as she did in the action for damages, against the introduction of the case and process in the Consistorial Court, the Respondent has equal reason to exclude the verdict and process in the Jury Court. The verdict of the Jury would have been inadmissible as evidence in the action for divorce. The Jury Court Act virtually excepts Consistorial Cases from its operation. If the verdict itself be excluded, the evidence on which the verdict was given is à fortiori excluded.

On the 23d of May 1821, the judgments of the Courts of Commissaries and of Session were affirmed without observation.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF FREEHOLDERS AND OF SESSION.

JAMES GIBSON, Esq. of Ingliston,—Appellant; Sir WILLIAM FORBES, of Pitsligo, bart.—Respondent [1821].

The Scotch statute 1681, c. 24, directing that a roll of freeholders shall be made up according as the same shall be instructed to be, of the holding, extent and valuation in the act specified: and providing that the freeholders shall meet to revise the roll for election, etc. and giving jurisdiction to the Court of Session to determine objections against "any insertion in the roll;" Held in the Court of Freeholders and the Court of Session, and on appeal, that the freeholders have no authority, as to the holding, (although they may as to the extent and valuation,) to look beyond the titles produced to them by the claimant, or to receive evidence from the production of anterior titles, or otherwise, to show that the holding is different from that which is expressed in the tenendas clause of the charter, as that it is burgage where it purports to be blench-farm.

By an Act of the Parliament of Scotland, passed in 1681, (c. 21.) reciting that great delay in the despatch of public affairs in Parliament, and Conventions of Estates, was occasioned by the controverted elections of Commissioners of Shires, provides that none shall vote in the election of commissioners of shires or stewartries, which have been in use to be represented in Parliaments and Conventions, but those who at that time shall be publicly infeft in property, or superiority in possession, of a forty-shilling land of old extent, holden of the King or Prince, distinct from the feu-duties in feu-[499]-lands, or where the said old extent appears not, shall be infeft in lands liable in public burdens for his Majesty's supplies for £100 of valued rent, whether Kirk Lands, now holden of the King, or other lands holding feu, waired, or blench, of his Majesty, as king or prince of Scotland. The act directs that "a roll of freeholders shall be made up according as the same shall be instructed to be of the holding and extent or valuation aforesaid;" and provides, "that the freeholders shall meet at the head boroughs of the shires, etc. at the Michaelmas head court yearly; and shall revise the roll for election, and make such alterations therein as have occurred since the last meeting." Minute directions are then given as to the mode of proceeding, and the forms requisite in taking objections.

By another clause jurisdiction is given to the Court of Session. "In case objections be made (against any insert in the said roll) where a Parliament or Convention is not called, a particular diet shall be appointed by the meeting, and intimate to the parties controverting to attend the Lords of Session for their determination, who shall determine the same at the said diet summarily, according to law, upon supplication, without further citation." *

* By the Act 1427, c. 101, the Commissioners are to be elected by the "free tenants,"— "them, that awe comparance in Parliament and Council," out of whose "rentes" the expense of the Commissioner was to be provided by contribution.

The Act 1457, c. 75, provides that "na freeholder that holdis of the king under the sum of twenty pounds be constrained to cum to the Parliament or General Council as for presence, but gif he be ane barroune, or els be specially warned," etc.

The Act 1503, c. 7, is to the same effect.

The Act 1587, c. 111, referring to the Act 1427, as to the election of Commissioners, provides that "Nane have voit in their election bot sic as hes forty shilling land in free tennendey holden of the king," etc.; and that "All freeholders be taxed for the expenses of the Commissioners of the shires passing to Parliament or General Councils, and letters of poynding or horning to be direct for payment of the summes taxt to that effect," etc.

The Act 1661, cap. 35, reciting "That diverse debates have formerly occurred, concerning the persons who ought and should have vote in the election of commissioners, [500] At the Michaelmas head court, held in October 1816, the Respondent gave in a claim to be enrolled as a freeholder of the county of Edinburgh.

[501] In support of the claim of enrolment there was produced a charter of resignation under the great seal, dated at Edinburgh, 20th December, 1814, containing a grant by way of disposition and assignation from the magistrates and town-council at Edinburgh to the appellant, his heirs and assignees, of the superiority of certain lands described in the following terms:—"Totas et integras illas partes et portiones postea descript. terrarum vulgo vocat. the Burrowmuir, alias the common muir, ad civitatem Edinburgensem pertinen. viz. totam et integram villam et terras de Greenhill uti eadem per demortuum Adamum Fairholm et ejus tenentes possessae fuerunt, novemdecim acrarum plenae mensurae aut eo circa consisten. cum graminosis pratis infra medium dict. acrarum per demortuum Adamum Garden a diversis personis acquisit. et omnes per maceriam lapideam nunc inclusas parva parte ex australi orien. ejusdem jacen. excepta: Ac etiam totam et integram illam parvam partem dict. terrarum extra dict. maceriam cum fabrica ferrea super eandem posita, jacen. ex occidentali parte viae publicae ad locum vulgo vocat. Braidshurn conducentis: Ac etiam maneriei locum cum domibus, aedificiis, hortis, pomariis, columbariis, et omnibus et singulis pertinentiis praedict. terrarum, etc. jacen. infra parochiam de St. Cuthberts et vicecomitatum de Edinburgh."

The quaequidem clause describes the lands in question as formerly held of the Crown by and for the use of the town of Edinburgh.

[502] The tenendus is in these terms: "Tenend. et habend. dictas terras aliaque cum pertinen. supra script. per dict. Dominum Gulielmum Forbes ejusque praedict. DE NOBIS nostrisque regis successoribus immediatis legitimis superioribus earundem ut sequitur: viz. praedict. partes et portiones lie the Burrow Muir, seu Common Muir, vocat. Greenhill, cum pertinentiis in libera alba firma, etc."

The reddendo for the lands of Greenhill is, "Summam unius denarii monetae Scotiae super fundum dict. terrarum de Greenhill apud terminum Pentecostes annuatim nomine albae firmae, si petatur tantum, cum talibus ulterioribus seu alteris divoriis (si tales sint) in cartis in favorem Praepositi, Magistratuum et Communitatis civitatis Edinburgensis content."

An instrument of sasine upon this charter, dated 2d March, 1815, was also produced: and it was shown, That the lands exceeded the sum of £400 Scots; and for

from the several shires of this kingdom, to Parliament, and who are capable to be commissioners to Parliament, and that it is necessary for the good of his service that the same be cleared for the future (the King) doth therefore, with advice and consent of his estates of Parliament, statute, enact, and declare, that beside all heritors who hold a forty shillings land, of the King's majesty in capite, that also all heritors, liferenters, and wadsetters holding of the King, and others who held their lands formerly of the bishops or abbots, and now hold of the King, and whose yearly rent doth amount to ten chalders of victual, or one thousand pounds (all feu duties being deducted) shall be, and are, capable to vote in the election of commissioners of Parliaments, and to be elected commissioners to Parliaments; excepting always from this act all noblemen and their vassals. And it being just that those who shall be chosen, and accordingly shall attend his majesty's and the kingdom's service in Parliament, have allowance for their charges, his majesty doth therefore, with advice aforesaid, modify and appoint five pounds Scots of daily allowance to every commissioner from any shire, including the first and last days of Parliament, together with eight days for their coming, and as much for their return, from the farthest shores of Caithness and Sutherland, and proportionably at nearer distances: and that the whole freeholders, heritors, and liferenters holding of the King and prince, shall, according to the proportion of their lands and rents, lying within the shire, be lyable and obliged in the payment of the said allowance, excepting noblemen and their vassals." The act then concludes with a provision for defraying certain extraordinary expences which some commissioners of shires had then incurred, "in providing of foot mantles for the riding of the Parliament."—It was argued on the part of the Respondent that the phraseology of these statutes refers to the present investiture of the estate: and that whatever their ultimate right might be, those "who hold" of the King for the time being could not refuse to sustain their share of the burden imposed for defraying the expenses of the commissioner.

proof thereof the claimant referred to the valuation and cess-books of the county of Edinburgh, and to other competent evidence to be produced to the freeholders. The claim then concludes, "that the said Sir William Forbes" being thus publicly infeft in lands holden immediately of the Crown, and of the valuation required by law, is entitled to be enrolled in the foresaid roll of freeholders of the county of Edinburgh, and hereby claims to be enrolled accordingly.

To the enrolling of the claimant it was objected by Mr. Gibson, of Ingliston (the Appellant) that the lands of Greenhill, composing a large proportion of the lands on which the claim is founded, [503] and described in the claimant's titles as all and whole, those parts and portions of the lands commonly called the Boroughmuir, alias the Common Muir, belonging to the City of Edinburgh, viz. the town and lands of Greenhill, etc., manor-places, houses, etc., lying within the parish of St Cuthbert's and sheriffdom of Edinburgh, have always held burgage.

That, as parts and portions of the common muir, they are contained in the charters of the town of Edinburgh from the most remote periods; and according to the charter of confirmation and novadamus in the town's favour, dated 23d October 1636, which was proposed to the barons as the last investiture of these lands in favour of the resigners, and by which the claimant's signature was revised, they are held, along with the rest of the burgh, of the king, "in libera haereditate et libero burgagio in perpetuum;" with a reddendo of 52 merks sterling "tanquam pro antiquo censu burgali contenti in dicto infeoffamento dicti burgi concessio per regem Robertum primum ad duos anni terminos, etc. cum servitio burgi solet. et consuet." *

To which it was answered for the Respondent that the charter 1636 did not instruct the borough or common muir of Edinburgh to be of burgage-tenure; that it was a general charter, confirming all the old grants in favour of the city, and some of the lands were no doubt burgage, but a much more considerable part of the subjects in that [504] charter, and the boroughmuir among the rest, are held blench or feu of the Crown; and the lands of Greenhill, in right of which Sir William Forbes claims, have stood separately rated in the valuation-books of the county as far back as any record reaches; and it is proved by the valuation-book that since 1726 Greenhill has paid cess and other county-taxes according to that valuation; while the subaltern rights of property have been uniformly made up after the form of a feu-holding, and the infeftments have been recorded in the county register.

These facts, as the Respondent contended, disproved the allegation that Greenhill was of burgage-tenure; but that it was sufficient to support the enrolment that Sir William Forbes produced a Crown-charter and infeftment in his favour, which were ex facie unobjectionable. Under these circumstances it was contended that it was incompetent for the freeholders to entertain any objection which required recourse to the warrants of the charter, and to the other old titles.

Questions were then put by the Appellant to the agent for Sir William Forbes:

"1st. Whether the Crown-charter of 23d October 1636, in favour of the town of Edinburgh, is not the charter on which the claimant's signature (the warrant of his charter) was revised by the Barons of Exchequer.

"2d. Whether the copy of the brief now produced is not a copy of the brief laid before the Barons by the claimant at revising the signature.

[505] The agent considering it to be irregular to put these questions to him declined answering them.

"The meeting having considered the claim, productions, objections, answers and questions, sustained the claim, and enrolled the claimant accordingly."

The objection against the Respondent's enrolment having been overruled in the court of freeholders without a division, the Appellant presented a petition and complaint to the second division of the Court of Session, under the authority of the statute 16th Geo. II. (c. 11), praying the court to find that the freeholders of the county of Edinburgh did wrong in enrolling the Respondent, and therefore to ordain his name to be expunged from the roll.

In this petition and complaint the Appellant contended that the lands of Green-bill belonged to the community of the city of Edinburgh and were holden by that community inalienably in free burgage; that consequently these lands were not truly holden by the Respondent in feu, ward, or blench, of his Majesty, in terms of the statute 1681, cap. 21, regulating the election of commissioners for shires: and that the community of the city of Edinburgh could not "by any species of juggle, either legal or political," be permitted to throw its burgage-property into the mass of property holding in feu, ward, or blench, of his Majesty, and thereby extend the territorial basis of county representation, to the injury of the proper freeholders in their constitutional rights. To establish the proposition as to the tenure of the lands in question the Appellant referred to the terms of the Crown-charter, produced and founded [506] on by the Respondent at the meetings of freeholders; but endeavoured to show, by a deduction from the older title-deeds, that the lands in question had previously been held burgage, and were consequently incapable of constituting the basis of a freehold qualification in the county of Edinburgh.

In his answers to the petition and complaint, the Respondent contended that the earlier titles gave no support to the Appellant's objection. That a burgh might, and often did, hold subjects of the Crown in feu-farm or blench-farm, as well as in burgage; and the Respondent referred to the charter granted by king James VI. to the city of Edinburgh, on the 16th of March, 1603, called by way of pre-eminence the "Golden Charter," as well as to the later charter of Charles I. in 1636, to show that there was no reason to presume that the lands in question had ever been held burgage. He referred also to the evidence derived from the county cess-books, and contended, that if the lands in question had been held burgage, it was to be presumed that they would have been liable for town-taxes, and would have been entered in the cess-books of the burgh. For the same reason they would not have appeared in the cess-books of the county. It being admitted, however, that the lands claimed on by the Respondent had at no time been entered in the burgh cess-books, but on the contrary had constantly stood on those of the county, and paid cess to the county-collector, they ought to be represented in the county, of which they had always been considered as a part. But the Respondent rested his answer to the complaint mainly upon the ground, that having produced all the evidence [507] which the law holds to be necessary to establish a claim of enrolment, neither the freeholders, nor the Court of Session, sitting as a court of review on a matter brought before them, by a summary petition and complaint under the statute, could entertain any objections attempted to be supported by an investigation of the older titles.

These pleadings having been followed by replies and duplies, and the Court being of opinion that the Appellant's complaint was incompetent, without giving any opinion on the truth or relevancy of the Appellant's allegations on the import of the older titles, pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lords having considered this petition and complaint, with the answers, replies, and duplies, and writs produced, and heard the counsel for the parties viva voce, find the said complaint not competent, and dismiss the same: find no expenses due, and decern."

Against this interlocutor the Appellant presented a short petition, and afterwards, with the leave of the Court, an additional petition, in which he endeavoured to remove the objection of incompetency, by contending that there was a distinction between questions regarding the right to the estate claimed upon, and questions regarding the nature and quality of the estate itself. In the one case, if the investiture is free from any ex facie defect, it is ius tertii to the court of freeholders, whether the estate on which the claim is framed may not be ultimately declared in a court of law not to belong to the claimant. If the titles exhibited by the claimant labour under no palpable objection, the freeholders are bound to admit him to the roll, without regard [508] to any right of challenge which may be supposed to exist in favour of any third party. But where the objection arises not upon any ground of competition between different individuals, but upon a defect in the quality of the estate itself, every freeholder has an interest to insist upon such an objection, inasmuch as every fictitious addition to the general mass of freehold property is a virtual subtraction from the value of what is real freehold, and a consequent diminution of the constitutional rights of freeholders. The Appellant contended that the difference of interest in the two classes of objections was sufficient to establish a distinction between them; and he endeavoured to show, as well by a reference to the election statutes as by a review of the different decisions relative to the competency of objections to claims of enrolment, that there was neither reason nor authority for holding his complaint as incompetent.

In his answers to those petitions the Respondent contended that there was no room for the distinction stated by the Appellant. From a review of the statutes passed for the purpose of regulating the proceedings at meetings of freeholders, he contended that the freeholders were bound to give effect to the existing investiture in all its parts: and that they were no more entitled to proceed upon the supposition that the tenure ought to have been different from that which the investiture bore, than to contend that the investiture ought to have been in favour of another party than the claimant. He contended, that from the whole constitution and powers of the freeholders, as fixed by these statutes, they were as little qualified to investigate matters of tenure as to [509] investigate any other matter of title beyond what appeared ex facie of the charter and infeftment produced. Nor was there any room for the distinction founded on the supposition that the freeholders had an interest in the one case which they had not in the other. If the interest of the freeholders to limit the numbers on the roll were held sufficient to authorize their interference, it would manifestly entitle them to investigate all objections tending to show that notwithstanding the subsisting investiture the ultimate right to the estate might be in another person than the claimant. That other person might perhaps be a nobleman, an unmarried woman, or otherwise disqualified from exercising the elective franchise. The Respondent further contended, from a review of the decisions relative to objections against claims of enrolment, that where the charter and sasine produced were ex facie liable to no objection, the court had in no instance sustained objections founded on the anterior titles.

Upon consideration of these petitions, with the answers thereto, the Court, on the 16th December 1817, pronounced an interlocutor, refusing both petitions, and adhering to the interlocutor complained of.

Against the interlocutors of the Court of Session, dated 17th May and 16th December 1817, the Appellant entered an appeal.

For the Appellant: * The feudal right, resigned by the magistrates of Edinburgh into the hands of the Barons of the Ex-[510]-chequer, as the King's Commissioners, for the purpose of new infeftment in favour of the Respondent, was the right holden by the resigners in free burgage, subject to the ancient burgal-census services and prestations. The acceptance of a resignation which implied or expressed a change of feudal tenure, or the reddendo due to the Crown was illegal and void.

By the statute 1681, c. 21, the freeholders at their head court are to make up and to revise and alter, the roll for election, "according as the estate forming the ground of claim shall be instructed to be of the holding, extent, and valuation," required by the act. The Court, therefore, of Freeholders originally, and the Court of Session, by way of appeal, have express authority under the acts (1681, c. 21, and 16 Geo. 2, c. 11) to investigate and ascertain the holding or tenure of the lands in respect of which a freeholder claims to be enrolled; and if it be admitted, that where it appears possible or probable that an opposite claim may be made in respect of the same estate, there is no jurisdiction to inquire where the title is clear on the face of the deeds produced; yet the objection in this case does not proceed on a preferable right in a third party, but upon the allegation that the freehold on which the Respondent claims to be enrolled is non-existent: that his estate lies not in the county but in the borough of Edinburgh. This is a clear ground of distinction, and the authorities show that it is well founded.

But supposing that the freeholders have no authority to inquire as to the tenure, if the title-deeds (however falsely) allege or import a sufficient freehold, yet the real nature of the tenure by which [511] the Respondent holds the estate in question is apparent on the face of the title-deeds produced by him; and the freeholders ought either to have rejected his claim, or required further evidence of his title.

In the charter, the lands are described as "portions of the lands called the Common Muir, belonging to the city of Edinburgh." They are declared to have belonged previously to the corporation, for the use of the community of the city, and to have been disposed and resigned by the provost and magistrates; and the Respondent is thereby bound to pay a blench-duty of a Scots penny, "together with such further and other duties (if any such there be) as are contained in the charters in favour of the city of Edinburgh."

The presumption is that the lands were held by burgage-tenure; if they were held by any other tenure the Respondent is bound to show it. Collateral Crown-rents and profits of the burgh, to be holden in feu-farm for a fixed annual payment, have been superadded in the grant of some of the old charters, as in that of 1603. But the territory was always held in free burgage, as appears by the whole series of charters, and particularly by the charter of 1636, which is the subsisting and regulating investiture of the royal burgh of Edinburgh, and the immediate warrant of the Respondent's investiture.

For the Respondent: The lands being expressly declared in the clause tenendas to be held by the Respondent blench of the Crown, the distinct and unequivocal terms of that clause cannot be affected by any expres-[512]-sions which may occur in other parts of the deed. The tenendas, as Mr. Erskine observes, is "that clause in a charter which points out the superior of whom the lands are to be holden, and the particular tenure under which they are to be enjoyed, whether by blench-farm, feu-farm," etc. It is by that clause, therefore, that the proper tenure of the lands is regulated; and any expressions which may occur in any other parts of the charter must either be interpreted in conformity with that clause, or be held to have crept into it by mistake. But the charter in truth contains no expression inconsistent with the explicit terms of the tenendas. It no where describes these lands as lying within the city of Edinburgh, as having ever been liable in burgage-prestations, or as having ever been held by a burgage-tenure. It is no doubt true that the lands are described as having once belonged to the city of Edinburgh, and as having been part of the burrough-muir; but that circumstance by no means leads to the conclusion that the lands were held burgage. A burgh may hold lands of the Crown in feu-farm or blench-farm, as well as burgage; and it was accordingly admitted in the petition and complaint that many of the subjects contained in the charters in favour of the town of Edinburgh are held in blench-farm. The circumstance, therefore, of these lands which are situated within the county of Edinburgh having once belonged to the town, can afford no presumption that they are incapable of being held by the tenure so distinctly marked out in the tenendas.

Nor does such a presumption arise from the terms [513] of the reddendo, which stipulates for the sum of a penny Scots "nomine althae firmae, si petatur tantum cum talibus ulterioribus seu alteris divoriis (si tales sint) in cartis in favorem praepositi, magistratum, et communitatis civitatis Edinburgensis content." Had these other duties been described to be the census burgalis, with burgh-service used and wont, it might have been contended that there was some inconsistency between the tenendas and the reddendo. But no allusion whatever is made to the payment of burgh-cess, to watching and warding, or to any other prestations which are peculiar to burgage-holding. There is not therefore any reason to presume that the other duties here referred to are at all inconsistent with the tenure described in the tenendas.

The Respondent having laid before the meeting of freeholders a charter and sasine ex facie liable to no objection, the freeholders did right in giving effect to that charter; and they were neither bound nor entitled to inquire into objections of any kind attempted to be established from the anterior progress of titles. The Appellant seems to admit the general rule, as laid down in Mr. Wight's treatise on elections, to be, "that the freeholders have no right to call for the warrants of the charter on which the infetment proceeds, or to object that it is not conform to the signature, or to enter into a discussion of a claimant's progress. His own charter and infetment are all that they are concerned with; and if these are ex facie formal he must be enrolled." The Appellant however contends that this rule, though applicable to all [514] questions respecting a claimant's title, as in competition with other parties, does not apply to the evidence of the tenure by which the lands are held; but neither in the statutes which regulate the constitution and powers of the court of freeholders, nor in the decisions pronounced with reference to the jurisdiction of the freeholders thus established, is there any room for the distinction attempted by the Appellant.

As to the argument, that by the clause in the Act 1681, directing the freeholders of each shire or stewartry to "make up a roll of all the freeholders within the same," "according as the same shall be instructed to be of the holding, extent, or valuation foresaid," the freeholders are empowered to investigate fully the question, Whether or not the lands claimed on are truly of the holding required by law. The clause requires, not that the lands shall be of any particular holding, but that the freeholders to be enrolled shall be of that holding. If it could be contended that the holding of lands was to be instructed in any other manner than by the existing investiture, there can be no doubt that a freeholder is of the holding in which he is infeft. When the freeholders are spoken of, the holding intended must be the holding by the existing investiture. When the act directs the freeholders to be enrolled according as the same shall be instructed to be of the holding, etc. it merely requires that they shall be de presenti infeft under the King in feu, ward, or blench.

This clause must be interpreted in conformity with the previous clause, which defines the qualifications [515] necessary for enrolment, and which it has already been shown looks no farther than the existing investiture. It is absurd to suppose that the statute, in describing the duty of the freeholders in making up the roll, should require them to go beyond the qualification which in the preceding clause that very statute had pointed out as the warrant on which enrolment was to proceed. The provision that the roll should be made up as the qualifications of the claimants should be instructed, can therefore make no change whatever in the nature of that qualification, as being an existing investiture and possession under the King in feu, ward, or blench.

As to the argument founded upon the connection in the clause of the words, holding, extent, and valuation, that, as the freeholders are not limited to any particular instruments as evidence of the latter, they are as little limited with regard to the former; although by the Act 16 Geo. II. cap. 11, it is provided that no one can be enrolled in respect of the old extent of his lands, unless such extent is proved by a retour prior to 16th Sept. 1681, yet it perhaps cannot be contended that such a retour is in itself an instrument constituting the old extent. It may perhaps be regarded merely as evidence, in opposition to which contrary evidence may be received. Were such a retour regarded as an instrument constituting the old extent, the freeholders would unquestionably be limited to that instrument, and would not be at liberty to look beyond it, or to consider what the extent ought to have been. As to valuation, if the actual valuation is established by a decree of the commissioners of supply, which is [516] liable to no ex facie objection, the freeholders are bound to give effect to that decree, and are not entitled to refuse enrolment on the ground that the lands claimed on ought to have been differently valued. So also in relation to the holding, the Respondent has already shown that it is constituted by the charter and infeftment. The freeholders, therefore, cannot look beyond the instruments by which the holding is constituted, or enter into the question, What it ought to have been.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

SIR WILLIAM FORBES, of Pitsligo, baronet.—Appellant: JAMES GIBSON, of Inglistone, esq.—Respondent [23 May, 1821].

A SUMMONS in an action at the suit of a freeholder, praying that a charter and infeftment may be reduced (absolutely), on the ground that the tenure has been unwarrantably changed from burgage to blench, for the purpose of giving persons qualification, cannot without limitation be sustained. Semb. that such freeholder has no title to sue unless the conclusion of the summons can be limited to the question of enrolment.

Whether the Court of Session has power to qualify the conclusion of the summons, and limit the reduction of the charter, etc. to the effect of excluding the party claiming under it from the roll of freeholders. Quære.

Supposing the reduction to be capable of being, and to be in fact so limited, whether the case does not fall under the provisions of the statute 16 Geo. 2, c. 11, s. 4, by which the period of bringing complaints is limited to four months. Quære.

Whether an action at common law to reduce the charter generally, or as conferring a freehold qualification, is competent after the lapse of four months from the time of enrolment. Quære.

As soon as the interlocutors, dismissing the summary complaint mentioned in the preceding case, had become final in the Court of Session, the Respondent raised two actions of reduction against the Appellant, for the purpose of setting aside his charter and infeftment. In one of these actions, Mr. Gibson, with certain other persons, pursue, in the character of a burghess of the City of Edinburgh, and as thus having a title and an inte-[518]-rest to prevent an alienation of property belonging to the burgh.

The other action was brought by Mr. Gibson in the character of a freeholder of the county.

The summons in this action, which is dated December 18, 1817, purports to be brought at the instance of "James Gibson of Inglistown, esq. one of the freeholders, electors of a commissioner to represent and serve in Parliament for the county of Edinburgh or Mid Lothian, and as such standing upon the roll of the said freeholders, and so having a substantial interest to prevent all persons not possessing the qualifications required by law, from being enrolled on the said roll of freeholders, to whose great hurt and prejudice the writings hereinafter called for to be reduced, are made, granted, and expedite; and, therefore, having good and undoubted right and title to raise, intent, follow forth, and pursue the action of reduction underwritten." The summons then calls for production of the Crown charter in favour of the Appellant, dated 20th December 1814, and the instrument of sasine following thereon; and then sets forth the grounds and reasons of reduction.

The first reason of reduction sets forth in general terms, that the deeds sought to be reduced are false, improbate, and invalid. The second ground of reduction is, that although the lands of Greenhill are described in the charter and instrument of sasine as lying within the county of Edinburgh, they are truly situated within and are a part of the royal burgh of Edinburgh; and in support of this assertion, reference is made to the [519] charter granted by Charles I. dated 23d of October 1636. The third ground of reduction is, that the holding in the charter and sasine sought to be reduced has been unwarrantably altered from burgage to blench. And the fourth ground is, "that such an alteration of the holding is contrary to the Act 6th of Queen Ann. chap. 26, intituled, 'An Act for settling and establishing a Court of Exchequer in the north part of Great Britain, called Scotland,' and by the former commissions, and former law and practice therein referred to and recognized, it is not lawful or warrantable for the Barons of our Exchequer to receive resignations, or to pass signatures, unless according to the form and tenor of the former infeftments, and for payment to us and our royal successors of the rents and services therein expressed: as the said Act of Parliament, and said commissions therein referred to, more fully purport. Whereas the said charter, and the signature whereon it appears to have been expedite, are altogether and essentially disconform to the tenor of the former infeftments, whereon the pretended resignation of the said lands of Greenhill proceeded, and the same must have been obtained by the defender per obreptionem, of us and our said barons, contrary to and in express violation of the powers and instructions under which alone they act in the discharge of that branch of their official trust and duty."

The conclusion of the summons is in the following terms: "And therefore, and for other reasons to be proponed at discussing, the said charter called for, [520] with the signature and precept on which the same proceeded, and infeftment thereon, with all that has followed or may follow upon the same, ought and should be reduced, rescinded, retreated, cassed, annulled, decerned, and declared by decret of our Lords of Council and Session to have been from the beginning, to be now, and in all time coming, void and null, and of no avail, strength, force, or effect in judgment, or outwith the same in time coming."

By the statute 16 Geo. II. chap. 11, sect. 4, the term for bringing complaints against the enrolment of freeholders is limited to four months. And the same statute farther provides, "that if no such complaint shall be exhibited within the time aforesaid, the freeholder enrolled shall stand and continue upon the roll until an alteration of his circumstances shall be allowed by the freeholders at a subsequent Michaelmas meeting, or meeting for election, as a sufficient cause for striking or leaving him out of the roll." The Appellant contended, that as it was the object of this action to defeat his right of enrolment, it was not competent, as not having been brought within the four months prescribed by the statute, and farther, that, independently of this objection, the pursuer, as one of the freeholders standing upon the roll, had no proper title and interest to insist in an action for reducing and setting aside the charter and infeftment called for; that such an action, at the instance merely of a freeholder, was unprecedented; and, were a precedent for it to be now established, every freeholder would be exposed to be called upon to [521] produce the whole progress of his title deeds, and to lay open his charter-chest, at the pleasure of any other freeholder who might choose to institute an action of reduction. He farther maintained that the action was groundless upon the merits.

The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the preliminary defence that the pursuer has no sufficient title to insist in the present action of reduction of the defender's charter and sasine, and having considered the process, and seen the proceedings in the former petition and complaint, and attended to the interlocutors of the court, by whom the complaint was dismissed as not competent on the 29th of May 1818, repelled the objection to the pursuer's title to insist in this action of reduction.

Against this interlocutor the Appellant gave in a short representation which the Lord Ordinary refused, and adhered to the interlocutors represented against.

The Appellant then presented a full representation; and, upon advising the same with answers, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lord Ordinary having considered this representation, with the answers thereto, and whole process, finds that the pursuer has a sufficient title to insist in the present action for reducing the defender's title, in so far as the pursuer is interested as one of the freeholders, standing on the roll of freeholders of the county of Mid Lothian as libelled, to reduce the defender's said titles; and with this explanation refuses the desire of the representation and adheres to the interlocutor represented against."

[522] Against these interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary the Appellant presented a reclaiming petition to the second division of the court. When the petition came to be advised, with answers, the Judges being unanimously of opinion, that the question of title was one of great importance, appointed a hearing of counsel to take place in their presence.

After this hearing had taken place, the Judges of the second division of the court delivered opinions to the effect of sustaining the title to pursue, and accordingly pronounced an interlocutor, refusing the petition, and adhered to the interlocutors complained of, reserving all questions as to expenses.

These judgments being supposed to be interlocutory in their nature, the Appellant obtained leave* to appeal; and accordingly appealed against them.

* By the Act 13d Geo. III. c. 151, intituled, "An Act concerning the administra-

For the Appellant: The action is in substance to remove the Respondent from the roll of freeholders, and not having been commenced within four months from the enrolment, it is by the provisions of the 15 Geo. II. c. 11, s. 4, rendered incompetent; and [523] the Court of Session has no ordinary or common-law jurisdiction upon the subject.

On this first defence there is no express finding in the interlocutors. But as no party can have a title to insist in an incompetent action, the interlocutors sustaining the title to pursue, do in effect overrule the objection to the competency.

The statute 16 Geo. II. c. 11, s. 4, while it confers upon any freeholder standing on the roll the right of complaining against any enrolment "within four calendar months" after it takes place, provides, on the other hand, "that if no such complaint shall be exhibited within the time aforesaid, the freeholder enrolled shall stand and continue upon the roll, until an alteration of his circumstances be allowed by the freeholders at a subsequent Michaelmas meeting," etc. Supposing the action to be directed (as it has been represented by the Respondent, and regarded in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary) merely against the Appellant's enrolment, or his right to continue upon the roll, the question is, whether such action can be competently brought, after the statutory period for agitating complaints relative to enrolment has expired.

The statutory period had elapsed before the present action was brought. The Appellant's enrolment took place on the 1st of October 1816. But the present action was not raised until December, 1817.

The Court of Session has no original jurisdiction in questions of enrolment. When the right or duty of freeholders was that of attending parlia-[524]-ment in person, it does not appear that there was any ordinary or original jurisdiction in any court, excepting parliament itself, by which any person could be compelled to exercise, or be restrained from exercising, that right or duty.

The statute declares, "that no other objection shall be competent in parliament or convention, but what shall be contained in the instruments taken as thereby provided. And in case objections be made when a parliament or convention is not called, a particular diet shall be appointed by the meeting, and intimate to the parties controverting, to attend the Lords of Session for their determination; who shall determine the same at the said diet summarily according to law, upon supplication, without further citation."

This statute, then, so far from recognizing any ordinary jurisdiction in the Court of Session as to the political right of voting for a representative in Parliament, constitutes only a very special and limited authority in that court—an authority meant to be exercised only "in case objections be made when a parliament or convention is not called."

The act 16 Geo. II. chap. 11, makes no allusion to any such ordinary jurisdiction. The only check which it provides against improper enrolments, is the summary complaint to be brought within four months after the date thereof; and the same statute declares that in the event of no complaint being brought within that period, the freeholder enrolled shall have a right to remain upon the roll, until an alteration of his circumstances shall take place.

The avowed object of the action is to obtain a [525] judgment that the appellant ought not to stand upon the roll: or, in other words, to obtain a warrant for expunging his name from the roll. But no alteration whatever has taken place in the circumstances of the Appellant; and, therefore, no proceeding can be competent, of which the sole purpose is to prevent the Appellant from continuing on the roll. Such a proceeding as the present is incompetent, not only because there is no authority for an action of this sort in the Court of Session at all, i.e. an original ordinary action tion of justice in Scotland, and concerning appeals to the House of Lords," it is, inter alia, enacted, (sect. 15.) "that hereafter no appeal shall be allowed to the House of Lords from interlocutory judgments, but such appeals shall be allowed only from judgments or decrees on the whole merits of the cause, except with the leave of the division of the Judges pronouncing such interlocutory judgments; or except in cases where there is difference of opinion among the Judges of the said division." of reduction or declarator relative directly to the right of a freeholder continuing on the roll; but because, at any rate, if it be supposed that, by equitable interpretation, an action might be admitted in a form not precisely warranted by the statutes, this at least must not be so done, as to defeat so important a regulation as the limitation of four months, and the security given to persons who have remained on the roll without challenge during that period.

This limitation would be altogether nugatory, were it found competent to institute after the lapse of the four months, a summons of reduction instead of a summary complaint. Were such actions found competent, all those parties who in times past have neglected to complain within the four months, would be empowered to bring forward their challenge in the form of an action of reduction.

As this is the first attempt to challenge directly the right of a freeholder to remain upon the roll through the medium of an ordinary action, the Appellant cannot refer to any previous judgment pronounced in such an action. But the decision in [526] the case of Anstruther Easter *, though it related to burgh politics, strongly supports the principle that a statutory limitation with regard to the time within which the challenge of a vote is competent, cannot be evaded by the device of bringing that challenge in the form of an action of reduction.

Assuming that the decision of the Court of Session in the summary question is well founded, the effect must be that the Appellant has a right to continue upon the roll until there shall occur such an "alteration of his circumstances," as the law holds sufficient for striking him off.

The question is, whether such alteration of circumstances can be effected in the manner here attempted by the Respondent. If the Appellant had conveyed away so much of the lands upon which he is enrolled as to reduce the valuation of the remainder below the legal standard, or the officers of the Crown had reduced the charter and infeftment thereon, on the ground that the Crown had been illegally deprived of its just rights by an improper change of the holding, or otherwise, an alteration of circumstances would have occurred, entitling the respondent, or any other freeholder, to insist that the Appellant should be struck off the roll. In like manner, if a reduction had been successfully brought by the corporation of the city of Edinburgh, on the ground of the conveyance in the Appellant's favour having been fraudulently obtained; or even at the instance of any individual who considered his own right to the subjects conveyed preferable to that of the Appellant; any freeholder upon the roll would [527] be at liberty to produce the decree in such reduction as a warrant for striking the Appellant off the roll, in respect of an alteration in his circumstances. Such alteration cannot be produced by an action of reduction, the purpose of which is to investigate the anterior titles of the freeholder, who has produced at the freeholders court an investiture ex facie valid.

The Respondent's present attempt is unprecedented, and repugnant to those principles which have always hitherto been held to regulate the title to pursue reductions of a feudal investiture, and beyond those limits within which the power of investigation as to disputed enrolments is by law confined.

It is impossible to interpret the expressions of the summons as concluding for any thing short of a total reduction of the feudal investiture by which the Appellant holds his estate. It does not very clearly appear what is meant to be the effect of the qualified judgment of the Lord Ordinary. But it is impossible to find the charter and infeftment partly null and partly valid. So long as the charter subsists to the effect of enabling the Appellant to hold the lands therein contained, it must also enable him to maintain his place upon the roll. So long as the charter remains, the tenure in that charter must remain also. It is in vain to contend that the tenure ought to have been different from that which the charter contains. The charter does not merely afford evidence as to the nature of the holding. It in fact constitutes that holding; and it is impossible to find that the tenure is different from that which the charter sets forth. So long, therefore, as the charter remains [528] unreduced, the lands in question must be held blench of the Crown; and, while that holding continues, it is in vain to contend that the Appellant, who has in all other respects the qualification required by law, shall be expunged from the roll. So long as the charter and infeftment subsist, the Appellant has the qualifications required by the statute 1681, chap. 21. He in particular has the qualification of a public infeftment in lands, "holding feu, ward, or blench of His Majesty;" and to ordain him to be turned off the roll, while that qualification continues, would be to act directly in the face of the provisions of that statute.

Even supposing that the conclusions of the present action could be modified, it cannot be proceeded in without laying open the whole progress of the title-deeds, at least so far back as the charter 1603. Supposing the investigation demanded by the Respondent to take place, it is only by a laborious search into the titles, so far back as they can be traced, that there is any chance of ascertaining what has all along been the holding of the lands in question. But the law does not on slight grounds allow a charter-chest to be laid open. A party who challenges the subsisting investiture of an estate, is bound to show that the effect of setting aside that investiture will be to vest the estate in himself, or in those for whom he acts. A reduction on the head of death-bed can proceed only at the instance of the heir at law, because he would succeed in the event of the death-bed deed being set aside. If a conveyance has been granted on the eve of bankruptcy to the prejudice of the creditors on a sequestrated [529] estate, the trustee on that estate can alone challenge it by reduction; because he alone, in the event of obtaining decree of reduction, has the title to recover the subject fraudulently conveyed away, and to make it available as a fund of division among the creditors. In like manner, in almost every other case where a challenge is brought, the title to pursue must be founded on a service general or special, according to the situation of the subject in dispute, or upon the right of apparenay; so as to satisfy the Court, in the first instance, that the effect of the reduction being successful will be to vest the subject of it in the pursuer. Even where a challenge is brought by a remote substitute in an entail, the same principle is not lost sight of. If the object of the action is to recover lands alienated in defraudation of the entail, the effect of it is to vest these lands in the heirs of entail, of whom the pursuer is one, and whose interests, therefore, he is entitled to protect; and if the action infers an irritancy, so as to put the estate past the present possessor, the effect of the challenge clearly is to bring the succession nearer to the pursuer than it would otherwise be.

But no freeholder is entitled, merely in that capacity, to demand inspection of the warrants on which a charter proceeds. In all the statutes, from 1427, c. 101, downwards, the qualification of persons claiming enrolment is made to depend on the present possession and investiture of the feudal estate. The act 1681 confers the privilege particularly on those "who at that time shall be publicly infeft" in lands "holding feu, ward, or blench of his [530] Majesty." Every freeholder is entitled to require that the actual investiture shall be ascertained; but (that investiture being constituted by charter and infeftment) the production of these, and the mid-couples, if any, necessary to show the claimant's connection with them, are all that any freeholder can require.

If it be admitted, that a freeholder cannot interfere so far as relates to the dispositive clause in a charter, on what principle can he be entitled to interfere with regard to the clause tenendas, or the clause reddendo? These clauses are just as essential to the charter and infeftment as the dispositive clause.

There is no foundation for the distinction taken by the Respondent between the power to investigate the titles of individuals upon a competition or adverse claim, and the power to investigate the nature of the tenure. In either case the freeholders cannot look beyond the subsisting investiture.

If it were so, burgage holding does not, or at least did not, constitute a separate manner of holding, but was a species of ward holding; with this only difference, that in a proper ward holding, the vassal is a single person, whereas in a burgage tenure it is a community (Craig, lib. 1, dieg. 10, s. 31 and 36. Erskine, book 2, tit. 4, s. 8). The objection therefore is, not against the quality of the estate itself; for lands held ward of the Crown are of the tenure required by the act 1681; but the objection is, that the real vassal is disqualified from voting in county elections, and that the estate claimed on is represented by the member for the burgh. It is an [531] objection precisely of the same kind, as the objection that the estate claimed on truly belongs to a peer, and therefore cannot be made the basis of county representation. But in both cases the answer is insuperable, that the freeholders are entitled to look only to the actual investiture, and have no right to attempt to penetrate into the anterior titles.

Nor is the case without remedy, for supposing the tenendas and reddendo in the charter to have been improperly altered, the Crown would have a title and interest to institute a reduction. The Commissions of Exchequer prior to the union contain instructions under which the Barons of the Exchequer are still bound to act, in granting new donations and dispositions. One clause in the commissions directs that lands, to be given out from the Crown in future, should continue to be held "secundum formam et tenorem antiquorum infeofamentorum, ac solvendo census et prestando alias conditiones inibi expressas." So if the corporation has been illegally deprived of an estate formerly belonging to it, the corporation may bring a reduction, in order to set aside the conveyance, by which it has been aggrieved; or it is even possible that an individual burgess may be entitled to complain, provided he can show that his interests have been affected by means of an illegal act.

As to the argument that this is a question of public law which requires that the holding in a charter shall not be changed, how is it more a matter of public law, than that an estate held under a strict entail shall not be alienated, or that [532] property belonging to a peer shall not confer a right to vote in county elections?

It has been alleged, that those laws which prohibit salmon-fishing at certain times of the year, or with machinery of a certain description, were intended for the benefit of the community; and it was further said, that upon the same principle on which an upper heritor in a river may challenge such illegal modes of fishing, the Respondent may institute a reduction of the Appellant's charter and infeftment. But the principle on which an upper heritor in a river is allowed to interfere, is, that his own private rights in the salmon of that river are directly invaded, and that he would thus have a title and interest to pursue, even although the public interest was not at all affected.

There is no authority for holding, that where the title to pursue is called in question, it can derive the smallest support from the circumstance that the act challenged is alleged to have been done in violation of the public law. No party, not having otherwise a proper title and interest to state the objection, can proceed on the ground that the public law has been violated. (Lord Galloway v. Burgesses of Wighton, Feb. 10, 1631. Dict. 7835. Colt and others v. Town of Musselburgh, 9th Jan. 1756. Dict. 7782.)

The case supposed, that by a false description in the charter, a person, whose estate is situated in one county, might claim enrolment in another, is different. The freeholders have always the means, by [533] reference to the valuation-roll, of ascertaining whether or not the lands are within the county. It is incumbent on the claimant to show that the lands claimed upon are rated in the valuation and cess-books of the county to which the claim applies. Unless the claimant can point out the lands claimed on in the valuation-books of the county, the freeholders are entitled to refuse enrolment, or to apply by petition and complaint to the Court of Session, in order that the claimant, who may have been admitted under such circumstances, may be struck off the roll. Accordingly, in the case of Abercromby v. Alwood (June 17, 1777), the Court of Session, upon a summary complaint, ordered the claimant's name to be expunged, upon this ground, inter alia, that the lands claimed upon had always paid cess to the burgh of Banff, and did not appear at all in the valuation or cess books of the county.

It is true, that where a claim of enrolment is founded upon the old extent as ascertained by a retour prior to 1681, the freeholders are entitled to look into the anterior progress. But in that case the anterior titles may be examined, not for the purpose of cutting down the subsisting investiture, but merely in order to ascertain whether the lands vested in the claimant are truly the lands to which the retour applies. By the act 16 Geo. 2, c. 11, the only evidence of the old extent which can be admitted is a retour dated prior to the 16th of September 1681. It is incumbent on the claimant to establish the identity of the lands contained in his charter with those contained in the [534] retour. The identity of the description will in general be sufficient for that purpose; but if any objecting freeholder is able to trace from the record any part of the lands in the retour into the possession of other parties than those through whom the claimant has received his right, it will then be necessary for the claimant to obviate that objection, by tracing that part of the lands back again into his own person or that of his authors.

The latitude which has been allowed to freeholders in challenging decrees of commissioners of supply in dividing cumulo valuations, has no connection with the question of feudal investiture.

If the title of the Respondent to insist in this action were to be ultimately sustained, there is scarcely any estate in Scotland of which the title deeds may not be laid open, upon pretences similar to those upon which the present action proceeds.

For the Respondent: The single point under discussion is the title of the Respondent to reduce, by an ordinary action at law, the deeds by which the Appellant has obtained admission to the roll of freeholders for the county of Edinburgh.

Lands held burgage afford no qualification for a vote in the election of a member for a Scottish county. According to the statute 1681, none can vote at such elections but those who are infeft in property and superiority, and in possession of a forty-shilling land of old extent, or infeft in and "liable in public burdens for his Majesty's supplies, for £400 of valued rent, whether kirk-lands now holden of the King, or other lands holden feu, [535] ward or blench of his Majesty, as King or Prince of Scotland."

The Respondent undertakes to establish in the action of reduction, 1st, That the lands in question were burgage-lands; 2d, That the tenure was changed from burgage to blench, by the charter of resignation forming part of the Appellant's titles; and, lastly, That such change was incompetent and unlawful: so that the lands are still in every question regarding elective franchise, to be considered as burgage, and as forming no part of the property in the county of Edinburgh entitled to vote at county elections.

According to Wight (Law of Elect. p. 209) "It has become a pretty common practice for the royal burghs to allow part of their burgage-lands to be held feu of themselves. But even although, after doing so, they were, by connivance, to convey the superiority to a purchaser, so as to make way for his obtaining a charter from the Crown, that would not confer upon him a right to vote, or entitle him to be enrolled as a freeholder. The lands still remain truly burgage, and their owners are represented by the member for the burgh."

According to Bell (Law of Elect. p. 72), "Where a burgh has feued out part of the common property of the burgh, to be held of the burgh in feu: and where, afterwards, in order to give a freehold qualification to the feuar, the steps necessary for acquiring a Crown holding have been connived at, still the right thus constituted over burgage property is incapable of holding a freehold qualification: for [536] this plain reason that the subject is truly burgage, and is already represented in Parliament."

According to these opinions, the measure by which the tenure of the lands in question has been apparently changed from burgage to blench, constitute a fraud, by which lands, incapable of affording a freehold qualification, have been converted into property ex facie conferring that franchise: and by which, as affording such apparent title, a person has been admitted to the roll who is as destitute of qualification as if his property were situate in another country.

The title of a freeholder to reduce these deeds is unquestionable. The requisites for sustaining a legal and complete qualification may be classed under two general heads; 1st, Titles of property ex facie valid, that is an unobjectionable charter and sasine; and, 2d, That the lands contained in the charter and sasine are of the value, situation, and character capable of legally conferring the elective franchise. Thus, although a person is vested with certain lands, by an unobjectionable charter and sasine, it is absolutely necessary, in addition, that the lands so vested should be of the valuation required by law, and should be situate within the county. Now, under the last head of requisites, the Respondent maintains, and indeed the Appellant seems to admit, must be included the tenure under which the lands are held, as being feu, ward, or blench of the King. And it seems to follow, by necessary consequence, that a freeholder must have a title to set aside deeds, by which this last-men-[537]-tioned requisite, the proper tenure has been attached to lands which he undertakes to prove are incapable of receiving it: by which, lands held burgage have been converted into blench or feu, contrary, as he maintains, to their inherent and legal ineapacity of admitting such a change of character. Every freeholder is intrusted by law with the guardianship of the purity of the roll, and is, of course, entitled to challenge and prevent every attempt to attach that right of admission, which the law exclusively limits to estates of a particular class and extent, to one defective in either requisite. In a certain class of cases, where the matter falls strictly within the cognizance of the court of freeholders, and where the injury arises from the erroneous decision of that court upon points properly within their cognizance, the interest is protected, and the freeholder's title exercised in the form of a summary petition and complaint to the Court of Session. But it is perfectly well known, that, from the most obvious considerations of expediency, the court of freeholders is only vested with a limited jurisdiction, or rather with a limited power of inquiry; and, where the wrong done either lies beyond their jurisdiction, or demands an investigation, which their power of taking proof does not reach, any freeholder has an interest, and a legal title, to obtain redress, by instituting an action at common law, in the form proper for that purpose. Accordingly, the title of a freeholder to institute such actions has been frequently recognized in cases exactly analogous to the present. It has been already mentioned, as one of the [538] requisites for sustaining the freehold qualification, that the lands should be of the valuation fixed by law. In the court of freeholders, the only evidence which can be demanded, and which they are bound to receive, is that afforded by the cess-books of the county, and the decreets of division pronounced by the commissioners of supply, in cases where the division of property has rendered necessary a new apportionment of the valued rent. It is quite undeniable, that, in the court of freeholders, and in the Court of Session, sitting in review of their judgments, by petition and complaint, decreets of division by the commissioners of supply are held probatum probata of valuation, against which no objection can be received. But although this evidence is beyond the reach of challenge of the court of freeholders, it is now fixed law, that any individual freeholder may bring an ordinary action at law for setting aside those decreets, and may, by thus establishing the defects of the evidence of valuation, ultimately procure the expulsion of the claimant from the roll. This point was decided in the cases of Ross v. Mackenzie (March 10, 1774), and Earl of Fife v. Duke of Gordon (June 16, 1774); which decisions have generally been understood as removing all doubts as to the freeholder's title to reduce. According to Wight (Wight, p. 185), it has been doubted whether an action of this sort be "competent to a freeholder who has no interest in challenging a decision but to support objections to the enrolment of others. But when that point came to be warmly debated, and deliberately [539] considered, in a question from the county of Inverness, the Court of Session sustained the title, and repelled the objection. A similar judgment was pronounced in a question between the Duke of Gordon and the Earl of Fife. It is true, that, in that case, one of the pursuers had an undoubted right to challenge the decision, being himself immediately affected by it." But the court sustained the title of the pursuers in general, although the rest had no such interest. And, since that period, reductions of decreets of division of valuation, at the instance of a freeholder, having no other interest, have become common, and the title is now universally allowed to be unchallengeable.

The same inference may be drawn from another decision in the case of the Earl of Fife v. Gordon (Morison, 8850. July 8, 1774), where the title of an individual freeholder was sustained, to establish, in an ordinary action at law, an objection against a freehold qualification, which did not fall within the jurisdiction of the court of freeholders.

The judgment in that case is decisive of the present question. The sasines there in dispute were ex facie complete and valid; and the date of registration appearing upon them was as much beyond challenge in the court of freeholders as the description of the tenure in the present case; yet there the title of a freeholder to insist in an action of declarator, that the apparent date was not the true date, was sustained; and was sustained, although the claimants had been rejected, for the [540] purpose of enabling the opposing freeholder to support what would otherwise have been untenable, the rejection of those claims of enrolment.

From these numerous cases, the Respondent is entitled to assume, that the legal title of a freeholder is not limited to that which he may exercise by petition and complaint; but that, on the contrary, he has, at common law, a legal title and interest to maintain and prosecute actions for obtaining redress against invasions of the purity of the roll, which neither the freeholders sitting as a court, nor the Court of Session, sitting in review of their proceedings, could possibly take cognizance of. Indeed so far from this latter circumstance excluding his interest, it is precisely the incompetency of applying for redress by petition and complaint, which, in the case of decret of revision, and others of the same kind, establishes his undoubted legal interest to insist at common law in actions of reduction. When a freeholder may legally state an objection either to the title or valuation of a claimant in the court of freeholders, or in a petition and complaint to the Court of Session, it might be maintained that he had no legal interest to insist in actions of reduction, which were not necessary to defend the purity of the roll, and which might affect the interest of his adversary in matters totally unconnected with his claim of enrolment. But when an objection lies beyond the reach of the court of freeholders, when they, sitting as a court, are bound to receive as evidence, either of tenure or valuation, documents which however ex facie satisfactory, are really and substantially defective, it [541] seems quite clear that the title of a freeholder must be sufficient to entitle him to establish those defects in the ordinary course of law.

That the court of freeholders, and every individual freeholder appealing from their judgment, by petition and complaint, is limited to the actual existing investiture, and cannot inquire into the preceding titles, may be admitted. But that limitation cannot apply to cases where the object of the freeholder is to ascertain, by an action at common law, that the actual existing investiture, though apparently conferring a qualification, is not really entitled to that effect. Although the court of freeholders may be bound to hold the charter and sasine presented to them, as probatio probata of the tenure, just as they were bound to admit a decret of division as probatio probata of valuation; and they may no more be entitled to investigate the anterior titles in the one case than they are entitled to investigate the anterior rates or valuations of the different portions of land upon which the decret of division rests, yet if, in the latter case, there is a power in an action of reduction at common law to reach these anterior calculations, and to rectify the error thus proved to exist, the Respondent, holding precisely the same interest, must have a title to correct an error equally fatal, being the substitution of a tenure which the lands were incapable of receiving; and to prove the existence of that error, from the anterior titles, just as the error of the decret of division is proved, by the reference to what was equally beyond the cognizance of the freeholders, [542] the apportionment of the valuations and calculations upon which the decret of division rested.

Where attempts have been made to challenge titles of enrolment, on the ground that they were acquired from persons holding under entails, or otherwise under inability to convey, the plea of jus tertii has been sustained.

But the objection here is totally irrelevant; and the subject of reduction does not at all fall within the class of cases where jus tertii can be pleaded. The Respondent does not deny the Appellant's right to the lands, or the efficacy of the conveyance by which he acquired it. But, to warrant enrolment, evidence is necessary, not only of the claimant's right, but proof that the lands are of the situation, value and legal character required by law. It is their defect in this last quality, which it is the object of the present reduction to establish. The Respondent does not deny the right of the Appellant to those lands; but he maintains that their tenure is burgage, and the object of the reduction is to set aside the deeds by which they appear to be held blench. Here, then, the injury which it is the object of the action to redress, is, that, by the deeds sought to be reduced, a freehold qualification has been attached to lands, which, from their nature, are incapable of affording it; and it seems in vain to maintain, that such an objection as this comes under the objection of jus tertii, any more than an objection founded on the lands being beyond the county, or not possessing the valuation required by law. In all these cases, the objector challenges not the right of the [543] claimant to the lands, but the capacity of the lands to afford a vote; and, accordingly, where such cases have occurred, the title of the objector to reduce the deeds by which an apparent qualification has been attached to the lands, has been uniformly sustained.

If it be true, as contended by the Appellant, that lands held burgage are under no inherent disability of being changed into feu or blench holding; and that their incapacity of affording a vote arises only from the disqualification of the burgh that holds them, and ceases upon their transference to persons not so disqualified, as in the illustration offered by the Appellant; the Respondent might have no interest to prosecute the action, because these suppositions tend to prove that the action itself is unfounded. But, in trying the question of title, the Respondent undertakes to make out that these propositions are false. He maintains, that lands held burgage are legally disqualified from affording a freehold qualification. That this does not arise merely from the disqualification of the burgh; but, to use the words of Mr. Wight, that "though royal burghs were, by connivance, to convey the superiority to a purchaser, so as to make way for his obtaining a charter from the Crown, that would not confer upon him a right to vote, or entitle him to be enrolled as a freeholder. The lands still remain truly burgage, and their owners are represented by the member for the burgh." In trying the question of title, then, it must be assumed that the grounds of the action may be established; and it is a violation of the rule of pleading to attempt to question the [544] title by denying the grounds of the action. The objections thus urged by the Appellant, may, if ultimately ascertained to be well founded, sustain the Appellant's defence; but he cannot now plead them in bar of the Respondent's title. To render the case of the lands held by a Peer, or lands held under an entail analogous to the present, the supposition ought to be made, that lands once held by a Peer, or once subjected to the fetters of an entail, should, by public law, be rendered incapable of ever affording a freehold qualification: on which supposition there cannot be a doubt, that any freeholder would have a legal title to reduce the deeds, by which their inherent disability was disguised, and by which they received the semblance of lands capable of affording the elective franchise.

The supposed danger of disclosing a title is imaginary. Such cases must necessarily be few, where any attempt is made to convert lands, properly burgage, into lands held feu of the Crown. Such a change can only be attempted to serve political purposes: and when it is attempted, its detection cannot justly be made the subject of complaint. As to the alleged hardship of extinguishing the rights of property held by the Appellant, upon a mere objection urged by a freeholder to its sufficiency as affording a vote, it seems to be guarded against by the qualification contained in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, "That the Pursuer has a sufficient title to insist in the present action for reducing the Defender's title, in so far as the Pursuer is interested as one of the freeholders, standing on the roll of freeholders of the county of Mid-Lothian, as libelled, to re-[545]-duce the Defender's said title." But even if this qualification were ineffectual, and if the consequence of the reduction were the extinction of the Appellant's feudal title, it could afford no objection to the Respondent's legal interest to prosecute this reduction. As the Appellant has chosen to make these rights the ground of a claim of enrolment, they must be exposed to the risk of challenge, upon any ground competently urged by a freeholder against their effect; and the right of such freeholder cannot be impaired or excluded by the consideration, that his reduction may operate more extensively than his interest to reduce. It is obvious, that as the amount of a proprietor's valued rent ascertains a great many important rights, besides that of admission to the freeholders roll, the reduction of decrees of division of valuation, may lead to much more extensive consequences than mere expulsion from that roll; yet the title of a freeholder to reduce such decrees is undoubted. Again, it is obvious, that in the case of the Earl of Fife v. Gordon, the declarator, brought for the purpose of ascertaining that certain sasines were not registered on the day on which they bore to be registered, led to various important consequences, and might have extinguished the completed feudal title of the parties holding them; but that possibility was not held to exclude the Pursuer from urging the point, in prosecution of the object which, in the character of freeholder, he had in view.

As to the objection founded on the lapse of four months from this enrolment, the procedure at common law is not only independent of the statute, but [546] its object is one which could not competently have been attained by the statutory procedure by petition and complaint. The Respondent objected to the enrolment of the Appellant, on the ground that his titles contained lands which were held burgage, and which were therefore inherently incapable of affording a freehold qualification. This objection the Appellant maintained to be, and the Court of Session held to be, incompetent, as urged either in the court of freeholders, or before them, as sitting in review of the judgment of the freeholders. If this be the law, upon what reasonable grounds can it be maintained, that the Respondent is bound by the limitations of a statute of which he has been found not to have the benefit? If he shall be found to have a legal title and interest to prosecute the action of reduction, there is no authority for maintaining the incompetency of prosecuting it, after the expiry of the period fixed only for procedure, which by the argument of the other party, and by the judgment of the Court of Session, cannot possibly apply to his case.

Neither will it be found that this view can lead to any evasion of the statute. The statute might possibly be evaded, if, after the expiry of four months, actions of reduction or declarator were sustained for making good objections, which might competently have been urged in the form of petition and complaint. But there can be no evasion of the act, in disregarding the limitation of the four months, in actions for substantiating objections, which, like the present, have been held not to form a competent subject of petition and complaint: and to which, therefore, by the conditions of the argument, the act does not apply at all. Besides, it will be found, that the effect of the present action upon the rights of the Appellant as a freeholder admitted to the roll, is perfectly authorized by the terms of the statute alluded to. The statute merely provides, that if no petition and complaint shall be lodged within four months, "the freeholder enrolled shall stand and continue upon the roll until an alteration in his circumstances be allowed by the freeholders, at a subsequent Michaelmas meeting, or meeting for election, as a sufficient cause for striking or leaving him out of the roll." When the claim of any party to be enrolled is complete in all those points, to which exclusively the jurisdiction of the court of freeholders and the Court of Session, judging on petition and complaint, is limited, these points form the circumstances of the freeholder upon which he obtains an enrolment. If he has a charter and sasine ex facie good, and the evidence of valuation attested by a decree of the Commissioners of Supply, he possesses those requisites which the freeholders and the Court of Session, in the procedure by petition and complaint, must admit as the constituent parts of a freehold qualification. But if there exists in any of those constituent parts an error, which a freeholder is found to have a legal interest to correct, it is quite clear that the freeholder who corrects that error effects an alteration of circumstances, which may at any period extinguish the freehold qualification, even after the lapse of the four months. In short, such action is not a complaint against an en-[548]-rolment, but is an action to alter those circumstances which the freeholders were originally bound to receive as sufficient.

This principle (Bell on Election Law, p. 402) has been repeatedly recognised in the analogous case of reduction of divisions of valuation, which reduction it has been found competent to bring after the lapse of the four months. In a question betwixt the Earl of Fife and the Duke of Gordon, a reduction of the valuation of certain freeholders was opposed, on the ground that these freeholders had stood for more than four months on the roll, and "as, therefore no effect could be produced on these freeholds by such reduction, the reduction was incompetent. The Court (August 1774.) repelled the objections to the Pursuer's title, and found him entitled to carry on the action." "This is a judgment on the relevancy, and, consequently, proves that a decree of valuation being reduced, the reduction would be held to be a change of circumstances, which, after the four months, would entitle the freeholders to turn the person off the roll whose valuation had been by such means thrown loose." Upon this there is the following note: "In this question the following cases were referred to as precedents. A case where Mr. Pulteney having purchased the estate of Cromarty, disposed certain parcels of superiority to Mr. Rose and others, who were enrolled, and a reduction of the decree of valuation being raised after the expiry of the four months from these enrolments, it came to be argued, whether [549] such an action was competent, in respect of the lapse of four months, the pursuers having no interest in the action, but in the character of freeholders, the Court (5th July 1768.) found the action competent for reducing the decree of valuation, and sustained the Pursuer's title to insist in the action."

In another case from Lindlithgowshire, a similar judgment was given. Mr. Bruce applied to be enrolled, and no objection was stated to the decree of valuation on which he claimed: but as the Court was of opinion that the objection did not appear ex facie of the decree, the objection to his enrolment was repelled. After Mr. Bruce had stood more than four months on the Roll, a reduction of the decree of division was brought, and the decree reduced; and on this an objection was lodged to his remaining on the Roll, when the freeholders struck him off."

Even if a reduction were not in general competent after the lapse of four months, its competency in the present case is protected, by the dependence of the original petition and complaint, which was brought within four months. For though that application was rejected, on the ground of its incompetency by the Court of Session, their judgment is the subject of an appeal. But as the procedure raised within the statutory period is therefore, in one sense, in dependence, there can be no doubt of the competency of the present action, raised for the subsidiary purpose of established directly certain points, bearing upon the point at issue in that petition and [550] complaint. The Appellant will hardly deny that the present action would have been quite competent if raised during the dependence before the Court of Session of the proceedings in the petition and complaint; and that the complaint once instituted within the statutory period, of course warranted the raising of any action necessary or expedient for ascertaining any of the points involved in it. But there is no distinction between that and the present case, where the proceedings by petition and complaint are still in dependence before the House; and where, consequently, the Respondent must have, upon the very same grounds, a right to institute actions of a subsidiary nature, in support of the pleas which may ultimately warrant a judgment on the petition and complaint, ordering the Appellant to be expunged from the Roll.

The statute only limited the period within which it was competent to bring the judgment of the freeholders under the review of the Court in a summary form; but did not deprive a freeholder of his right at common law to obtain relief by an ordinary action at any time, against the injury sustained by an undue admission of an unqualified person to the rolls. As every freeholder was intrusted by law with the guardianship of the purity of the roll, he was entitled to challenge and prevent every attempt to attach that right of admission (which the law limits to estates of a particular class and extent) to one defective in any requisite. There is one class of cases in which he has a right so to do in a summary form. There is another class which demands investigation, and cannot be considered by [551] the court of freeholders; but this does not deprive a freeholder of his interest, and title to obtain redress. It is of no importance that the effect of reduction may be more extensive than his interest demands.

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor observed, that unless the Respondent could limit the conclusions of his summons to the enrolment of the Appellant he had no interest to reduce the charter; that the summons asked for a total reduction; and the utmost the Respondent could obtain by the action was, that the Appellant should be taken off the roll of freeholders: how that was to be done, by the Court of Session, did not appear:—That the judgment in the former cause was, that the freeholders had no right to inquire; and now the Appellant, who had obtained that judgment, contended that they ought to have inquired:—That the freeholders, at all events, could not inquire beyond the immediate title:—That, consistently with the judgment, a freeholder might proceed in reducing the title:—That the Judges in the court below were of opinion, that if neither the Crown nor the city interfere, a wrong may be done without a remedy; but that no remedy could be given upon a summons not stating the grievances really intended to be complained of:—That as the Court of Session had given leave to appeal before the conclusion of the cause, it must be supposed that, in their opinion, notwithstanding the form of the summons, some final judgment might be given:—[552] That the Respondent probably would contend, that the charter should be reduced so far as it gives a right of voting; and that at the next Michaelmas Court, on the ground of a change of circumstances, the Appellant should be put off the roll: That he gave no opinion on the question, whether any thing could be done under the summons in its present form, or whether it could be restricted by the Court; but that the House could do nothing on those questions until they had been decided by the Court of Session:—That the cause ought to be remitted to the Court of Session to consider the terms of the summons, and to find what remedy they are entitled to give under it, supposing the judgment under appeal to stand.

Lord Redesdale observed, that in the ordinary cases of title, the question was, to which of two individuals the property belonged: That in the case under appeal the doubt was, whether it belonged to any one, as giving a title to vote in respect of a freehold in the county: That the assessment showed, primâ facie, that the lands were in the county; but that there were further questions, whether the lands were of the proper tenure? whether the charter could alter the tenure? and whether an additional voter could thus be introduced upon the county: That the competency or incompetency of the action depended upon what the Court could do; if the Court could do nothing, the freeholder could not sue to the effect of the prayer of the bill.

[553] 23 May, 1821. “Ordered, that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session to review the interlocutors generally and especially, having regard to the summons and the prayer thereof; and to what the Court, having such regard, can or cannot, according to law, further do in this cause.”

[554] WILLIAM ARBUTHNOTT, Esq.—Appellant: JAMES GIBSON, Esq. of Ingliston.—Respondent [23 May 1821].

Whether a summons at the suit of a freeholder, praying an unlimited reduction of a charter, etc. can be limited by the Court to a partial reduction, so far as they constitute a freehold qualification.—Quære.

Whether upon such a summons (if it may be so limited) judgment can be given in a case where no application had been made to be put on the roll of freeholders, at the time when the action was commenced; but where the party became a freeholder pending the action.—Quære.

The question in this case was similar, in all essential particulars, to that depending between the Respondent and Sir William Forbes, the Appellant in the preceding case.

The lands contained in the deeds forming the title of the Appellant were part of the common muir or burgh muir of Edinburgh. The reddendo in the charter was the sum of fifty-two merks sterling, ‘tantum pro antiquo censu burgali,’ etc. ‘cum servitio burgi, solito et consueto,’

In the year 1816 a signature was passed in the Exchequer, and a new charter granted, of certain parts of the common muir of Edinburgh, there specially described. In this charter the reddendo was the sum of 6s. Scots of feu-duty.

The parts of the burgh muir contained in this charter were conveyed away in five different portions, each sufficient to afford a freehold qualification. Of these one was granted, at the price of [555] £960, to the Appellant, being then the Lord Provost of Edinburgh. The lands contained in this disposition are thus described in the charter: ‘Totas et integras illas terras et acras de lie burgh muir de Edinburgh, acquisit per demortuum Archibaldum Brown de Greenbank, etc.: Item, Totas et integras terras de Mayfield alias Newlands, cum domibus, etc.: Item, Totas et integras illas terras partes communis morae de Edinburgh, communiter vocat. lie common vel Cameron Myre, cum pertinen. earund. extenden. in tota ad quinquaginta duas acras terrae,’ etc. And the disposition was granted by the Appellant to the Appellant himself, ‘as Lord Provost aforesaid, Kincaid Mackenzie, John Young, Alexander Smellie, and John Manderston, esquires, bailies; Robert Johnston, esquire, dean of guild; and John Waugh, esquire, treasurer of the said city, all for the time being; and also the then remanent members of council, for themselves, and as representing the community of the same.’ Upon the precept of sasine contained in this charter, which was assigned in this disposition, infeftment was taken by the Appellant on the 24th July 1816, who thus obtained an apparent title to claim enrolment as a freeholder in the county of Edinburgh.

Before the Appellant's claim for enrolment was made, the Court of Session had decided in the case of Sir William Forbes, that the objection of the change of tenure could not be stated with effect in the Court of Freeholders, or in a petition and complaint against their decision. The Respondent, therefore, commenced an action of reduction against [556] the Appellant, for setting aside the titles by which these lands were made to afford a freehold qualification.

Against this action the Appellant gave in defences, denying the petitioner's title or interest to insist, and the Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor dated February 6, 1818, sustained the objection stated by the defender to the pursuer's title to insist in the present action.*

In pronouncing this interlocutor, rejecting the title of the Respondent, the Lord Ordinary was influenced by the specialty, that the Appellant had not claimed enrolment on the titles sought to be reduced. The Respondent presented two short representations against the interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary in the present action, which were refused without answers.

The Respondent then presented a petition to the Second Division of the Court, which was remitted to the Lord Ordinary, in respect that no full representation had been laid before him, with power to do as he should see cause.

In consequence of this remit, answers to the petition were ordered; upon considering which, the Lord Ordinary refused the desire of the petition, and adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

[557] The Respondent then presented a second petition to the Court: but before this petition was given in, on the 29th June, two days after the last interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, the Appellant had presented a claim of enrolment to the freeholders of the county of Edinburgh, and that claim had been admitted. Upon considering the petition, therefore, the Second Division of the Court of Session again remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary, to hear the parties further, and to do as he shall see cause. The Lord Ordinary having considered this petition, with the answers of the Appellant, pronounced the following interlocutor: 'In respect the defender has, since the date of the Lord Ordinary's last interlocutor, claimed enrolment in the roll of freeholders, and has been enrolled in virtue of the titles which have been brought under reduction by the pursuer: alters the interlocutor reclaimed against, and sustains the pursuer's title to insist in the present action for reducing the defender's said titles, in so far as the pursuer is interested, as one of the freeholders standing upon the roll of freeholders of the county of Mid-Lothian, as libelled, to reduce the defender's said titles, and assigns for satisfying the production.'

Two representations against this interlocutor for the Appellants were refused, without answers.

The Appellant then presented a petition to the Second Division of the Court, which was followed with answers for the Respondent; after considering which, and hearing counsel in their presence, the Court pronounced an interlocutor, refusing the desire of the petition, and adhering to [558] the interlocutor complained of, reserving all questions as to expenses.

Against these interlocutors, which had been pronounced since the enrolment of the Appellant, the appeal was presented.

For the Appellant, The Attorney General.

For the Respondent, Mr. J. P. Grant and Mr. W. Adam.

The cause was argued on grounds similar to those stated in the two preceding cases †.

* In a note subjoined to this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary observed, that "... difficulty occurred from the decisions sustaining the title of freeholders to reduce a division of valuation, when the party has not been admitted on the roll, etc. But still the Lord Ordinary thinks that the decision in the case of the Earl of Fife v. Gordon, 8th July 1771, and the principle upon which that case was decided, ought to regulate the present case. The point now under discussion does not appear to have been argued in the cases referred to, in which the title to reduce divisions of valuation was sustained."

† There was in this case the additional circumstance, that the judgment was pronounced upon an event which happened after the commencement of the action.

At the conclusion of the three preceding cases, the Lord Chancellor observed, that the House could not decide upon the competency or incompetency of the action, as it confessedly could not go to the extent prayed for in the summons, viz. the reduction of the charter and sasine in toto; and as the Court of Session had given no opinion on the question, whether they could restrict the summons, and how, so as to give relief at all, the House could not decide, in the first instance, what that relief should be. If it should appear that nothing could be done under the terms of the summons, there could be no competency to sue.

23d May 1821. Ordered and adjudged, That the cause be remitted to the Court of Session to review the interlocutors appealed [559] from generally and especially, having regard to the summons and the prayer thereof; and to what the Court, having such regard, can or cannot, according to law, further do in this cause; and having also especial regard to the period at which the Appellant was enrolled in the roll of freeholders.

Upon the order above reported, the Respondent having petitioned the Court of Session to carry it into effect, after various proceedings the Lords of the Second Division, on the 18th of May 1824, by a very small majority, pronounced an interlocutor; remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary that he might assign a day to the defender (Forbes) to satisfy the production; and, after such production satisfied, to make great avizandum therewith to the Court, reserving all objections to the pursuer's title, etc. The Appellant thereupon intimated his intention to appeal against the interlocutor enjoining production; but the Lord Ordinary, notwithstanding this intimation, by interlocutor dated the 29th of June 1824, assigned the 9th of July then next "for satisfying the production in the reduction libelled, with certification;" and by interlocutor dated the 10th of July, reciting that the defender (Appellant) had failed to satisfy the production, "grants certification contra non producta, and reduces and decerns and declares conform to the conclusions of the libel, etc." In consequence of this interlocutor the Appellant produced the charter and sasine called for in the summons of reduction, and at the same time presented a petition against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary above stated, praying that further procedure in the cause might be stayed until after the meeting of Parliament. Upon this petition the Lords of the Second Division, by interlocutor of the 12th of November 1824, reciting that the production had been satisfied, recalled the interlocutor, and allowed the cause to proceed. Against these interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary and the Court, Sir W. Forbes appealed to the House of Lords, and the appeal was pending until it came in its course to be near the hearing, when the matter was compromised and the appeal withdrawn.

In the other action a similar course was pursued, and, upon considering the order of remit, the Lords of Session (Second Division) [560] by interlocutor of the 18th May 1824, reciting the proceedings and the order of remit, "repelled the preliminary defence that the action was instituted prior to the period of the defender (Arbuthnott) being put on the roll of freeholders; remit, etc. to the Lord Ordinary to assign a day for satisfying the production," etc. After the pronouncing of this interlocutor the same proceedings took place (mutatis mutandis) as in the action against Forbes, and a similar appeal was entered, and pending until it was nearly in course of hearing, when the matter was compromised, and that appeal also withdrawn.

ENGLAND.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

JOHN HENRY DEFFELL.—Plaintiff in Error; THOMAS BROCKLEBANK,—Defendant in Error [25th May 1821].

[Mews' Dig. xi. 915; xiii. 268, 287. See Glabon v. Hays, 1841, 2 Man. and G. 257, 262 n.

By mutual covenants in a charter-party of affreightment it was agreed on the part of the ship-owner, that he should provide a ship, which should proceed to Jamaica, and receive on board, from the agents of the shipper, a cargo to be provided by him, according to his covenant after mentioned, and should sail with the June convoy, etc. provided the ship arrived out, and was ready to load sixty-five running days before the sailing of the convoy, which were to be accounted from the day of arrival, and being reported ready to receive goods, etc.; and on the part of the shipper, that he would provide 650 casks of produce in time for the ship to load the same, and join the June convoy, provided she arrived out and was ready to load, and notice thereof given by the agents of the shipper sixty-five running days before the sailing of the convoy, etc. and should pay, etc.

It was further provided by the charter, that if any hurricane, insurrection or invasion should happen, etc. that upon notice, the obligation of the shipper under the charter-party should cease, etc.

In an action of covenant brought by the ship-owner upon this charter-party, the declaration, after reciting the substance of the indenture, stated that the ship arrived at Jamaica, on the 27th of April, etc. and upon her arrival was seaworthy, etc. and ready to receive a cargo of, etc. according to the charter-party, whereof notice was given to the agents of the freighter, and that the ship did at, etc. receive such cargo as his agents thought fit to load on board, etc. and delivered such cargo, etc. according to the charter-party. The declaration then assigned, as a breach, that although no hurricane, etc. prevented, etc. the freighter did not [562] provide 650 casks of produce, etc. but, etc. a much smaller quantity; that is to say, etc. being a very insufficient cargo, etc. contrary to the covenant, etc. whereby the ship-owner was prevented earning profit to the amount of £2500.

The declaration then assigned, as a further breach, that although no hurricane, etc. and although the ship arrived, etc. and was ready, etc. and notice, etc. sixty-five running days before the sailing of the June convoy, etc. the freighter did not provide a sufficient cargo to be laden, etc. in time sufficient for the ship to join the June convoy, etc. but detained the ship thirty days after the sailing, etc. whereby the (shipowner) lost the use, etc. was put to expense, etc. and prevented earning freight, etc. to a large amount, to wit, £2500.

To this declaration the Defendant pleaded eleven pleas, the substance of which, as applicable to the first breach, was, that the ship did not arrive, or was not ready, or reported ready, to receive a cargo sixty-five running days before the June convoy was appointed to sail, or did actually sail, and that therefore the charter-party was void; and further, that the Defendant sailed of his own accord with an insufficient cargo.

As applicable to the second breach, the substance of the eighth and eleventh pleas was, that the Defendant did not detain the ship for any time after the sailing of the June convoy, in manner and form alleged.

To all the pleas, but the first, seventh, and ninth, the Plaintiff demurred generally. On the first plea of non est factum, the Plaintiff joined issue. The replication to the seventh plea was, that the ship was reported ready to load sixty-five days before the sailing of the June convoy. To the ninth plea, that the master sailed of his own accord with the short cargo, the Plaintiff replied, that after notice of the ship being ready to load, a reasonable time elapsed to deliver 650 casks of produce, etc. On the replications to the seventh and ninth pleas, the Defendant joined issue.

Held that the provision as to the sixty-five running days was not a condition precedent to the obligation of the freighter to furnish a cargo of 650 casks of produce, but applied only to the obligation of the ship-owner, that the vessel in such case should sail with the June [563] convoy; therefore that it was not necessary, in the assignment of the first breach, to aver that the ship arrived out, and was ready to load sixty-five days before the sailing of the June convoy. Held also, that the substance of the assignment of the second breach was the failure to produce a cargo, and not the detention of the ship; and that the plea, by taking issue on an immaterial part of the plea, admitted the material part.

This was an action of covenant brought in the court of King's Bench. The declaration stated, by a certain charter-party of affreightment, made on the 13th of January 1812, between the Defendant in error, therein described as part and managing owner of the ship Balfour, of the one part, and the Plaintiff in error of the other part; it was witnessed, that the Defendant in error had let, and the Plaintiff in error had taken and hired the said ship to freight for the voyage, and upon the terms and conditions therein contained, whereupon the Defendant in error did thereby covenant, promise, and agree to and with the Plaintiff in error, that the said ship should proceed from Whitehaven (with liberty to call at Cork if required) to Montego Bay, and upon arrival there she should be made tight, staunch, strong, and in all respects sea-worthy, and be well manned, victualled, equipped, provided, and furnished with all things needful and customary for such a vessel and her intended voyage thereafter mentioned, and should thereupon take and receive on board from the agents or assigns of the said Plaintiff in error, in Montego Bay aforesaid, from and out of the usual barquadiers, with the assistance of the ship's boats and people, and at the ship's ex-[564]pense and risk, the quantity of 450 casks of sugar and 200 puncheons of rum, and such a quantity of wood as might be requisite to stow the cargo (provided the agents of the said Plaintiff in error gave to the master notice of such their intention within ten days after his arrival) for which the master of the said ship should and would sign the accustomed bills of lading, and the said ship being therewith despatched, should set sail with the convoy that should depart from Jamaica for England in the month of June then next; provided the ship arrived out and was ready to load sixty-five running days previous to the sailing of such convoy, which days were to be accounted from the day of her arrival at Montego Bay aforesaid, and being reported ready to receive goods, and proceed under sailing instructions from the said convoy back to the port of London, and upon her arrival there deliver the said cargo in the West India Docks, agreeable to bills of lading and to the custom of the said Docks, and thereupon the said intended voyage was to end (the act of God, enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and of navigation, of what nature or kind soever, excepted), in consideration whereof the said Plaintiff in error did thereby covenant, promise and agree to and with the said Defendant, not only to provide 650 casks of produce as above stated, for the said ship Balfour, to be laden at the usual barquadiers in Montego Bay as aforesaid, and such a quantity of wood as might be requisite to stow the cargo for the port of London, and in time for her to load the same and [565] join the June convoy for England, provided she arrived out and was ready to load, and notice thereof was given to the agents of the Plaintiff in error sixty-five running days previous to the sailing of the said convoy, and on her arrival in the West India Docks, London, receive the said cargo out of her, agreeable to the bills of lading, and according to the custom of the port of London, but also well and truly to pay or cause to be paid unto the Defendant in error, or his order, in full, for the freight of the said cargo, the same freight and primage as should be given to other vessels that should load at Montego Bay for London at the same time as the said ship, to be paid at and in the usual and customary time and manner of paying such freights in the West India trade, and general average to be as customary should any accrue; provided always, and it was thereby agreed and understood by and between the said parties, that if any hurricane, insurrection, or invasion by an enemy should happen in the said island of Jamaica, so as to interfere with or prevent the intention and undertaking of Plaintiff in error, his agent or assigns should not be bound or obliged to give said ship the before-mentioned quantity of goods, but, on the contrary, it should be lawful for him or them in that event to cancel and annul the said charter-party, upon giving notice in writing to the master of the said ship of the determination so to do within ten current days after the said ship's arrival at Montego Bay, in the said island, upon which said notice the said charter-party, and every thing thereinbefore contained, should cease and be utterly void as if the same had never been made or [566] entered into, and the Defendant in error should have no claim whatsoever for freight in respect of same.

The declaration then stated, that on the 30th January 1812, the ship did sail and proceed from Whitehaven aforesaid upon her said voyage to Montego Bay, and arrived there on the 26th April 1812, and upon her arrival there was made tight, staunch, strong, and in all respects sea-worthy, and was well manned, victualled, equipped, provided, and furnished with all things needful and customary for such a vessel and for the said voyage, and was also ready to receive, and take, and load on board, from the agents or assigns of the Plaintiff in error in Montego Bay aforesaid, a cargo of sugar, and of rum, and of wood, to stow the said cargo according to the meaning and effect of the said charterparty, whereof notice was given to the agents of the said freighter; that the said ship did, at Montego Bay aforesaid, receive and take, and load on board, such a cargo of sugar, and rum, and of wood, to stow the said cargo, as the agents or assigns of the Plaintiff in error thought fit to load on board of her, for which the master of the said ship signed the accustomed bills of lading, and the said ship being therewith despatched, afterwards set sail and departed therewith from Montego Bay aforesaid, back to the said port of London, where the said ship afterwards arrived and delivered such cargo as had been so laden on board her in the West India Docks, agreeably to bills of lading and to the custom of the said Docks, and upon such delivery ended and terminated her said voyage, according to the intent and meaning of the charterparty.

[567] The declaration then assigned a breach, that, although no hurricane, insurrection, or invasion by an enemy happened in the said island of Jamaica, so as to interfere with or prevent the intention and undertaking of the Plaintiff in error to load the said ship, in the charterparty mentioned, with a sufficient cargo, according to the terms and stipulations thereof, yet the Plaintiff in error did not provide, or cause to be provided, the said 650 casks of produce, as and for the cargo of the said ship, to be laden on board thereof at the usual barquadiers in Montego Bay aforesaid, and such a quantity of wood as was requisite to stow the said cargo for the port of London, but, on the contrary, loaded on board the said ship a much smaller quantity of produce, that is to say, 156 hogsheads of sugar, and twenty-four puncheons of rum, the same being a very insufficient and incomplete cargo for the said ship, and contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said charterparty, and of the said covenant of the Plaintiff in error, so by him in that behalf made as aforesaid, whereby the Defendant in error was prevented from earning and recovering so much freight and primage as he otherwise might and would have done to a large amount, to wit, to the amount of £2500.

The declaration then assigned as a further breach, that although the Plaintiff in error was not prevented from loading the said ship in manner above agreed upon, and although the said ship arrived out at Montego Bay, and was ready to load there, and notice thereof was given to the agent of the Plaintiff in error sixty-five running days previous to [568] the sailing of the June convoy from Jamaica for England, in the said charterparty mentioned, yet the Plaintiff in error did not provide, or cause to be provided, a sufficient cargo of produce to be laden on board the said ship at the usual Barquadiers in Montego Bay aforesaid, in time sufficient for the said ship to join the said June convoy from Jamaica to England on her homeward-bound voyage to the port of London aforesaid; but the Plaintiff in error detained the said ship for a long space of time, to wit, the further space of thirty days after the sailing of the said June convoy, contrary to the form and effect of the said charterparty, and of the covenant of the Plaintiff in error in that behalf, whereby the Defendant in error during all that time not only lost the use and benefit of the said ship or vessel, but was also put to greater expense in and about the maintaining and paying the crew thereof, and was likewise prevented from earning and recovering so much freight and primage as he otherwise might and ought to have done to a large amount, to wit, to the amount of £2500.

And the Defendant in error laid his damages at £3000.

To this declaration the Plaintiff in error pleaded 1st, non est factum.

2d. That the ship upon her arrival at Montego Bay was loaded with a cargo of coals, which was not discharged from the ship for a long space of time after her arrival; and that there did not elapse sixty-five running days from the time the ship discharged the said cargo of coals, and was ready to receive a cargo of sugar and rum, to the time [569] of the sailing of the June convoy from Jamaica for England.

3d. That at the time when the ship was reported ready to receive goods, to wit, on the 27th of April in the year aforesaid, the June convoy stood appointed to sail on the 20th June following; and inasmuch as sixty-five running days could not elapse between the 27th April and 20th June, the charterparty became void.

4th. That the ship was reported ready on the 27th April in the year aforesaid, and that such ships and vessels of the June convoy as departed and sailed from Montego Bay for England departed from thence on the 29th June, and within the period of sixty-five days from the day when the ship was reported ready, whereby Plaintiff in error was discharged from his covenant in that behalf.

5th. That the ship was not reported ready sixty-five running days before the June convoy was appointed to sail and depart.

6th. That the ship was not reported ready sixty-five running days before the ships of the June convoy at Montego Bay departed and sailed from thence.

7th. That the ship was not reported ready to receive goods sixty-five days before the convoy was appointed to sail, or actually did sail; and that the master of the Balfour voluntarily remained at Montego Bay after the sailing of the convoy.

8th. After protesting that the ship did not arrive out, and was not ready to load, sixty-five running days previous to the sailing of the June convoy, avers that Plaintiff in error did not detain the said ship at Montego Bay for any time whatever after the [570] sailing of the said June convoy in manner and form alleged.

9th. That the master, after receiving on board the ship the goods mentioned in the declaration, before the residue of the cargo could be procured, of his own accord sailed with the part cargo.

10th. That the Plaintiff in error was not bound to provide the cargo for the said ship in time for her to load the same and join the June convoy, unless the ship should arrive at Montego Bay, and be there reported ready to load in sufficient time before the sailing of the said convoy, to be and remain in Montego Bay for the purpose of loading there sixty-five running days before the ship should be obliged to leave in order to join the June convoy. That the ship did not arrive, and was not reported ready to load in sufficient time before the sailing of the June convoy to have enabled the said ship to be and remain in Montego Bay sixty-five running days, for the purpose of loading there, in case the ship had joined and sailed with the June convoy.

11th. That the Plaintiff in error did not detain the ship for any space of time after the sailing of the June convoy as alleged in the declaration.

To the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 8th, 10th, and 11th pleas, the Defendant in error demurred generally, and the Plaintiff in error joined in demurrer. The demurrers came on for argument in the Court of King's Bench in Easter Term 1814, and were allowed.

Upon the 1st plea the Defendant joined issue. As to the 7th, he replied that the ship was reported ready to receive goods sixty-five days before the [571] June convoy actually did sail. As to the 9th plea, he replied, that after the ship was ready to receive a cargo, and notice thereof given, a reasonable time elapsed to deliver 650 casks of produce, etc.; and that before the ship sailed the Plaintiff in error did not deliver 650 casks, etc. but refused, etc.

On the replications to the 7th and 9th pleas the Plaintiff in error joined issue. The issues were tried at the Sittings after Michaelmas Term 1814, when a verdict was given for the Defendant in error, and general damages assessed upon both breaches.

In Easter Term 1817, the judgment of the Court of King's Bench upon a writ of error, sued out by the Plaintiff in error, was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber.

Upon these judgments a writ of error, returnable in Dom. Proc. was sued out in May 1817.

For the Plaintiff in Error: The Solicitor General and Mr. Bickersteth.

The covenant to load the ship with 650 casks of produce, etc. is discharged by the circumstance of sixty-five days not having elapsed between the time when the ship was ready to receive that cargo and the sailing of the June convoy from Jamaica, or between the time when the ship was reported ready to receive that cargo and the time when the June convoy was appointed to sail, and the Plaintiff in error was at liberty to send his produce by any other vessel: The judgments are erroneous, because it is not averred in the assignment of the first breach that the ship arrived out, and was ready to load sixty-five [572] running days previous to the sailing of the June convoy, which, according to the fair construction of the charterparty, was a condition upon which the obligation of the freighter to load the ship depended, there being no covenant to load her for any other than the June convoy. The second breach being confined to the detention of the ship is answered by the 8th and last pleas, which are admitted by the demurrer. And because the damages being general upon the whole declaration, if any one breach is bad, or is sufficiently answered by the plea, the judgment for the Defendant in error is erroneous.

If this be a condition precedent, the declaration is bad because it is not set forth (Shadworth v. Higgin, 3 Campbell, p. 383). The condition is material and important, as preventing the necessity of stipulation and questions in respect of demurrage. With respect to the goods actually put on board, it was under a new agreement, upon which freight might be recovered. The assignment of the second breach, if not bad for duplicity, as being precisely the same as the first, is qualified by the circumstance of time. It must be proved as qualified, and is limited by the qualification (Harris v. Mantle, 3 T. R. 307). In the last plea issue is taken upon the fact of the detention, as qualified in the breach. If the breach is not assigned in the terms of the covenant, it is sufficient for the Defendant by his plea to traverse it as laid. It is said that it is laid under a videlicet, but that applies only to the number of days, not to the main fact of detention.

[573] For the Defendant in error, The Attorney General and Serjeant Bosanquet.

It was not a condition precedent to the obligation on the Plaintiff in error to load the ship with 650 casks of produce, that there should be sixty-five days between the ship being ready, or reported ready, to take in the cargo, and the time of the June convoy sailing, or being appointed to sail from Jamaica, and he was not thereby discharged from his covenant, but only excused for not doing so in time to enable the ship to sail with the convoy.

The proviso has reference merely to the sailing with the convoy in case the ship arrived and was ready sixty-five running days before that time, which appears as well from the construction of that part of the contract, as from the covenant on the part of the shipper. In certain events he is excused from the payment of freight; but no provision is made for avoiding the contract in case the ship should not sail with the convoy, or not arrive and be prepared in time to do so sixty-five running days before the sailing of the convoy. It is a general rule that a covenant is not to be construed as a condition precedent unless it goes to the whole of the consideration. Where it extends only to part, it gives merely a right of action. As to the objection in point of form, the second breach consists of parts; that the cargo was not provided; that it was not provided in time; and that the ship was detained. The plea, by taking issue on the latter part, admits the former. The detention is immaterial, as being under a videlicet, and issue cannot be taken on a fact so pleaded, [574] the matters therefore alleged in the pleas as to the detention of the ship are no answer to the breach, the substance of which is the not providing a sufficient cargo.

26th March 1821. The Lord Chancellor, on mentioning the cases which stood over for judgment, observed as to the case of Deffell v. Brocklebank, that it had been stated that the twelve Judges had agreed in their judgment upon the questions raised in the case; but as he had doubts upon the subject, it was necessary that he should consider the case fully before he could advise the House to affirm the judgment.

The case was afterwards mentioned by the Lord Chancellor, and notwithstanding the doubt expressed on the former mention of the case, it was affirmed without any material observation.

25th May 1821. Ordered and adjudged, that the petition and appeal be dismissed, and that the interlocutors therein complained of be affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.

SAMUEL STIRLING, and others, accepting and acting Trustees of John Mackenzie, deceased,—Appellants: ROBERT FORRESTER, Treasurer to the Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland.—Respondent [13th June 1821].

[Mews' Dig. xi. 1292; 3 Scots R. R. 639. Discussed in Duncan, For and Co. v. North and South Wales Bank, 1880, 6 A. C. 1 at p. 19; Ward v. National Bank of New Zealand, 1883, 8 A. C. 755 at p. 765; Steel v. Dixon, 1881, 17 Ch. D. 825; Bacon v. Camphansen, 1888, 58 L. T. 852; Ruabon Steamship Co. v. London Assurance, 1900, 9 Asp. Mar. Law, Cas. 2, at p. 4.]

THE Bank of Scotland having discounted bills to the amount of £8000 which were dishonoured, the acceptors becoming bankrupts, agree with the drawers to retain the dishonoured bills, and receive the dividends which might become payable from the bankrupt estates; and, as additional security, to take four promissory notes, indorsed by four sureties, for £2000 each, to guarantee the unsatisfied bills, or any balance upon them which might remain unpaid, to the extent of £2000 each. This agreement having been carried into effect; when the notes were nearly due, upon the application of the original debtors for delay of payment, the Bank of Scotland gave up one of the promissory notes, and accepted a new one from the surety who had indorsed it; renewed notes were also given by two other of the sureties, and with the fourth surety, a treaty was carried on, respecting a renewal, pending which he died. The dishonoured bills had also been delivered over by the Bank to the original debtors, upon the treaty for the renewal of the notes.

Held, (reversing pro tanto the judgment of the Court below,) that the fourth surety and his estate, by the legal effect of the transaction, was discharged as to three-fourths, and liable only as to one fourth, of the balance due upon the dishonoured bills, after giving credit for all monies [576] received or receivable from any of the parties upon the bills, or their estates; and that, on payment of such fourth part of such balance, the Bank were responsible to the estate of the fourth surety for all future dividends upon the dishonoured bills.

A Company conducting business at Dunfermline, under the firm of James and George Spence, employed Mr. Paterson, banker in Edinburgh, as their money-broker and banker, lodging in his hands the bills which by the usage of their trade they obtained from their customers at long dates. In return, Paterson and his agents in London, Robertson and Stein, and Tod and Company, accepted bills drawn by Messrs. Spence, which were discounted with Mr. Hunt, the agent for the Bank of Scotland at Dunfermline. Mr. Hunt, and his cautioners in the bond granted, in consideration of his official trust, were liable to the Bank for these discounted bills, and all consequent loss.

In the autumn of 1810, Mr. Paterson and his agents failed, leaving unretired with the Bank of Scotland acceptances of bills drawn by Messrs. Spence to the extent of £8200. Being liable for these acceptances, Messrs. Spence proposed that the Bank should retain the acceptances by Mr. Paterson and his agents, and draw the dividends which might be due from the bankrupt estates; and for additional security, that four gentlemen should guarantee the unsatisfied bills, or any balance upon them that might remain unpaid, to the extent of £2000 each. This proposal was accepted by the directors of the Bank; and accordingly Mr. Mackenzie, the Appellants constituent, indorsed to Mr. [577] Hunt a promissory note for £2000 at eighteen months, granted by Messrs. Spence, and bearing date December 1st 1810. Similar notes of the same date and currency were indorsed to Mr. Hunt, one by Mr. John Spence, another by Mr. Beatson, and a third by Mr. Haig. All these notes were then indorsed by Mr. Hunt to Mr. Forrester, treasurer of the Bank of Scotland, the Respondent; and the unsatisfied bills were also placed in his hands.

The form of the obligation was a promissory note by James and George Spence to Mr. Mackenzie, dated 1st December 1810, and payable eighteen months after date, indorsed by Mr. Mackenzie to Mr. Hunt, and by Mr. Hunt to the Respondent, as treasurer of the Bank.

When the promissory notes thus obtained became nearly due, Messrs. Spence again applied to the directors of the Bank for further delay of payment, requesting at the same time that their note indorsed by Mr. John Spence might be given up.

In answer to this application, by a letter from the accountant of the Bank, dated the 27th of April 1812, after stating the balance due on the discounted bills, and the manner in which the payment of that balance was collaterally secured, Messrs. Spence are informed that the directors agree to the liquidation of the balance by a bill or note from Messrs. Spence, jointly and severally with Messrs. Beatson, Haig, Mackenzie, and Hunt, payable three months after date. By another letter of the same date, Messrs. Spence are informed that "the directors have ordered their new promissory [578] note, indorsed to them by Mr. John Spence, for a balance of £1997 4s. 2d. due on the bills specified in the letter, and according to an account therein stated, to be discounted, and applied in payment of the balance on the dishonoured bills before specified, being that part of the dishonoured bills which had been accepted by Robertson and Stein, which were inclosed in the letter, and directed to be given up (unconditionally), together with the original note for £2000 indorsed to them by Mr. John Spence, as guarantee."

Some time after this transaction, but at what time does not appear, the bills were again restored to the Bank; and in the accounts exhibited by the Bank, which were made up to the 5th of October 1813, credit is given for the dividends received upon them.

The directors had taken a renewed promissory note, indorsed by Mr. John Spence, surgeon, Royal Navy, dated 27th April 1812, at three months, for £1997 1s. 2d. in lieu of the original note for £2000; and according to the proposal made by Messrs. Spence, they expected to receive other three notes, each indorsed by one of the three gentlemen whose original notes were to fall due on the 4th June 1812.

On the 8th of May 1812, Mr. Mackenzie wrote to Mr. G. Spence a letter, in which, after noticing that the bill for £2000 which he had accepted was about to fall due, and that a dividend would be paid out of Paterson's estate, he says, "in that case I trust the Bank will not object to renew the bill."

On the 11th May 1812, Mr. George Spence [579] wrote to Mr. Mackenzie, informing him of the new arrangement made with the Bank, that a new note for the whole amount would be forwarded for his indorsement, and if any dividend should be received on the dishonoured bills, it would be placed by the Bank to the credit of the new bills given for their security.

Mr. Mackenzie being unwell when he received this letter, his daughter, Miss Mackenzie, wrote a letter, dated the 13th May 1812, to his agent Mr. Pearson, desiring him to inform Mr. Spence that her father would accept the £2000 bill when sent.

In answer to this letter, Mr. Pearson, on the 14th May 1812, wrote to Miss Mackenzie, to inform her that he should mention to Mr. Spence what she stated as to the £2000 bill.

On the 15th May 1812, Messrs. Spence wrote to Mr. Mackenzie as follows: "I now enclose for your indorsation our note to you for £2000, at three months, from 3d June 1812, which please indorse above Mr. Charles Hunt's name. As this bill is to lie with the bank of Scotland, and to be applied for our account and behoof solely, we hereby oblige ourselves to free and relieve you of the same, when due, and also oblige ourselves to give you any satisfactory line necessary. We omitted to mention above, that this bill is to retire ours for the same amount, indorsed by you, due the 1st-4th June 1812, and that upon lodging this bill with the Bank of Scotland they give up the other one, which we will return you."

Mr. Mackenzie died on the 21st of May without having indorsed the new promissory note.

[580] On the 2d of June 1812, Messrs. Spence wrote a letter to the Bank, enclosing their new promissory notes, informing them that Mr. Mackenzie had died before he could fulfil his promise of indorsement, and suggesting, that as Mr. Mackenzie had intended and engaged to indorse the note, it would be the same security to the Bank to let the old note lie over for three months. But the directors would not agree to accept of the new note without the indorsement; and Mr. Mackenzie's original note when it fell due was protested "at the instance of Robert Forrester, Esq. treasurer to, and for behoof of, the Bank of Scotland, the holder, against James and George Spence, manufacturers in Dunfermline, the grantors, John Mackenzie, Esq. indorser, and Charles Hunt, late agent for the Bank of Scotland at Dunfermline, also indorser."

This protest was intimated to Mr. Mackenzie's representatives, by an official letter from the Bank, and was also duly recorded in the books of session.

On the 24th May 1813 the directors demanded from Mr. Mackenzie's representatives payment of the sum contained in the promissory note which he had indorsed, which being refused, an action was brought by the Respondent in the name and on the behalf of the Bank of Scotland.

The case having come before Lord Alloway, as Ordinary, his Lordship, after hearing counsel, granted a diligence for recovering writings, and appointed the Appellants to state in a condescendence the grounds of their defence. Such a condescendence having been lodged, and followed by answers, and the documents upon which both parties founded having [581] been produced, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lord Ordinary having considered the condescendence for the Defenders, answers thereto for the Pursuer, productions and whole process, finds, that this action proceeds on a bill granted to the late Mr. Mackenzie by Messrs. Spence, and discounted by Mr. Hunt, as the agent for the Bank of Scotland at Dunfermline: Finds, that this bill was indorsed by Mr. Mackenzie, together with other three bills, by Mr. Haig, by Mr. Beatson, and Mr. John Spence, for £2000 each, in order to operate to the Bank of Scotland as a security for a sum exceeding £8000, in which Messrs. Spence then stood indebted to the Bank, arising from the returned bills of David Paterson, Robertson and Stein, and Tod and Company, which Messrs. Spence had negotiated with the Bank: Finds, that when the bills indorsed by Mr. Mackenzie and the three other gentlemen became due, although Mr. Mackenzie was not a joint obligant for the £8000, and could only be liable upon his separate obligation for the £2000, yet, as it appears from Mr. Sandy's letter that the Bank were well acquainted with the nature of the transaction, and that these four obligants had merely interposed their security for Messrs. Spence to the amount of £2000 each, in relief of £8000 due by the Spences to the Bank, so the Bank could only have proceeded against them by giving them a proportionable and equitable relief of the debts which they had been able to recover from the original obligants: Finds, that, although it is alleged that the Bank had given [582] up to Messrs. Spence the bills which they held of Robertson and Stein, which formed part of the £8000, yet this was done merely for the purpose of drawing the dividend from Robertson and Stein; and, this being done, these bills were again restored to the Bank; and credit is given in the accounts exhibited by the Bank for the dividends so drawn: Finds, that when the four bills for £2000 each became due, Messrs. Spence had applied to their friends and to the Bank for a renewal of the same for three months; and that it is instructed by Miss Mackenzie's letter, written by her father's order, that he had also agreed to renew his obligation for three months; and Mr. Haig, Mr. Beatson, and Mr. John Spence, having also consented to a renewal of their obligation, new bills upon their part were discounted; but Mr. Mackenzie having died after the bill had been sent to him to be signed, his bill was not renewed, but the former bill was protested, and duly intimated to the representatives: Finds, that in these circumstances the renewal of the other three bills, and Mr. Mackenzie having previously assented to a renewal, cannot entitle his representatives to be relieved of the payment of his bill: Finds, that the intimation to his representatives of the dishonour of the bill upon which Mr. Mackenzie stood bound, put in their power to have brought the matter to a close, and to have insisted that the Bank should immediately close the account, and receive their proportion of the loss corresponding to Mr. Mackenzie's obligation of £2000, but so as not to exceed that sum: Finds, that nothing has been stated [583] upon the part of the Defenders to show that the Bank had attempted to give any of the obligants the least preference over the rest; and as it is not disputed that the balance due to the Bank still greatly exceeds the sum of £2000 contained in the promissory note indorsed by Mr. Mackenzie, after giving credit for all the sums which they have been enabled to recover from the other obligants, decerns against the Defenders as Mr. Mackenzie's representatives, for payment of the sum contained in the said promissory-note, with interest thereon since the same became due."

Upon this judgment, the Respondent gave in a representation, in which he prayed the Lord Ordinary to alter the interlocutor, in so far as it connected Mr. Mackenzie's note with the other three promissory-notes, and either at once to decern generally against the Appellants; whereupon the Lord Ordinary superseded advising this representation, until the representation, and additional representation upon the part of Mr. Mackenzie's representatives, came to be advised. And on advising the same, with the representation for the Appellants, he refused the representation, and adhered to the interlocutor complained of.

Two other representations on the part of the Appellants were followed by similar decisions.

Both parties reclaimed by petition to the First Division of the Court; and the petition of the Appellants was disposed of by this interlocutor: "The Lords having heard this petition, they refuse the desire of it, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against;" and, of the same date, their Lordships [584] pronounced as follows, on the petition of the Respondents: "The Lords having resumed consideration of this petition, they refuse it as unnecessary."

The parties again offered petitions against these interlocutors, when the following judgment was pronounced on both: "The Lords having heard this petition, they refuse the desire of it, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against."

The cause having afterwards come to be heard before the Lord Ordinary, on the point of expences, the question was remitted to the auditor, with the instruction, that, in taxing the amount, he shall strike out the expence of the representations and petition for the Bank; and, finally, judgment was pronounced, approving the auditor's report, and assessing the expences to the sum of £80 11s. 11d. for which, and the dues of extracts, decerns.

Against the interlocutors of 24th November 1815, 17th May, 14th June, 4th July, 28th November, and 10th December 1816, and of 22d January 1817, the Appellants entered their appeal. The Respondent also, on his part, took the necessary measures for keeping open the interlocutors in so far as they tended in any degree to limit the foundation of his argument. A cross-appeal was entered for that purpose.

For the Appellants, the Attorney-General, and Mr. C. Warren.

The original proposal, as appears by the letters of Messrs. Spence to the Bank, was to procure security [585] to the amount of £8000*; but this was only to be in aid of the dividends on the returned bills. Each surety was liable till the £8000 was paid; but his responsibility was limited to £2000 and was liable to be further limited by payments on the doubtful notes. It was considered as one joint transaction of suretyship, and so the claim was made for the Respondents, as appears by their accounts, in which the expences as to one are charged against all the sureties†; and the Bank had no right to relieve one of the sureties without the privity of the others. The returned bills were given up absolutely, not for the pretended purpose of obtaining the dividends‡. By giving up those bills to the principal debtors, and taking a new security from one of the sureties, the other sureties were discharged; for then, by that transaction, part of their remedies were lost, and their relative situation was altered.

In any cross-action against J. Spence for contribution, the other sureties could not have had the same remedy; by accepting a new security from J. Spence, they discharged him from the old security. The letter written by Mackenzie's daughter, in answer to the proposal by the Bank, could not bind him, especially as he was not informed of the circumstances. If one of several co-sureties pays more than his share of the debt secured, he has a right of contribution against the others, Deering v. Lord Winchelsea (2 Bos. and Pul. 270). By discharging the obligation [586] of the debtor, the creditor discharges the surety; so by any transaction with the cosureties. The situation of the surety was altered by giving up the bills of Robertson and Stein, and he was thereby discharged.

If the creditor has no right to alter the situation of the surety as to the whole debt, the principle applies equally to the case of a part. The acceptances of Robertson and Stein might have been one of the inducements to the contract. By indorsing the new note, John Spence was discharged from the original debt, and consequently from the obligation to contribute. At law it has been doubted whether an assumpsit is raised against a surety; and, at the most, the aliquot part only can be recovered. Cowel v. Edwards *. But in equity the surety may recover, from a solvent co-surety, the full proportion, according to events.

Independently of all other objections, the delay in prosecuting the remedies against the principal debtors, was sufficient to discharge the sureties.

For the Respondents, Mr. Wetherell and Mr. W. Adam.

The note given by Mr. Mackenzie was distinct and unconnected with the other notes; and by granting indulgence to the other obligants, the Bank did not weaken their right of recourse against Mr. Mackenzie, or his representatives.

The proposal, stated in the correspondence, that each obligant should be bound for the whole sum, [587] was rejected, and the notes were accordingly taken in a separate form. A bill or a promissory note is considered as money; and the doctrine of law as to cautioners is not applicable to the case. Ersk. B. 3. tit. 2. s. 31. Sharp v. Harvey, 24 June 1808. Macdonald v. Foyer, 13 February 1810.

The bills due by Robertson and Stein were put into the hands of Messrs. Spence, merely in order to enable them to draw, for the Bank's behoof, the dividends due upon them from the bankrupt estate of Robertson and Stein. Messrs. Spence accordingly drew these dividends, which were paid over to the Bank, and were placed to the credit of Messrs. Spence's debt; and, upon this object being effected, the bills were returned, and have ever since remained in the possession of the Bank. The account exhibited by the Bank shows that credit was given for these dividends. The Lord Ordinary was satisfied, that the Respondent's statement on this point was correct, and found accordingly.

The note for £2000, which was indorsed by Mr. John Spence, was not a surrender, but a renewal.

The transaction with regard to John Spence's note was not essentially different from what was done with regard to the other notes, and the whole complaint of the Appellants resolves merely into this:—that the Bank, instead of doing diligence upon these notes, when they fell due, took renewals of them, and, by thus giving indulgence, injured or weakened Mr. Mackenzie's right of relief.

The cautioner is not free, because the creditor allows the principal debtor reasonable indulgence, and abstains from following out immediate diligence. [588] Erskine (B. iii. tit. 3. s. 66) lays it down, "That the cautioner continues bound, though the creditor should set the debtor at liberty after he was apprehended by the messenger, but before his actual imprisonment; for, as no creditor can be compelled by a cautioner to use diligence against the debtor, neither can he be compelled by him to consummate an incomplete diligence." Nor is it of any consequence, that, during the delay so granted, one or more of the co-obligants may have become insolvent. The very object of taking a cautionary obligation is, to secure the creditor against insolvency; and, if the obligation does not fall in consequence of delay being granted, the circumstance of insolvency afterwards happening cannot at all weaken its effects. This is implied in the passage quoted from Erskine (B. i. tit. 23. s. 44); and Lord Bankton still more directly, after declaring that the creditor is not entitled to discharge any of the obligants, immediately adds, "His suffering the principal debtor to become insolvent will not prejudice him, because the others jointly bound ought to have secured their own relief; so that the same objection of negligence that they make against him, lies against themselves."

By the renewal of these notes, the Bank neither discharged any of the joint obligants, nor surrendered any other collateral security which could have been available to the Appellants, nor weakened their right of relief.

* 2 Bos. and Pul. 268. See the Dict. of Buller, J. in Toussaint v. Martinant, 2 T. R. 105; and of Lord Kenyon, in Erall v. Partridge, 8 T. R. 310.

And whatever might have been the effect of these renewals under other circumstances, the consent of [589] Mr. Mackenzie must be held to bar all challenge at the instance of his representatives.

If the Appellants had not been willing that the renewals of the notes should take place, it was in their power to have guarded against the consequences of that measure. Upon the intimation of the dishonour of the bill, upon which Mr. Mackenzie stood bound, his representatives might have insisted, that the Bank should immediately close the account, and receive their proportion of the loss, corresponding to Mr. Mackenzie's note for £2000, but so as not to exceed that sum.

In the course of the argument the following observations were made:

The Lord Chancellor: If this were the case of an entire debt, there is no doubt that giving time would discharge the surety. It is clear that, in the circumstances stated, J. Spence could not have been called on for contribution. The transaction with the Bank effected an absolute discharge. It is a new and important question. Suppose the guarantee had been confined to the £2000; was it not discharged by the transaction with J. Spence? Is it not discharged to the amount which J. Spence would have been liable to contribute? If the giving up of the bills does not effect a discharge of the sureties, then the amount of the dividend upon them is to be received for the sureties. But is a surety to be put in the situation of being driven into the account of a bankrupt estate, and the question what it may or may not pay? In another point of view, the bills of Robertson and Stein, [590] provable under the bankruptcy, were considered as part of the original security. The sureties had a right to stand as cestui que trust of the proof. The sureties might thus have received more than they could in any other way. The case * before Lord Kenyon is material. Formerly it was thought that the remedy was only in equity (Toussaint v. Martinant, 2 T. R. 105); but in that case it was held, that if one in the nature of surety paid a debt, he might bring an action against the parties liable for the debt. Until I became acquainted with that case, I thought the remedy must be in equity.

Lord Redesdale: In the account, credit is given for part of the debt from Robertson and Stein; the Respondents give up the old note, take a new security for a different one from John Spence, and, as part of the transaction, give up to him the bills from Robertson and Stein, and the benefit of the dividends.

The principle established in the case of Deering v. Lord Winchelsea is universal, that the right and duty of contribution is founded in doctrines of equity; it does not depend upon contract. If several persons are indebted, and one makes the payment, the creditor is bound in conscience, if not by contract, to give to the party paying the debt all his remedies against the other debtors. The cases of average in equity rest upon the same principle. It would be against equity for the creditor to exact or receive payment from one, and to permit, or by his conduct to cause, the other debtors to be exempt from payment. He is bound, seldom by contract, but always in conscience, as far as he is able, to put [591] the party paying the debt upon the same footing with those who are equally bound. That was the principle of decision in Deering v. Lord Winchelsea; and in that case there was no evidence of contract, as in this. So in the case of land descending to coparceners, subject to a debt; if the creditor proceeds against one of the coparceners the others must contribute. If the creditor discharges one of the coparceners, he cannot proceed for the whole debt against the others; at the most they are only bound to pay their proportions.

The Lord Chancellor: This is a question as to transactions between a creditor and a principal debtor and sureties; and, as to the effect of this transaction, upon the liability of co-sureties. The judgment of the Court below cannot stand in all its parts. It will be necessary, in moving judgment here, to state clearly the doctrines on which we proceed. In the mean time the agents must give answers to the following inquiries: 1. What became of the bills drawn by George Spence, and accepted by Paterson? Whether the bills have been proved against the estates of the several parties, and whether any and what dividends have been received? 2. In what state the bills stand, and who is entitled to a dividend, if made? The result of these inquiries may assist those who have to advise the House upon the judgment. The case is extremely important, as it regards the doctrines of equity upon the liability of co-sureties.

* 8 T. R. 310. See the note in Selwyn's at N. P. vol. i. p. 75.

The Lord Chancellor: In this case, it appears that the firm of James and George Spence em-[592]-ployed Mr. Paterson as their money broker and banker. It is represented that the transaction was carried on by their lodging bills in his hands, and, in return, drawing bills on him and his agent in London; which, being accepted by them, were discounted with the agent for the Bank of Scotland. Paterson and his agents having failed, leaving the bills, drawn by Messrs. Spence to a large amount, unsatisfied in the hands of the Bank of Scotland. Upon this event, it was agreed that a security should be taken from four sureties, to guarantee to the Bank the payment of any balance upon the unsatisfied bills, which, after receipt of the dividends from the bankrupt estates, might remain unpaid, to the amount of £2000 each. Four promissory-notes for £2000 were accordingly made by Messrs. Spence, and indorsed to the treasurer of the Bank, in whose hands the unsatisfied bills were also placed for the purpose of receiving the dividends.

It is represented in the printed case, on the part of the Appellants, that although the securities are in form separate, it was in fact one individual transaction. This is a very important part of the question. If the securities were in effect separate, then each surety had nothing to do but with his own; but if it was one transaction of joint suretyship, then, when there has been a dealing with any of them, the others have a right to look to that dealing as affecting them. When the notes were nearly due, it appears that by an arrangement between Messrs. Spence and the Bank, other notes, granted by Messrs. Spence, and indorsed by the sureties, were to be substituted, payable three months after date; and the original note, with the indorsement of one [593] of the sureties (Mr. J. Spence), was to be, and was, in fact, given up before this transaction was completed. Mr. Mackenzie died without having assented to the renewal of the notes, as the Appellants allege. The Respondents contradict that allegation; but I think it appears from the evidence that a treaty was pending, which was not carried into actual agreement.

Under these circumstances, the Bank refused to delay their remedy upon the old note for three months, or to accept of the new note without the indorsement of Mr. Mackenzie; and when the original note fell due, it was protested, and an action was brought upon it against the representatives of Mr. Mackenzie. By the first interlocutor in this action, it is found that the Bank could not have proceeded against the sureties without giving them a proportionable and equitable relief of the debts which they had been able to recover from the original obligants; that the bills of Robertson and Stein had been given up merely for the purpose of drawing the dividend, which, being received, were credited in the account, and the bills returned to the Bank; that Mr. Mackenzie having assented to a renewal, his representatives were not entitled to be relieved from the payment of the original bill; that after the intimation of the dishonour they might have brought the account to a close, and paid their proportion of the loss; that there was no proof that the Bank had given a preference to any of the obligants; and as the balance due to the Bank, after giving credit for the monies recovered from the other obligants, exceeded £2000, that the Pursuer was entitled to recover.

[594] On the part of the Appellants it is contended, in contradiction to the finding of this interlocutor, that the bills of Robertson and Stein were given up, not merely for the purpose alleged, but actually and irrevocably, and that the situation of the sureties by that act was altered, and the obligation of Mackenzie thereby released.

The four promissory-notes may be considered as one transaction of suretyship. They are separate in form; but the effect in equity, as to the obligation of the parties, was such, that the creditors were bound to act as if all the notes formed one transaction of suretyship. The ground of complaint against the interlocutor was fully argued at the bar, and is stated in the cases. It will be necessary, in considering the merits of the appeal, to attend particularly to the matter of the correspondence. An application having been made to the Bank by Messrs. Spence for delay of payment, and the delivery of their note indorsed by Mr. John Spence, by a letter of the 27th of April 1812, Messrs. Spence are informed that the Bank will accept, for the balance stated to be due, a new bill from them, jointly and severally with the former sureties. By another letter of the same date, it appears that the bills of Robertson and Stein are directed to be given up, together with the original note for £2000 indorsed by Mr. John Spence. In consequence of these transactions it is insisted by the Appellants, that the four indorsers of the notes are to be considered as co-sureties, and ought to have in equity all the relief usually given in favour of sureties when the creditor deals with the principal debtor. Their situation is not to be made worse than if no such [595] transaction had taken place. By the Appellants it is contended, that this transaction put an end to the whole demand upon Mackenzie's representatives. The Respondents contend, that at all events the effect was only partial. If the transaction did not put an end to the whole demand, it is necessary to consider what was the effect of the transaction with regard to Mackenzie's representatives, and so far only to relieve them. Under all the circumstances of this case, the latter is the true principle of decision; we cannot go the whole length of the doctrine for which the Appellants contend.*

Lord Redesdale: This is a case of very great importance, as applicable to all questions where one or more persons make themselves debtors for others as sureties. The cross-appeal was waived; it quarrelled with the principle on which the judgment of the Lord Ordinary proceeded: but that principle was perfectly correct. The interlocutor finds that "when the bills became due, although Mr. Mackenzie was not a joint obligant for the £8000, and could only be liable upon his separate obligation for the £2000; yet as the Bank were well acquainted with the nature of the transaction, that the four obligants had interposed their security for Messrs. Spence to the amount of £2000 each, in relief of £8000 due by the Spences to the Bank; so the Bank could only proceed against them by giving a proportionable and equitable relief of the debts which they had been able to recover from the original obligants." That doc-[596]-trine is correct; and that finding should have governed all the subsequent decisions of the Lord Ordinary.

At the bar it was contended, that the rights and obligations of co-sureties are founded upon a supposed contract between them; and that in this transaction they entered into the obligation without communication with each other. The question depends upon equity, not upon contract; and in this case a contract is to be implied. The decision in Deering v. Lord Winchelsea (1 Cox, 318; 2 Bos. and Pul. 270) proceeded on a principle of law which must exist in all countries, that where several persons are debtors, all shall be equal. The doctrine is illustrated in that case by the practice in questions of Average, etc. where there is no express contract, but equity distributes the loss equally. On the prisage of wines, it is immaterial whose wines are taken; all must contribute equally; so it is where goods are thrown overboard for the safety of the ship; the owners of the goods saved by that act must contribute proportionally to the loss. The duty of contribution extends to all persons who are within the scope of the equitable obligation.

The next question is, whether the subsequent findings of the Lord Ordinary are founded in fact; the first is, "that the bills of Robertson and Stein were given up to the Bank merely for the purpose of drawing the dividends." That is somewhat disputable; and the fact rather different from what is stated in the finding. It is there found that "Mr. Mackenzie had assented to a renewal of the note." That seems not to be the case, for he died without giving a final consent to the renewal. [597] Under the circumstances of the case the effect of the transaction seems to be, that the Bank, by their conduct, took upon themselves the situation and obligation of the other sureties with respect to Mackenzie; and therefore the Bank can only demand one fourth of the sum secured from his representatives, because Mackenzie was originally liable to no more.

The Bank having given time, without obtaining the final consent of Mackenzie, made an arrangement with the other sureties as to three fourths of the debt. The first part of the finding of the Lord Ordinary is right and just in principle; the latter part is wrong in point of fact.

Die Merc. 13 June 1821. Find, that the Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland, having accepted the promissory note of James and George Spence to John Spence, and indorsed by him and Charles Hunt, in substitution for the balance due on the bills in the proceedings mentioned, drawn by James and George Spence on, and accepted by, Robertson and Stein; are not entitled to make any demand against the estate of James Mackenzie, deceased, upon the indorsement of the said John Mackenzie on the promissory-note of James and George Spence, dated the 1st of December 1810, in the proceedings mentioned, in respect of the said bills drawn by James and George Spence on, and accepted by, Robertson and Stein: further find, that, under the circumstances of this case, the said Governor and Company are entitled to demand against the estate of the said John Mackenzie, on the said promissory-note of the 1st of December 1810, one-fourth part only of the balance which shall appear to be due to the said Governor and [598] Company from the said James and George Spence, in respect of the several bills drawn by the said James and George Spence on, and accepted by, D. Paterson, Todd and Company, in the proceedings mentioned, after giving credit for all the sums of money received by the said Governor and Company, or which might have been received by them, from all or any of the parties to such bills respectively, or their respective estates, towards discharge of the debt due to the said Governor and Company upon such bills: and it is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the several interlocutors complained of in the said original appeal, so far as they are inconsistent with these findings, be, and the same are hereby reversed: further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to ascertain the balance due from the estate of the said John Mackenzie to the said Governor and Company according to such findings: and the Lords further find, that upon payment of such fourth part of such balance, the said Governor and Company are bound to answer to the estate of the said John Mackenzie one-fourth part of any future dividends, which, after the adjustment of the said account between the said Governor and Company and the estate of the said John Mackenzie, according to the findings aforesaid, may become payable to the said Governor and Company from the several parties to the said bills, drawn by James and George Spence on, and accepted by, D. Paterson and Todd and Company, in respect of such bills respectively: and it is further ordered and adjudged, that the said cross-appeal be dismissed this House, and that the said interlocutors, so far as they are therein complained of, be affirmed.*

REPORTS OF CASES heard in the House of Lords, upon Appeals and Writs of Error, and decided during the Session 1821. By RICHARD BLIGH, Barrister - at - Law. Vol. IV.

ENGLAND.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

GEORGE JAMES Marquis of CHOLMONDELEY, and The Honorable ANN SEYMOUR DAMER,—Appellants; ROBERT COTTON ST. JOHN Lord CLINTON, and Others,—Respondents [15th June 1821].

[Mews' Dig. iii. 246; ix. 1491; xiv. 1735. S. C. 2, Mer. 171. 2, Jac. and W. 1. Adopted in Pearce v. Morris, 1869, L. R. 5 Ch. 227, at p. 230; Warner v. Jacob, 1882, 20 Ch. D. 220, at p. 221; Farrar v. Farrar's Lim., 1888, 10 Ch. D. 395, at pp. 410-411; Soar v. Ashwell [1893] 2 Q. B. 390, at p. 397.]

S. R. devised lands, etc. (subject to a term of 200 years, for raising a portion) to the use of his daughter M. for life, remainder to the use of her first and other sons in tail male, remainder to his cousin J. R. in tail, etc.; and died, leaving his daughter M. his heir at law, who married and had one son G. Earl of O., who upon the death of his mother entered as tenant in tail under the will of his grandfather, and suffered a recovery to the use of himself in fee, and by deed in 1781, reciting "that he was willing and desirous that the said estates should remain in the family and blood of S. R.," in consideration of "the natural love and affection which he bore to his relations, the heirs of S. R.; and to the intent that the estates might continue in the family and blood of his late mother, on the side of her father," limited the lands, [2] etc. to the use of himself for life, remainder to the heirs of his body, and for default of such issue, to such persons as he should appoint; and for default of appointment, "to the use of the right heirs of S. R.," with a general power of revocation and new appointment.

In 1721 the term was assigned upon mortgage to raise the portion.

By deed in 1785 G. executed to E. H. a mortgage in fee. The term of 200 years was assigned on the same occasion.

On the 5th of December, 1791, G. died without issue, leaving H. Earl of O. his uncle and heir at law. Upon the death of G. C. entered, claiming as the then right heir of S. R. under the limitation in the deed of 1781.

Shortly after the death of G. opinions of counsel were taken by H. as to the effect of the deed of 1785 upon the deed of 1781, and he was advised that it operated only as a revocation pro tanto.

In 1792, C. proposing to raise money by further mortgage, and also to make family settlements, conveyed the lands, etc. to trustees for those purposes, and the lands, etc. were by a subsequent deed appointed and limited accordingly. But the proposed mortgagees not being satisfied with the title of C. under the limitation in the deed of 1781, H. Earl of O. was applied to by C. on account of the doubts which had arisen with regard to the effect of the deed of 1785.

as a revocation of the settlement of 1781, and thereupon H. executed a deed in 1794 by which reciting the several deeds of 1781, 1785, and 1792, and the doubts which had arisen, and that H. being well satisfied that Earl G. did not intend to alter the uses of that settlement, he had agreed to confirm the same: it was witnessed, that the Earl H. "did grant, bargain, sell, release, and confirm" to the trustees of C's settlement of 1792, upon the trusts of that settlement "in the same manner as if the deed of 1785 had not been made, and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatever."

Earl H. died in 1796, leaving A. his heir at law, and also heir at law of Earl G., and having devised his real estates to B.

C. died in 1798, and upon his death his eldest son entered under the settlement of 1792.

In June, 1812, a bill was filed in Chancery by A. and B. jointly as heir at law and devisee of Earl H., stating an agreement between them to share the lands, etc. equally, and praying a [3] redemption and reconveyance, and (as against C. the son) an account of rents and profits.

Upon the original hearing in the Court below, it was adjudged, first, upon the construction of the settlement of 1781, that the remainder "to the use of the right heirs of S. R.," vested in the settlor, as himself the right heir of S. R. at the date of the settlement: secondly, that the deed of 1794 did not operate a confirmation except for the limited purpose expressed by the recital; and, lastly, that the length of time, viz. upwards of twenty years, since C. entered, was no bar by the operation of or analogy to the statute of limitations.

It was also adjudged, that Sir L. P. having advanced money to C. by way of mortgage, should not be permitted to avail himself of that security as against the Plaintiff, upon the ground either of want of notice or of acquiescence. But as to the effect of the limitation in the deed of 1781, a case was sent to a court of law and a certificate was returned, in which three of the Judges concurred with the Master of the Rolls, and one differed from him. Upon this certificate the case being brought before the Court upon the equity reserved, the bill was dismissed; and upon appeal the decree was affirmed, upon the ground that the equity (if any) of the Plaintiffs was barred by length of time and adverse possession.

If a party has by his own act put a construction upon a deed, whether he or à fortiori those who claim under can dispute that construction. Qu. D. Redesdale.

An heir cannot sue in equity by analogy to a writ of right, or so as not to be barred by a limitation of less than sixty years. If the heir proceeds by ejectment, he is barred by twenty years adverse possession; and it seems that this analogy is adopted in equity. D. Redesdale.

Between co-Plaintiffs having adverse rights there can be no decree. If the heir and a devisee are co-Plaintiffs in a suit seeking a redemption of lands in mortgage, there can be no decree upon a bill so framed. D. Redesdale.

If a deed has a legal effect contrary to the intention of the grantor, and a party having an interest under the deed, according to its legal effect, proceeds upon the supposed intention to permit acts which create rights in the property, whether he can obtain relief in equity to the prejudice of the rights so enacted. Qu. D. Eldon.

An agreement made by parties out of possession to proceed in [4] a court of equity to recover and to divide lands, etc. when recovered, is contrary to the policy of the law as well as the statute of Hen. 8. against pretended titles. D. Eldon C.

Whether a court of equity can entertain a bill stating such an agreement. Qu. D. Eldon C.

If a deed is produced as matter of defence, and it appears that it has an effect beyond what was intended, it is not necessary to file a bill to reduce it. D. Eldon C.

If a deed is executed which does not effectuate the intention of the grantor, and parties who claim under it act under a common mistake that A. is the supposed grantee, and A. creates incumbrances upon the land supposed to be granted, whether it is not a bar to relief in equity, and whether relief will be granted after such transactions and a lapse of time. Qu. D. Eldon C.

Acts done by a trustee or termor for years cannot have the effect of adverse possession. But the rule does not apply to the case of mortgagor and mortgagee. D. Eldon C.

A mortgagee in possession keeping no account, and making no acknowledgment, becomes owner of the estate after the lapse of twenty years. D. Eldon C.

Adverse possession, as against an equitable estate, may create or defeat a right where the possessor has no duty to discharge for the party against whom possession is pleaded. D. Eldon C.

The effect of adverse possession cannot be suspended during the continuance of long terms of years. D. Eldon C.

If a deed of confirmation is executed under a mistake, and the party confirming being dead, there is a probability from circumstances that he would not, or a doubt whether he could have raised any question upon the mistake, it is doubtful whether a court of equity would permit parties claiming under him to take advantage of the mistake. D. Eldon C.

Adverse possession of an equity of redemption for twenty years is a bar to any other claim of the equity of redemption, producing the same effect as abatement, intrusion, and disseisin with respect to legal estates. D. Eldon C.

Title of entry in equity is by writ of subpoena.

In June, 1811, a bill was filed on behalf of the Appellants in the High Court of Chancery.

The facts stated were as follows:

[5] By indentures dated in 1704, manors, etc. of Samuel Rolle in Devon and Cornwall and Dorset were settled to the use of Samuel Rolle for his life; remainder to trustees, etc. to preserve, etc.; and after the decease of Samuel Rolle, to the use of the said trustees for the term of 200 years, upon trust to raise £20,000 as a portion for a daughter; remainder to sons successively in tail male; remainder to the use of Samuel Rolle, his heirs, etc.

Samuel Rolle had issue by the marriage only one daughter, Margaret, and by his will, dated in 1717, devised the fee-simple of the estates to his wife durante viduitate; remainder to trustees and their heirs, to the use of the sons of his body in tail male in succession; and for default of such issue, to the use of his daughter Margaret for her life; remainder to trustees to preserve, etc.; remainder to children of his daughter as she should appoint; and for default of appointment, to the use of her sons successively in tail male.

Samuel Rolle died in 1719, leaving Margaret his heir at law, who upon his death entered into possession of the estates devised to her for her life, and by indenture dated in 1720, the remainder of the term of 200 years was assigned to Arscott and Spicer upon the subsisting trusts of the settlement.

In 1721, Margaret Rolle married Robert Lord Walpole, and by articles made previous to the marriage, it was agreed that the Earl of Orford (Lord Walpole's father) should receive the £20,000 under the trusts of the 200 years' term, and that Arscott and Spicer should by mortgage, etc. raise and pay the same accordingly.

[6] By indenture dated in July, 1724, Arscott and Spicer, in consideration of £20,000 paid to Sir Robert Walpole, assigned the premises to Decker, his executors, etc. for all the remainder of the term of 200 years, subject to a proviso for redemption by Robert Lord Walpole and Margaret his wife.

There was issue of this marriage only one son, George Earl of Orford, who upon the death of his mother in 1781, entered into possession as tenant in tail under the will of Samuel Rolle.

By indenture of bargain and sale inrolled, dated the 14th of June, 1781, the uses of a recovery of the premises shortly afterwards suffered by George Earl of Orford were declared to himself in fee.

By indenture of lease and release, dated the 1st and 2d of August, 1781, and made between George Earl of Orford (described as only son and heir of Robert Earl of Orford by Margaret his wife, who was daughter and only son and heir of Samuel Rolle, who was only son and heir of Robert Rolle, Esq., by Arabella his wife, who was daughter and co-heir of Theophilus Clinton Earl of Lincoln, and Baron Clinton,) of the one part, and Joshua Sharpe of the other part, reciting the will of Samuel Rolle and his death, leaving his daughter Margaret him surviving, her marriage with Robert Earl of Orford, and her death, leaving him the said George Earl of Orford her only son, who thereby became tenant in tail of the premises; and reciting the said indenture of bargain and sale and recovery, and that he was willing and desirous that the said premises should continue and remain in the family and blood of the said Samuel Rolle, it was witnessed, that "for and in consideration of the natural love and [7] affection which the said George Earl of Orford had and bore unto his relations, the heirs of the said Samuel Rolle, and to the intent that the manors, etc. and hereditaments thereafter mentioned, might remain, continue, and be in the family and blood of his late mother the said Margaret Countess of Orford, on the side or part of her father the said Samuel Rolle;" and for other considerations, he the said George Earl of Orford conveyed, etc. "all and singular the manors and hereditaments therein mentioned (being the estates devised by the will of Samuel Rolle) to the said Joshua Sharpe, his heirs and assigns, to the use of him the said George Earl of Orford for life; and after his decease to the use of the heirs of the body of him the said George Earl of Orford; and for default of such issue, to the use of such person, etc. for such estate, etc. as the said George Earl of Orford by deed or will should appoint; and in default of appointment, to the use of the right heirs of the said Samuel Rolle." The deed also contained a general power to the said George Earl of Orford of revoking the uses therein before specified, and of limiting and declaring new uses of the same premises, or any part thereof.

By several mesne assignments, the manors, etc. comprized in the 200 years' term became vested for the residue of that term as to four fifths in Lord Keppel, redeemable on payment of £16,000 and interest; and as to one fifth, in Adair and Bullock, redeemable on payment of £4000 and interest.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 4th and 5th of June, 1785, George Earl of Orford, in consideration of £16,000 paid to Lord [8] Keppel, and of £4000 paid to Adair and Bullock, granted, released, and confirmed to Sir Edward Hughes, his heirs and assigns, all the premises to the use of the said Sir Edward Hughes, his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to reconveyance to the said George Earl of Orford, his heirs and assigns, or such person, etc. as he should appoint, on payment of £20,000 with interest.

The residue of term 200 years became vested by assignment in the Respondent Seymour.

On the 5th of December, 1791, George Earl of Orford being seised in fee of the equity of redemption of the mortgaged estates, died without issue and intestate as to the equity of redemption, without having altered or revoked the limitation of the deed of 1781, otherwise than by the indentures of 1785, and leaving Horace Earl of Orford, his uncle and heir at law, on whom (as the Plaintiffs alleged), the equity of redemption descended; and the bill stated that Horace Earl of Orford being advised that by virtue of the limitations in the deed of 1781, the heir ex parte maternâ of Earl George was entitled to the equity of redemption, in consequence of such belief, did not enter into the mortgaged estates; but that upon the death of Earl George, Robert George William Trefusis, Esq., afterwards Lord Clinton, entered into possession thereof as the cousin and heir of Earl George ex parte maternâ.

By indenture of lease and release, dated the 5th and 6th of October, 1792, after reciting the deed of 1785, and that the premises, upon the death of the said George Earl of Orford, became vested in the said R. G. W. Trefusis in fee, as the right [9] heir of the said Samuel Rolle by virtue of the settlement of 1781, and that the said R. G. W. Trefusis was desirous of raising £34,000 for certain purposes, and had proposed to convey, etc., it was witnessed, that, in consideration of the premises, the said R. G. W. Trefusis granted, etc. and confirmed unto the Earl of Coventry, Hall, St. John, and Fortescue, their heirs and assigns, etc., all the manors, etc. of the said R. G. W. Trefusis, which were the estate of Samuel Rolle deceased, to the use of them the said Earl of Coventry, etc., their heirs and assigns, upon trust to raise by sale or mortgage the said £34,000 for the purposes therein mentioned, and subject thereto, to stand seised, etc. in trust, and to such uses, etc. as the said

R. G. W. Trefusis should appoint; and in default of appointment, in trust for the said R. G. W. Trefusis, his heirs and assigns; and by other indentures of the 7th and 8th of October, 1792, it was witnessed, that for settling and assuring the several manors, etc. therein contained, and in consideration of his natural love and affection to his wife and children, and brothers and sisters, the said R. G. W. Trefusis granted, etc. and confirmed to the same trustees and their heirs, upon the trusts and with powers under which interests by way of lease and jointure were created.

The bill then stated, that shortly after the death of Earl George a doubt was suggested to Earl Horace, whether the deed of 1785 had not revoked the uses of the settlement of 1781, and thereby defeated the limitation to the right heirs of Samuel Rolle, under which Lord Clinton claimed to be entitled to the equity of redemption of these [10] estates, and that Earl Horace thereupon caused a case to be stated for the opinion of counsel, which case being laid before Sir Archibald Macdonald (afterwards Lord Chief Baron) and Mr. Shadwell, Earl Horace was advised by both those gentlemen that the indentures of 1785 had revoked the uses of the settlement of 1781 only pro tanto.

The bill then proceeded to state that in the beginning of 1794 Lord Clinton (the Defendant's father) being about to raise money by way of loan on the security of the estates, caused a representation to be made to Earl Horace, that although by the limitation to the right heirs of Samuel Rolle in the settlement of 1781 he (Lord Clinton) had become entitled to the equity of redemption, yet some embarrassment had arisen to his title by reason of a doubt which had been raised whether the indentures of 1785 had not revoked that limitation, and therefore requesting Earl Horace to execute such deed or instrument as should be necessary to remove that doubt; and that Earl Horace having already taken the aforesaid opinions, and being therefore satisfied that such doubt was unfounded, consented to execute such deed or instrument as was required.

Accordingly, by indentures of lease and release, dated the 1st and 2d of April, 1794, the release being made between Horace Earl of Orford (described as uncle and heir at law of George Earl of Orford deceased) of the first part, the Earl of Coventry and others (trustees in the settlement of 1792) of the second part, and the said Lord Clinton (described with an accurate statement of his pedigree from Theophilus Earl of Lincoln as [11] heir at law ex parte matris of the said George Earl of Orford) of the third part, after reciting the settlement of 1781, the indentures of 1785, the death of Earl George, and the deed of 1792, and "that doubts had arisen whether the said George Earl of Orford having joined in the indenture of 1785, did not revoke the limitations contained in the settlement of 1781, and thereby defeat the settlement of 1792, and vest the estates in Horace as heir at law of the said George Earl of Orford; but the said Horace Earl of Orford, being well satisfied that the said late earl did not intend to alter the uses limited by the settlement of 1781, had, at the request of Lord Clinton, agreed to confirm the uses of the said settlement in manner thereafter mentioned," it was witnessed, that in pursuance of the said agreement, and being desirous to confirm the settlements of 1781 and 1792, the said Horace Earl of Orford "did grant, bargain, sell, release, and confirm" unto the said Earl of Coventry, etc. and their heirs, all the aforesaid manors, etc., which were the inheritance of Samuel Rolle and George Earl of Orford, "to, for, and upon such and so many of the powers, provisos, limitations, declarations, and agreements limited and declared, or any ways expressed of or concerning the same, in and by the said indentures of release bearing date respectively the 6th and 8th of October, 1792, as were then existing undetermined or capable of taking effect in the same manner as if the said indenture of the 6th of June, 1785, had not been made, and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever."

Lord Clinton (formerly R. G. W. Trefusis) died [12] on the 28th of August, 1798, leaving the Defendant, Lord Clinton, his eldest son and heir at law, who entered into possession on the death of his father, claiming to be entitled as tenant in tail under the settlement of 1792, subject to the mortgage.

Horace Earl of Orford made his will, dated the 15th of May, 1793, by which, after disposing of his estates in Norfolk, Essex, and Middlesex, and giving several pecuniary and specific legacies, he gave, devised, and bequeathed to his cousin General Conway, his heirs, executors, etc., "all the rest and residue of his estate and effects, real and personal, freehold and copyhold, whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, or quality soever not therein-before by him otherwise disposed of, which he then was or should be at his death seised or possessed of, interested in or entitled to, or over which he had a disposing power;" and the said General Conway having afterwards died in his lifetime, by a codicil to his will dated the 27th of December, 1796, Earl Horace appointed the Plaintiff, Ann Seymour Damer, to be his residuary legatee and devisee in the room of her late father, the said General Conway, deceased, and gave, devised, and bequeathed to her, the said Plaintiff, her heirs, executors, etc. all the rest and residue, etc. in the same words as he had given the same by his will to her late father.

Earl Horace died shortly after the date of this codicil, leaving the Plaintiff, George James Earl (since Marquis) of Cholmondeley, his grand nephew and heir at law, and the Plaintiff, Ann Seymour Damer, him surviving.

The bill then stated, that some questions had [13] arisen between the Plaintiffs respecting the will and codicil of Horace Earl of Orford, as far as regarded the equity of redemption of the said mortgaged estates: and that, in order to put an end to such questions, they had agreed to share the same between them: that they were advised, that by virtue of the limitations in the settlement of 1781, Earl Horace became, on the death of Earl George, absolutely entitled to the equity of redemption of the said estates: and that the Plaintiffs, upon the death of Earl Horace, became entitled to the same: that by divers mesue assignments, the legal estate in the said mortgaged premises had become vested in the Defendant Francis Drake, subject to redemption on payment of £20,000 and interest: and that the other Defendants respectively claimed some interest in the same, and the bill charged that the deed of 1794 did not absolutely confirm the settlement of 1792, but only removed the doubts which embarrassed the supposed title of Lord Clinton, by reason of the mortgage deed of 1785 conveying the estates to the uses of the settlement only in such manner as if that mortgage had not been made: and that Earl Horace executed the deed of 1794 under the advice he had received as to the effect of that mortgage, and not considering that he was, in fact, parting with any substantial right or interest whatever, but fully believing, that by the limitation to the right heirs of Samuel Rolle in the settlement of 1781, Lord Clinton became absolutely entitled to the equity of redemption on the death of George Earl of Orford. The bill prayed a redemption and reconveyance to the Plaintiffs, and that the [14] Defendant, Lord Clinton, might be decreed to deliver up to them the possession of the premises, and the Defendant Seymour to assign to them, or as they should direct, the 200 years' term then vested in him in trust to attend the inheritance, together with an account of rents and profits received by the Defendant, Lord Clinton: and that he might be decreed to pay the amount of what should be found due in taking such account, upon being allowed all sums paid by him in reduction of interest on the mortgage.

The Defendant, Lord Clinton, by his answer, submitted that it was the true intent and meaning of the indenture of settlement of 1781 to limit the estates to such person as should be heir at law of Samuel Rolle, in case George Earl of Orford died without issue. He insisted that the deed of 1794 was executed by Horace Earl of Orford, for the purpose of confirming the limitations created by the settlement of 1792, and barring himself and his heirs from making any claim to the estates, or deriving any title thereto by the operation of the settlement of 1781 or otherwise, and in order effectually to carry into execution Earl George's intention, that the estates should vest in the right heirs of Samuel Rolle, being the right heirs of him (George Earl of Orford), ex parte materna, the Rolles being the family from which he had derived those estates. He admitted the possession of his father Lord Clinton, and afterwards of the trustees in the settlement of 1792, and of receivers appointed by the Court in a suit in which the Defendant (then an infant) was Plaintiff, and the Earl of Coventry and others Defendants, to carry [15] into execution the settlement of 1792, which possession was alleged to have been quiet and uninterrupted till the filing of the bill. The answer then stated indentures of lease and release, dated the 26th and 27th of November, 1811, between Edward Hughes Ball, then an infant, and heir at law of Sir Edward Hughes, deceased, of the first part: certain parties therein named of the second part: and the Defendant, Drake, of the third part: by which, after reciting the mortgage deed of 1785, and an order by which it was referred to enquire whether the said E. H. Ball was an infant trustee within the meaning of the statute and the report of the Master thereon, it was witnessed, that in consideration of £20,000 paid by the Defendant Drake to the parties of the second part, the said E. H. Ball conveyed to the said Defendant, his heirs and assigns, subject to the equity of redemption subsisting in the said estates, which sum of £20,000 so paid was the proper monies of the Defendant Lord Clinton, the name of the Defendant Drake being made use of only as a trustee for him. The Defendant further said, that no application had ever been made by the Plaintiffs to him, or to the Defendants the trustees, to his knowledge, previous to filing the bill, except by two letters to the Defendant Drake, written in May and June, 1812, and thereby referred to: but that both the Plaintiffs permitted him, the Defendant, and those claiming under him, to enjoy the estates without setting up any claim thereto, although under no disability to do so. He submitted, that it was the intention both of Earl George when he executed the settlement of 1781, and of Earl Horace when he [16] executed the deed of 1791, that the estates should become vested in the family of Samuel Rolle, so as to be a provision for the person entitled to the barony of Clinton, which title was in Earl George, and descendible to the family of the said Samuel Rolle. The answer then stated indentures of the 4th and 5th of July, 1794, between Lord Clinton (described as heir of Samuel Rolle, and heir ex parte maternâ of George Earl of Orford,) of the first part: the trustees of the settlement of 1792 of the second part; and Sir Lawrence Palk, Bart., of the third part: whereby, after reciting that the estates were, on the death of Earl George, vested in the said Lord Clinton in fee as right heir of Samuel Rolle, and that the trustees of the said settlement had applied to Sir Lawrence Palk to advance £25,000 on the security of the said estates, under the trust of the settlement which he had agreed to do, it was witnessed, that the said trustees at the request of Lord Clinton, and the said Lord Clinton did grant, etc. and confirm to the said Sir Lawrence Palk, his heirs, etc. all the said manors, etc. which were the estate and inheritance of the said Samuel Rolle, and afterwards of the said George Earl of Orford, in the counties of Devon and Cornwall, subject to the said mortgage for £20,000 to Sir Edward Hughes, and subject also to redemption on payment of the said £25,000, and such further sum as Sir Lawrence Palk might thereafter advance, with interest. The Defendant then submitted, that the Plaintiffs were entitled to no relief in equity: and the late Lord Clinton, and the trustees and receivers, having been in quiet and undisturbed possession and enjoyment for upwards [17] of twenty years before the filing of the bill without any claim made, except by the said two letters, the Defendant claimed the same benefit of such length of possession and of the statutes as if he had pleaded the same. He further said, that on the faith of having a good title under the deeds of 1781 and 1791, he had made several dispositions of large parts of the estates of his grandfather Trefusis, and had paid various debts of his father which he was not liable to pay: and that his father was, as he believed, principally induced to claim the barony of Clinton, in consequence of his possessing the estate which had been enjoyed with that barony.

The Defendant Drake, in like manner, submitted the construction and effect of the deeds of 1781 and 1791, and claimed, as trustee for Lord Clinton, the full benefit of the length of time and of the statutes.

The Defendants St. John and Fortescue (surviving trustees of the settlement of 1792) said, that until the filing of the present bill no notice of the claim or demand of the Plaintiffs was ever made to them, or either of them, and claimed indemnity.

The Defendant, Sir Lawrence Palk, stated the application made to him by Lord Clinton, then being in the possession or enjoyment of the estates, and being or pretending to be with the full knowledge of Earl Horace, absolutely seised of and entitled thereto, and his consequent advances of money on the security of the estates under the mortgage deed of 1791, amounting, together with interest, at the time of putting in his answer, to £11,000 and upwards. He claimed to be entitled [18] to the full benefit of that mortgage, as well against the Plaintiffs as against Lord Clinton and those claiming under him: and also all such benefit of the mortgage to Sir Edward Hughes as a collateral security for his advances generally, and especially for sums paid for interest by him to the representatives of Sir Edward Hughes upon his mortgage of £20,000 as he had in any manner become entitled to in equity by virtue of his contract with Lord Clinton and his trustees, and under the circumstances of the case; he alleged that he had never, until long after he had made these advances, any knowledge or notice of any right or title in Earl Horace or any person claiming under him, or any belief or suspicion, or any reason to believe or suspect that Lord Clinton and his trustees had not full right and title: And he submitted that, even if Lord Clinton's title was not absolutely good and indefeasible at law against Earl Horace and those claiming under him, yet, Earl Horace having permitted Lord Clinton to enjoy the estates as his own under a claim of absolute ownership, and having, with full knowledge of the trust-deed of 1792, instead of questioning Lord Clinton's right to the estates, confirmed it in the manner before mentioned; and having also permitted the Defendant to advance his money upon the faith of the title so claimed, and suffered to be enjoyed, the Plaintiffs ought not, claiming under the said Earl Horace, to be permitted to impeach the title of the Defendant as a mortgagee, and were entitled to no relief against him, except to redeem him by paying off the whole principal and interest due on his mortgage; and he claimed the same benefit of the mortgage security as if he had pleaded the same.

[19] Sir Lawrence Palk having died after he had put in his answer, the suit was revived as against his representatives.

The cause came on for hearing at the Rolls before Sir W. Grant, the Master of the Rolls, and was most elaborately argued (see the Report, 2 Mer. 171) by Mr. Leach (now Sir John Leach, M. R.), Mr. Shadwell (now Sir L. Shadwell, V. C.), and Mr. Sugden, for the Plaintiffs; by Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Bell, Mr. Heald, and Mr. Preston, for the Defendant, Lord Clinton; by Mr. Benyon and Mr. Blake, for the Defendants, St. John and Fortescue, trustees in the settlement of 1792; and by Mr. Hart, Mr. Horne, and Mr. Longley, for the Defendant, Sir Rob. Palk, the mortgagee.

The decree was in favour of the Plaintiff on all the questions raised in the argument; but upon the effect of the limitation in the deed of 1781, being a question of law, the Master of the Rolls, considering the importance of the interests to be affected by the decision, thought it right, if desired by the counsel of Lord Clinton, to send a case for the opinion of a Court of Law; and, accordingly, after the original hearing of this cause, a case was sent for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, in which the question was, whether R. G. W. Trefusis, afterwards Lord Clinton, the father of the Defendant Lord Clinton, took any estate under the deed of the 2d day of August, 1781?

The case was twice argued (see the Report, 2 B. and A. 625) in the Court of King's Bench: first by Mr. Richardson (afterwards a Judge of the K. B.) for the [20] Plaintiffs, and Mr. Preston for the Defendants; and afterwards by Mr. Shadwell for the Plaintiffs, and Mr. Serjeant Copley for the Defendants. The following certificates were sent by the Judges:—

“ This case has been argued before us by counsel, and considering that the words ‘ the right heirs of Samuel Rolle,’ are words of plain and well-known import, and according to that import must denote George Earl of Orford, the settlor, we think that R. G. W. Trefusis, afterwards Lord Clinton, took no estate under the said indenture of the 2d of August, 1781. Supposing a different construction might be put upon those words in a deed, and that they might be held to designate some other persons in order to carry into effect a manifest intention on the part of the settlor, yet, we do not collect with certainty, from the language of the deed, what other person the settlor intended to designate by those words. C. Abbott, G. S. Holroyd, W. D. Best.

“ The case has been twice argued; and considering that it appears by the indenture of the 2d of August, 1781, that the said George Earl of Orford knew himself to be the then heir of Samuel Rolle; considering, also, that during the life of the said George Earl of Orford, or so long as there should be any issue of his body, no person could legally come within the description of right heir of Samuel Rolle but the said George Earl of Orford and his issue, who were of the united line of Walpole and Rolle, and were also provided for by the estate tail created by the indenture; considering, also, that it appears plainly by that indenture that the said George Earl of Orford meant to provide for the separate line of [21] Rolle, that no person of that separate line could come within the description of right heir of Samuel Rolle till the united line should be exhausted, and that a limitation, by way of remainder to heirs or children, is not necessarily confined to such persons as are within that description at the time the limitation is created, I am of opinion, that the effect of the indenture of the 2d of August, 1781, was to vest in the said George Earl of Orford an estate in tail general; with remainder (if he should make no appointment) to such persons as at the expiration of the estate tail should be the right heir of Samuel Rolle in fee; and, consequently, that the said R. G. W. Trefusis took an estate in fee under the said indenture.—J. Bayley.”

In 1820 the cause came on for hearing before Sir Thos. Plumer, M. R. (Sir W. Grant had retired), on the equity reserved. Two objections were taken for want of parties, upon which the Master of the Rolls reserved his opinion till the delivery of his judgment on the merits.

The first objection was, that the brothers and sisters of the Defendant Lord Clinton, or the eldest brother, were not made parties.

The second objection was, that the persons entitled to the equity of redemption of certain estates formerly belonging to George Earl of Orford, in the county of Dorset, and which were included with the estates in question in the cause in the mortgage made in 1785 to Sir E. Hughes, were not parties to the suit.

The case then proceeded upon the merits, and was argued by Mr. Shadwell, Mr. Sugden, and [22] Mr. Brent (in the absence of the Attorney-General) for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Bell, Mr. Heald, and Mr. Pepys for the Defendant Lord Clinton.

Mr. Benyon and Mr. Blake for the Defendants St. John and Fortescue; and

Mr. Hart, Mr. Horne, and Mr. Longley for the representatives of Sir L. Palk.

The Master of the Rolls, on the 8th of August, 1820, pronounced a judgment (see the Report, 2 J. and W.) in favour of the Defendants, dismissing the bill by a decree which was adopted, pro formâ, as the decree of the Lord Chancellor, and enrolled, and thereupon an appeal was presented by the Plaintiffs to the House of Lords, which was brought on for hearing, and argued during many days in May and June 1821.

For the Appellants, The Attorney-General.*

There is no such thing as equitable disseisin. Hansard v. Hardy, 18 Ves. 455.; Lord Grenville v. Blyth, 16 Ves. 221.; Hopkins v. Hopkins, 1 Atk. 581.; Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 87.; Horenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Sch. and Lef. 633.; the possession of the tenant of a mortgagee is like the possession of the tenant for years, it is the possession of the person in whom the freehold is vested; Co. Litt. 15 a. as to the doctrine of possessio fratris: the receipt of rent cannot amount to an equitable disseisin, except at election; the title of a reversioner is not displaced after levying a fine by the lapse of five years. His right accruing afterwards may be enforced, even in a case of forfeiture, [23] Co. Litt. 252 a.; Mrs. Damer's right could not be barred if the equity of redemption was in her, since her title did not accrue until after the death of George Earl of Orford. If there was an equitable disseisin, no estate passed by the will of Horace Earl of Orford. Then it descended to Lord Cholmondeley as heir at law. If it was in Mrs. Damer, the title accrued by the death of Horace Earl of Orford in 1797, and the twenty years had not elapsed. It is not a universal rule that twenty years is the term of limitation in equity. Collins v. Goodall, 2 Vern. 235. A rent commencing by grant is not barred by forty years. Stackhouse v. Barnston, 10 Ves. 453. The statute of limitations does not apply to a legal, much less to an equitable rent-charge. It is a principle of equity that no act of a trustee can prejudice or narrow the interest of the cestuique trust. The mortgagee was a trustee for the party entitled; and if an estate had been gained by wrong, it was the act or permission of the trustee. Fonb. Tr. Eq. 2. 166.

The Lord Chancellor said, that a mortgagee was only in a certain qualified sense a trustee, since a mortgagee in possession, keeping no account and receiving the rents for twenty years without account, would become the owner of the estate. The mortgagor would be barred by the lapse of time; that it had been held in a cause at the

* Sir Robert (afterwards) Lord Clifford, M. R. The arguments were nearly the same as in the courts below; a very short summary, therefore, is given chiefly for the sake of the interlocutory judicial observations.

Cockpit, where Lord Kenyon assisted, that such a case stated in a pleading would leave it open to demurrer.*

The Attorney-General continued, The mortgagee cannot, by collusion with a stranger, defeat [24] the equitable right; that some person had the right to redeem was admitted; that the mortgagee had gained an absolute estate by acquiescence was not contended; under the deed of 1781 there never had been a possession adverse to the title, nor could be, as it was settled in a similar case, that abatement by a younger son does not operate against the elder, because they claim under the same title; Litt. Ten.; that the limitation in the deed of 1781 had not been disturbed; and if Lord Clinton applied to redeem, he could only state a wrongful possession under the mortgagee, who is a trustee for the right owner; that in the deed assigning the mortgage to Drake in 1811, the equity of redemption is reserved to the same persons who were entitled under the deed of 1785, and according to the limitations of the deed of 1781; that is the heirs of George Earl of Orford.

Here The Lord Chancellor observed, that Lord Clinton was not a party to the deed of assignment.

The Attorney-General answered, that Drake was a trustee for Lord Clinton, as appeared by the answer of Lord Clinton; and, therefore, it was the admission of his agent that the limitations of the deed of 1781 remained untouched. He then submitted the four following positions:—1. That there was no equitable disseisin, if the estate of the mortgagee was untouched; that the right to redeem was in the party shewing a right under the original mortgagor; that no act of the mortgagee, by receipt of rents or otherwise, could alter that right; and, therefore, the lapse of twenty years did not affect the right. 2. If there could have been an equitable disseisin, as the right passed under the will to Mrs. Damer by the death of Horace Earl of [25] Orford, the twenty years had not elapsed. 3. That if there was an equitable disseisin by analogy to legal disseisin, the right did not pass, but descended to Lord Cholmondeley as heir-at-law. 4. That if at the death of George Earl of Orford there was a doubt whether the estate passed under the will or descended to Lord Cholmondeley as heir, it was competent to the heir and devisee to agree to divide the estate, and that it was not material to prove the fact, because it is immaterial to the Defendant; that it is not a case of champerty, because there was a right or claim to the estates in one or other of the Plaintiffs.

The Lord Chancellor said, the allegation of the bill was, that doubts and difficulties had arisen which were compromised by the agreement, and that the truth of this fact could not appear but by the production of the agreement.

The Attorney-General answered, that it had been held by the Vice-Chancellor (Sir John Leach) in Ryan v. Anderson, 3 Mad. 174. that such agreement was legal, and that the allegation need not be proved, as it was immaterial to the Defendant, whose interest was not affected by it; that the same doctrine appears in Stapilton v. Stapilton, 1 Atk. 2, cited 1 V. and B. 28.

Mr. Shadwell—for the Appellants—contended that such an agreement could not amount to champerty or maintenance, according to the definitions of those offences. Co. Litt. 368., Blac. Com. 4. 134.; for the supposed offenders were here parties to the record. Nor is it within the statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 9. If the possession of the mortgagee is the possession of the party entitled to the equity of re-[26]-demption, it cannot be a pretended title, for the statute excepts the case of possession.

The agreement is by parol, although minutes have been taken of what the agreement is to be.

The Lord Chancellor: It may be said, when you come to redeem, that you must shew your title as you state it. If by the proviso in a mortgage I agree to account with A. B., I cannot be compelled by C. D. to account. If, under the proviso for redemption you can shew that the two Plaintiffs are entitled to have the account, that will do. If Mrs. Damer were the sole Plaintiff, she might require the account, and it would be immaterial what agreement was made out of Court. If a mortgagor files a bill for redemption, it may be material who is to pay him the surplus.

Mr. Shadwell: The account is not the substance of the Plaintiff's case, and he may waive any part of the prayer of his bill. As to the effect of the deed of confirmation,

* See Cuthbert v. Creasy, in a note at the end of the Report of this case.

it is limited, not general nor absolute, and ought not to be extended beyond the intention, and will be rectified if there is a mistake. Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, Moseley, 361.

The Lord Chancellor: Many cases in Moseley are extremely well reported, others not so.

Mr. Shadwell then proceeded to argue that courts of equity interfere after the lapse of twenty years, and cited Bonney v. Ridgard, 1 Cox. 145, cited in Andrews v. Wriley, 4 Bro. C. C. 121.; Medlicott v. O'Donnell, 1 Ba. and Be. 156.; and Moore v. Blake, 1 Ba. and Be. 62. reversed on appeal, 4 Dow. 230. As to mortgagees in possession, he said the doctrine had been fluctuating, and cited Pearson v. Pulley, 1 Ch. Ca. 102., and 3 P. W. [27] 287, note B; Meller v. Lees, 2 Atk. 191.; Aggas v. Pickerell, 3 Atk. 225.; Acherley v. Roe, 5 Ves. 565.; Harwood v. Oglander, 6 Ves. jun. 199.; and the appeal against the judgment, 8 Ves. 106., in which the Lord Chancellor says that relief is not to be denied on account of lapse of time. Collins v. Goodall, 2 Vern. 235., decided on the authority of Foster's case, 8 Co. 128.; Hansard v. Hardy, 18 Ves. 455.; Hardy v. Reeves, 4 Ves. 466., to prove that adverse beneficial ownership for twenty years is not in equity a sufficient bar, but that after that time the courts will interfere against persons not having the legal estate. He then argued, that if there were such a thing as equitable disseisin, Horace Lord Orford could not devise an estate of which he was not seised; and the heir at law might have brought his writ.

Lord Redesdale. But Lord Cholmondeley must claim as heir of George and Horace Lord Orford. Then comes the question whether he can quarrel with the deed of Horace Earl of Orford.

Mr. Shadwell. The descent would have enabled the party to bring a writ of right. Seisin is not necessary. Co. Litt. 281 a. Fitz. N. B. 11. Lord Cholmondeley, if he claims at law, might sue as the heir of George Earl of Orford; the question is, whether a possession originally tortious can be made good by length of time, unless it is clothed with the legal estate. Bowles v. Stewart, 1 Sch. and Lef. 209.

The mortgagee is not simply a trustee, but by accounting remains a trustee for the party entitled while he is out of possession; receiving interest and willing to be redeemed, he holds for the party entitled. A court of equity might refuse [28] the account by analogy of the statute of limitations, but yet direct the conveyance of the legal estate. Courts have laid hold of slight circumstances to uphold the rights of the mortgagor to redeem. In 1811 there is a formal recognition of Lord Clinton that the estate is redeemable, the limitation is to be taken from the time of the recognition. Courts of equity decide upon legal possession. Harrison v. Rollins (1 Sim. and Stu. 171), Rolls, 24th February, 1812, decided on the authority of Dallas v. Floyd, Rolls, 1737. The right must be clothed with a legal estate, Pim v. Goodwin, not reported *, but cited Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Meri. 303. In that case, it was the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, that the right of redemption was in the party successively entitled reckoning from the time when their titles respectively accrued.

The Lord Chancellor. The question there was, whether the time is to be counted from a certain date, or when each title successively accrues. Nothing was decided in the case, but only judicial doubts intimated.

Mr. Heald and Mr. Butler, for the Respondent Lord Clinton. There are four points of defence: 1. The construction of the deed of 1781; 2. The confirmation by Earl Horace in 1791; 3. The bar by length of time; 4. The agreement entered into between Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer, which would prevent the Plaintiffs from having the relief prayed by the bill, and they could not have different relief on this bill.

On the hearing before Sir William Grant he made no decree, but referred it to law. The Judges [29] differed in opinion. Sir Thomas Plumer, after consideration of all the cases cited, and of all which his own researches furnished, dismissed the bill.

The deed of 1791, if we are right in our construction of the deed of 1781, is a needless instrument; but in the manner in which we are directed to argue, it is of the first importance.

* See the note at the end of the report of this case.

Nothing was concealed in 1794 from Earl Horace. The recitals of the deed of 1794 are important.* In the exercise of the ownership of these estates, the late Lord Clinton, in 1792, conveyed the fee of these estates to trustees. Then the deed of 1794 recites that "doubts had arisen whether George Earl of Orford having joined in the mortgage of 1785, did not revoke," etc. The existence or retention of a particle of title in Earl Horace was inconsistent with the confirmation of the uses of the settlement of 1792 contained in this deed. The Attorney-General says this deed of 1794 was made merely to remove the objection from the deed of 1785, and that it would be monstrous to hold this a complete conveyance: but in many instances, as in the construction of wills, the particular intention is sacrificed to the general intention.

Under the powers to lease contained in the deed of 1792, a large tenantry have acquired considerable interests. A lady has been induced to ally herself by marriage with this noble Lord. £34,000 has been raised, and other acts done, on the supposition that the title was in Lord Clinton.

[30] If Earl Horace did labour under this mistake, a bill must be filed to rectify it. There is no such bill.

The cases of Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. sen. 126; Pusey v. Desbouverie, 3 P. Wms. 315.; Farewell v. Coker, cited 2 Mer. 353; Cole v. Gibson, 1 Ves. sen. 503, have been relied on. But a bill was filed for the purpose of rectifying the deed in all those cases. On this bill to redeem a mortgage, there is nothing said about rectifying the instrument.

As to time, there is no variation of opinion among all the Judges in equity here and in Ireland. As a general proposition equity follows the law. Equity follows the law either in obedience or by analogy to the statute of limitations. This doctrine is as old as the statute itself. Smith v. Clay, 3 Bro. C. C. 639, note; and Lord Redesdale's observations about the statute of limitations in Bond v. Hopkins, 1 Scho. and Lefroy, 128. In Horenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Scho. and Lefroy, 637, he says, "The same time would bar a redemption that would bar any other equity." Underwood v. Lord Courtown, 2 Scho. and Lefroy, 41.; Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 87.; Bonney v. Ridyard, cited ibid. 97, are all authorities on this point.

A large tenantry is in this case waiting with great anxiety the decision of your Lordships. Lord Kenyon observes, in a similar case, that there are many parties interested. Andrew v. Wrigley, 1 Bro. C. C. 125.; Townshend v. Townshend, 1 Bro. C. C. 550.

The "exception to the statute of limitations holds only between a trustee and cestui que trust." Mr. Butler's argument in Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. and Walk. 29.; Davie v. Beardsham, 1 Cha. Ca. 39. We deny that the mortgagee is a trustee to [31] all intents and purposes. No title can be acquired by a trustee against his cestui que trust, but a mortgagee may acquire a title against the mortgagor.

Hopkins v. Hopkins, 1 Atk. 581, was cited by the Plaintiffs' counsel, and by Sir W. Grant (2 Mer. 358.) as one of the grounds of his judgment. This case has been looked into, and Atkyns's Report found to be incorrect. The original MS. in Lord Hardwicke's handwriting has been produced, and shews the incorrectness of Atkyns's Report.†

It is not necessary for the purposes of this suit to decide on Lord Clinton's title, it is only on the Plaintiffs' title your Lordships have to decide. The judgment of Sir William Grant was founded on a mistaken idea of the point before him: he overlooks the length of time, and considers the right to redeem only. Lomar v. Bird, 1 Vern. 182, was cited by Plaintiffs. Harmood v. Oglander, 8 Ves. 106, was cited by Sir William Grant.

Two misreported cases, and one inapplicable, were cited in support of the judgment.

Mr. Shadwell seems to consider that the case of mortgagor and mortgagee rests on the circumstance of the legal estate which the mortgagee has. A second mortgagee could, if let into possession, avail himself of his long possession and keeping no account. Why was Lord Clinton's title discussed at the Rolls? The Plaintiffs' title to redeem was the only question. It was unnecessary to consider Lord Clinton's title. The question on the record being whether or not Lord Cholmondeley's bill shall be dismissed. I do not rest Lord Clinton's success in this cause on his right to succeed if he [32] should file a bill to redeem. But I think he would succeed in such bill.

Casborn v. Scarfe, 1 Atk. 603.; Starkhouse v. Barnston, 10 Ves. 453.; Mellor v. Lees, 2 Atk. 491. relate to rents, and do not concern lands.

Stapilton v. Stapilton, 1 Atk. 2.; Stockley v. Stockley, 1 Ves. and Beam. 23. relate to family arrangements, which are not easily disturbed in equity.

Bowles v. Stewart, 1 Scho. and Lef. 209. was cited as a case where relief beyond twenty years was given. It was under very particular circumstances of suppression of deeds, most dissimilar to the present.

Pearson v. Pulley, 1 Ch. Ca. 402., merely referred to a rule to be adopted in future.

Acherley v. Roe, 5 Ves. Jun. 565., has very little to do with the present case.

There is no evidence whether the agreement entered into by the Appellants to divide the estate between them is voluntary or for valuable consideration, whether in writing and by parol, or whether it would give a valid title in equity or not. Both parties could not be entitled.

In the absence of the agreement, we may assume that it would give a valid title. Now, if we suppose this to be a good, valid, and binding agreement, how can your Lordships decree, according to the prayer of this bill, to both; or, as they now urge at the bar, to Mrs. Damer only?*

[33] The Attorney-General in reply: The objection as to parties was not taken in time. If the Court thinks the objection material, we may be allowed to amend by making parties. Sir T. Plumer decided only on length of time. In substance and in effect this is a bill to redeem a mortgage, and get in the legal estate outstanding in the mortgagee, Mr. Drake. I shall consider the case, first, with reference to the question between a mortgagor and mortgagee.

Now, if twenty or twice twenty years had elapsed, and the mortgagee admits the right to redeem—

The Lord Chancellor: There is a difficulty as to the term. The term includes the Dorset estate.

The Attorney-General: We are content the Dorset estate shall be free from the mortgage.

Lord Redesdale: There is a question who is entitled to the mortgage money. All the persons claiming under the settlement of 1792 may claim as against Lord Clinton. This is a question, not between mortgagee and mortgagor, but between persons claiming an equity of redemption under the mortgagor. Suppose the mortgage 200 years old; that there is a mistake as to the right at the end of fifty years; and after 150 years' possession, an estate claimed by the right owner; could the claim be allowed? All the great estates in the kingdom are subject to mortgage for portions for daughters, etc. The question is, whether the existence of a mortgage is to make the statute of limitations of no effect for an indefinite time; you must hold, too, that fine and non-claim would not bar.

[34] The Attorney-General: The difficulty now thrown out exists at law in cases of ninety-nine years' leases.

Lord Redesdale: The question between mortgagor and mortgagee cannot possibly satisfy this case. The estate descending to co-heirs, one half may be redeemed and the other not, if one co-heir has been admitted and the other not: this has been decided. The mortgagee is an indifferent person. Can a tenant who has attorned reject his landlord? Your decree must be against Lord Clinton, not against Mr. Drake. The real question as to operation of time here is, whether persons claiming under the settlement of 1792, or Lord Cholmondeley, or Mrs. Damer, are entitled to this property. You go on mere right, and the question is,

* Mr. Butler's argument for the Respondent, Lord Clinton, was the same, verbatim, as in the Court below.

For the other parties, the same counsel as in the Court below appeared and argued the case. There was no material difference in the arguments.

whether mere right is not barred by the statute of limitations. There are other questions also.

The Attorney-General: The passage in Lord Clinton's answer, as to the assignment to Drake in 1811, is an admission of the right of redemption under the deed of 1781.

It comes to the question, whether Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer, or Lord Clinton, has the right to redeem in this cause. If Lord Clinton, on the strength of his twenty years' possession, had come to redeem, could he have redeemed? All parties agree that George Earl of Orford had the equity of redemption in him; he died seised thereof: the ultimate decision must rest on the preferable right to redeem; and the question is, whether twenty years' possession will give Lord Clinton a right to redeem, whether Lord Clinton and his father have gained the equity of redemption. It is impossible we can be barred, unless Lord Clinton has acquired [35] the right. The Defendants' counsel were cautious in arguing that question. Mr. Butler indeed stated, that at the end of twenty years he acquired the right to redeem.

I come now to examine the question, how the rule in equity is. There is no such thing as acquiring an equitable estate by wrong.

Lord Redesdale: Yes, if there is possession in equity.

The Lord Chancellor: The estate, if gained at all, is not gained merely by an act between mortgagor and mortgagee, but by laches of the person really entitled. Upon the last minute of the twentieth year the mortgagee may be redeemed; upon the first minute of the twenty-first year he cannot. Is there any thing so monstrous in saying, that an equity may be acquired by twenty years' possession?

The Attorney-General: After a lapse of 200 years, the Courts would presume a release or conveyance. It must come to this, whether tortious possession by Lord Clinton, and the laches of the Appellants, give Lord Clinton a right to redeem. Adverse possession has been confounded in the argument for the Respondent, with adverse seisin; and adverse possession at law, will not prevent the recovery of an estate. Can there be a disseisin of an equitable interest? The negative is shewn by Hopkins v. Hopkins, 1 Atk. 581. The alteration in expression which has been discovered by the Respondent's counsel in this case, in the observations of Lord Hardwicke in delivering judgment, makes no difference in the substance of the doctrine. Mr. Horne contended, that Lord Clinton [36] disseised the trustee and gained the legal estate. In point of law, the trustee has continued in possession. The possession of Lord Clinton was the possession of the mortgagee or trustee. All the cases cited by Mr. Butler, except the first class, are where the tenant in possession had the legal estate. All, except the first class, come within Lord Hardwicke's exception.

As to the second class. In Davie v. Beardsham there was an acknowledgment of title. There was an adverse possession of legal estate for twenty years, and the lord had admitted the heir. How does that case apply?

The third class is between mortgagor and mortgagee. There the mortgagee has the legal estate.

The fourth class relates to the time for a bill of review. At law twenty years bars a writ of error, and so it shall bar a bill of review. It is so laid down in Smith v. Clay, 3 B. C. C. 639, note.

Courts of equity have interfered in cases of rents after forty years. Acherley v. Roe, 5 Ves. jun. 565.

As to the fifth class. In Bonney v. Ridgard the legal estate was in the party in possession.

But suppose an equitable estate can be gained by wrong. Has Lord Clinton's possession gained an estate by disseisin? There is a distinction between disseisin and ouster of possession. Receipt of rents is nothing. The possession of the trustee is the possession of the person equitably entitled. The language of the statute of limitations, 21 Jac. 1. c. 16., should be looked to,—“No person shall make any entry into any land, etc. unless within twenty years from the time when his title shall accrue.” Reading v. Royston, 2 Salk. 423, shews that the [37] statute does not run except where there is an actual ouster or disseisin. Mere receipt of rent is not necessarily a disseisin: it is only a disseisin at election. Roll. Abr. Disseisin. (C) pl. 12. Tenant at Sufferance. Where the statute of limitations runs there must be a disseisin at the commencement of the twenty years. Doe v. Danvers, 7 East, 299.

The Lord Chancellor: I question the applicability of the legal doctrine of disseisin. Suppose the case of mortgagee after twenty-five years, admitting by will the estate to be a mortgage estate, will this affect a third person in possession? Time, and time only, courts of equity have put it upon. Out of a court of equity it might be held rank nonsense to say you may file the bill in the morning, but not after twelve o'clock at night; but so it has been held in equity.

The Attorney-General mentioned Acherley v. Roe.

The Lord Chancellor: That was not a case of mortgage certainly.

The Attorney-General: It must follow from this doctrine that twenty years' possession will give a right to redeem.

Mr. Butler: Yes.

The Attorney-General: This is the first time I have heard it maintained. In Lomar v. Bird, 1 Vern. 182., which was the case of a lease for ninety-nine years at law, it was held that fifty or sixty years' wrong payment of rent will not prevent a recovery by a rightful owner after the lease has expired. There are other authorities: Doe v. Danvers, 7 East, 299.; Williams v. Thomas, 42 East, 141.; Doe v. Perkins, 3 Maule and Sel. 271.

[38] The Lord Chancellor: If A. B. is trustee for C. D., and C. D. mortgages to E. F., and E. F. holds for more than twenty years without admission, would equity permit C. D. to come to redeem after twenty years? to redeem either E. F. or A. B.? does not A. B. after twenty years become trustee for E. F.?

The Attorney-General: The question is between the contending equities in these parties.

In 1811, Lord Clinton admits that the lands are to be conveyed to him, subject to the redemption under the deed of 1785; and it comes to the question, who is entitled to the redemption under the deed of 1785? I submit there is no dictum or case to shew a right can be gained by a wrongful possession in equity. Lord Grenville v. Blyth; Harwood v. Oglander. Lord Clinton entered under the deed of 1781. This is a most important question, as to time, in your Lordships' view; and important on the other side, if your Lordships decide that an estate in equity may be gained by wrong.

Another question is, whether a mortgagee or trustee, in collusion with a third party, shall deprive the party rightfully entitled of his right. The hardship is as much to the Appellants as to the Respondents. I never have understood that Courts have been anxious and astute to tie parties down to the strict line of the statute.

A more important question upon principle was never before your Lordships, than to decide whether an equitable estate can be gained by wrong.

The Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon): In a case of this extreme importance, both to the parties and the pub[39]-lic, and recollecting that two very eminent Judges have differed in their opinion, on a case of so much importance, and calling your Lordships' attention to the very able manner, and the very great display of legal learning with which this has been argued at your Lordships' bar, I do not think your Lordships can be, properly, advised to deal with this case as you ought to deal with it, unless I should suggest the propriety of deferring judgment till Friday se'nnight. In the mean time, it may perhaps be useful to proceed so far in the consideration of this case, as to state to your Lordships what appears to me to be the nature of the cause, as we are to collect it from the record, not meaning to give any opinion whatever, at this moment, upon any of the important points which have been discussed at the bar. Whenever it becomes my duty to give that declaration of opinion, it will be necessary to preface it by a statement of the facts, as they appear upon the record, and, probably, it may be a useful employment of an hour, at present, to state those facts as they are to be collected from the record.

I am desirous, however, first to say, that when I proposed to hear the counsel on the equitable point first, I certainly did not make that proposition under any notion, that it would or would not, eventually, turn out that it would be necessary or unnecessary to hear the counsel on the effect of the deed of 1781. I had long foreseen, that in a case where the property was so large, where to the parties themselves the question was so important, and where the bearing of the decision upon titles in this country was so excessively important, it was next to impossible but that one or other of the [40] parties would bring this case before your Lordships, finally, to be here decided: and I felt it to be my duty, as far as I could, to approach the discussion which I was to hear at the bar, and the decision which was to be made afterwards, with a mind unprejudiced and unaffected by any other matter than what I had heard judicially.

There was another mode of proceeding which might have been recommended to you, but it seemed to me to be less advisable: that is, to have begun first by considering what was the effect of the deed of 1781, because, if the legal effect of the deed of 1781 was to leave the property not in George Earl of Orford, but to have given it to those under whom the Clinton family might claim, that would have put an end to all equitable questions: but it would have decided a mere legal point on a single instrument, and upon one of the most important questions that in the course of my professional life I ever remember to have occurred, affecting so deeply and to such an extent titles in this country as the equitable question does—it would have left the case in circumstances the most unadvisable, namely, that question having been decided one way by one great Judge, and another way by another, and it, therefore, appeared to me important for the interests of all persons entitled to landed property that the equitable question should be set at rest one way or the other. If it ought to be decided with Lord Clinton, there is no occasion to discuss the legal question; if it is not to be decided with him, then it may become necessary to discuss the legal question: and in this view of the case, it appeared to me we should best consult the general adminis-[41]-tration of justice by taking the equitable question first.

It must, certainly, be stated to your Lordships, that this is a case in which you must decide by an attention to the rules of law, by which I mean the rules of equity with reference to this point, and by attention to those rules only. No considerations of hardship must influence your minds: and the real question here will be, what a court of equity ought to do under the circumstances in which this case is brought before you upon this record. Those circumstances I will now endeavour to state. I am very well aware, that this sort of formal statement cannot gain much of your attention, but it is a statement that must be made, and, perhaps, it will be best made while the circumstances of the case are fresh in your recollection, and you will be better able to retain the memory of them when they are stated in detail than when picked up in the course of the hearing of the cause.

As to the circumstance of the want of parties in this case, unless I mistake the nature of this case, I think there are some absent who ought to be here. I understand it to be the wish of both parties to waive that question, as far as it can be waived: but in one way of determining this case I do not think it can be waived. If your Lordships shall be of opinion that Lord Clinton has the equitable title, the want of parties may be waived: but if your Lordships should be of opinion the other way, then, if there are parties who have interests that may be bound by your decision, inasmuch as you have them not before you to consent to the decision, I do not know that you could, in consequence of any thing that has passed from the [42] bar, waive the necessity of making other parties: and if the case should take that turn, it may be necessary to go no further than direct the record to be amended.

The first question that here arises is, (if I may so term it, having of late been very conversant with Scotch cases,) the title of the plaintiff to pursue. Now let me suppose, and I only put it now by way of supposition, I do not say the fact is so, but let me suppose, for the sake of argument, that there had been a possession of more than twenty years when this bill was filed, adverse to every body who could claim under George Lord Orford, or under Horatio Lord Orford: indeed, it is not necessary, with a view to the circumstance which I am now alluding to, that there should have been an adverse possession for twenty years: but let me suppose, that it appears upon this record, that neither Mrs. Damer, nor Lord Cholmondeley, nor any body for them, had been in possession. I do not now enter into the question whether the mortgagee must not be considered in possession for them: but assuming for a moment that the mortgagee was not to be considered in possession for them, under the circumstances of the case. Let me suppose that they had been out of possession for five years or two years, how do they state their title to bring a joint bill. They do so by a sort of allegation, of which there is no proof, and fortunate, perhaps, it is that there is no proof:—but it is insisted at the bar that allegation is enough, and that you need not proceed in such a case secundum allegata et probata, but secundum allegata. After Lord Cholmondeley had stated himself to be the heir at law of Horatio Earl of Orford, and [43] not claiming by this bill as the heir at law of George Earl of Orford, he says, "that some questions had arisen between the Appellants respecting the will and codicil of Horatio Earl of Orford, so far as regards the equity of redemption of the said mortgaged hereditaments; and in order to put an end to such questions, the Appellants had agreed to share the same hereditaments between them." Whether this was a written agreement or a parol agreement, or what sort of agreement it was, or whether it was a promise, is not explained on the record, and it has not been produced to your Lordships if it exists in a producible shape.

Now the policy of our law, both the common law and the statute law, has certainly set its face very much against persons entering into agreements with respect to property of which neither of them have had possession for a limited period. I do not trouble you with a discussion as to the doctrine of maintenance or champerty, or about the meaning or expressions which we find falling from the mouths of some of our Chancellors in courts of equity as to the evidence relative to what they say, "savours or smells of maintenance or champerty;" but your attention must be called in this case, I think, to that upon which I do not observe that the Attorney-General said one word, I mean, the 32 Hen. 8., as to pretended titles. Give me leave to suppose for a moment, that no person alive could doubt that the right and title was either in Mrs. Damer or in Lord Cholmondeley, or, if you please so to put it in both, the question then would be whether, consistently with that statute of the [44] 32 Hen. 8. they could enter into such an agreement as they have here stated upon their bill. It is a question, undoubtedly, which must be agitated with great seriousness, because, if they could not, the fact of entering into it exposes them to very great penalties.

Now I will read a passage which will call your attention, with some degree of accuracy, to what is the question on this part of the record, a passage from one of our best reporters (Plowden, p. 88) in the law. He says, "But before I enter into the consideration of the statute, I will lay down what is a pretended right or title. It seems to me that a pretended right or title is but in one case, and that is, where one is in possession of lands or tenements, and another, that is out of possession, claims them, or sues for them, that is a pretended right or title. For if one has right or title to land, and afterwards he comes to the possession of the same land, his right or title is extinct or suspended in the land, for during the time that he has the land, it is not in esse, ergo, during that time it cannot be termed a right or title. And that such is a pretended right or title, is proved by the statute itself, which has a proviso in it, that it shall be lawful for any one, being in lawful possession, to buy or obtain the pretended right or title of any person or persons to such lands, &c. so that, when the statute saith, he in possession may buy the pretended right of any other, it declares my definition to be true. Further, I take the statute, that if he, who is out of [45] possession, bargains or sells, or makes any covenant or promise to part with the land after he shall have obtained the possession of it, this shall be within the danger of the statute, whether he, who so bargains, sells, or promises, have a good and true right or title or not, and in this point the statute has not altered the law; for the common law before this statute was, that he, who was out of possession, might not bargain, grant, or let his right or title, and if he had done it, it should have been void. Then this statute was made in affirmance of the common law, and not in alteration of it, and all that the statute has done is, it has added a greater penalty to that which was contrary to the common law, viz. that a man shall forfeit the value of the thing bargained or promised, &c.; and to avoid such bargains or promises, where a man is out of possession, is the only point which the statute here remedies."

Many cases, perhaps, cannot be brought even within that construction of the statute, but courts of equity, I believe, have always set their faces against giving any effect to contracts which came within the mischief, which the policy of the statute was intended to guard against; and though the transaction may not be, precisely and accurately, hit by the statute, yet if it comes within the mischief of the statute the Court will not grant relief. Besides this, difficulties will arise as to the manner in which, supposing the plaintiffs should succeed, the decree is to be framed in order to give them such rights, as by conjecture or by information hereafter (if any such information should be given to us) we may be able to ascertain, are vested in them by this agreement, if it be legal.

[46] Here, I come to the consideration of that part of the subject. The title, as far as depends on these deeds, begins in the year 1704. By a deed of that date, which was made in consideration of a marriage then intended, and afterwards had between Samuel Rolle and Margaret Tuckfield, the younger, several estates which are therein mentioned, were conveyed to uses which I need not now trouble you with mentioning, except, that there was one use expressed in the creation of a term of 200 years, which still exists upon trust to raise, if there should be issue of the marriage, only one daughter and no other child, the sum of £20,000 for the portion of such daughter.

That term is still in existence, and one question in this cause will be, for whom is the person in whom that term is now vested, according to the true application of the doctrines of equity, to be considered as holding in trust: a point which it may be right to consider with great attention, and the rather, because of late with respect to those trust terms which are to attend the inheritance, doctrines appear to me to have been held, which bring into question what was understood to be the old law with reference to titles: I mean rules that we seem to have been approaching, that terms, if satisfied, must be considered also as having been surrendered, although I take it, that according to the habit of old conveyancers, there was many a case where the term, although satisfied, was supposed to be kept alive, and not meant to be surrendered; the term being kept alive by the effect of a declaration, that it is to attend the inheritance in some formal instrument, or by that which is the declaration of equity, if there be no such declaration in any instrument. [47] I take it to be a clear rule, that when a term is satisfied until it is put an end to and is surrendered, it is a trust which can mould itself so as to be applicable to the benefit of all who take the property according to their rights, subject to that trust. It is necessary to observe that this was a trust term, because the original mortgage is a mortgage for a term; and putting mortgages out of the question, the great doctrines as to length of time may be very different in those cases that apply to a term of years, and those that apply to a fee-simple of inheritance.

The author of this settlement, Samuel Rolle, made his will in 1717, and he died in the year 1719. He left an only daughter, of the name of Margaret Rolle, who afterwards became the wife of Robert Walpole, Earl of Orford; he died in 1751; she died in January 1781; and they left issue, George Earl of Orford, who died on the 15th of December 1791. This bill being filed in June 1812, and therefore more than twenty years after the death of George Earl of Orford.

The papers upon the table, the deeds, the execution of which is admitted, trace that term of two hundred years to its being vested in the Respondent William Seymour, who, by the prayer of this bill, is called upon to assign that term to the Appellants; and it is unnecessary to state the various instruments which have been executed, under the effect of which by mesue assignments, that term is vested in William Seymour. The question will be for whom is he a trustee of that term.

It appears that recoveries of the estates were suffered in 1781, by George Earl of Orford, and [48] that on the 1st and 2d of August 1781, he made that deed, under which the question, with respect to the legal effect of the last limitation contained in it, arises. The deed is a very peculiar one in the terms of it.

You have before you the question of the equitable rights of the parties, and must, for the present, (whatever may be your opinion upon the effect of that deed of 1781, at law, if it becomes hereafter necessary to determine what is its effect,) understand that deed as vesting the ultimate limitation in the grantor. It may turn out, or it may not, on the discussion of the legal effect of the instrument and the intentions of the grantor, as the intention is to be collected from what appears in the instrument itself, that you may be of opinion, as one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench was of opinion, and as the present Master of the Rolls has intimated his opinion, that the legal effect of that instrument was such as to shut out the equitable consideration; but for the purpose we are now engaged in, your Lordships will take it, without prejudice to future decision on this subject, that this deed did not (either in consequence of a mistake of the nature of the law, or of the mode of executing his intention,) vest the ultimate limitation of this estate in the persons under whom the Clifton family now claim. It may be necessary to state the deed, if any thing of equity is to depend upon the probable intention as to what Horatio Lord Orford would have done, or would not have done, in case he had discovered the mistake; and if any thing is to turn on the question, whether Horatio Lord Orford died with-[49]-out discovering the mistake, or if he discovered it without stating what his intention would be in such a case. If the question should arise, whether those who take after him can be at liberty to avail themselves of a mistake which he did not avail himself of, and while you are in ignorance of the state of his mind on that subject at his death, except so far as you can discover that he devises all his estates by the will, (although it is hardly to be conceived that he really meant by that will to pass this estate with respect to which he had executed the deed of 1794,) what you are to look at is the legal effect of the will, and the legal effect of the will perhaps only. This will constitutes a very singular case in one respect; because, if it should be your opinion that the deed of 1781 has vested the estate in the grantor of that deed, I me in the ultimate limitation, it would be very difficult to deny, in point of fact, that the circumstances would make no difference in point of law, that that deed has not passed to the ancestors of the Clinton family, what it was probably meant to pass to the ancestors of the Clinton family, and this singularity will arise on the other hand, that if the will of Horatio Earl of Orford has the effect to give those estates, that will probably will pass what Horatio did not suppose he was about to pass by his will. These singularities will not justify any different determination as to the deed or will than you would otherwise make.

The deed of 1781, after reciting the recoveries which had been suffered, proceeds thus: "And whereas the said Samuel Rolle did in or about the month of November, 1719, depart this life, [50] without revoking his said will, leaving the said Margaret Rolle, his daughter and only child, him surviving, who afterwards intermarried with the said Robert, then Lord Walpole, afterwards Earl of Orford. And whereas the said Margaret, late Countess of Orford, did in or about the month of January last past depart this life, leaving the said George Earl of Orford her son and only child, who by virtue of the aforesaid will of the said Samuel Rolle became entitled to all his manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments as tenant in tail." And then it proceeds to state the recoveries which had been suffered, which were to the use and behoof of the said George Earl of Orford for and during his natural life, without impeachment of and with full power to do and commit any manner of waste on the said premises, or any part or parts thereof; and from and after his decease to the use and behoof of the heirs of the body of him the said George Earl of Orford lawfully to be begotten; and in default of such issue, to the use and behoof of such person or persons, for such estate or estates, rights and interests, to and for and upon such uses, trusts, intents, and purposes, and subject to such provisos, conditions, and agreements as the said George Earl of Orford by any deed or writing or deeds or writings, or by his last will and testament in writing, by him duly executed in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, shall declare, limit, direct, or appoint; and in default of such declaration, limitation, direction, and appointment, to the use of the right heirs of the said Samuel Rolle for ever, and [51] to and for and upon no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever.

The legal question is, who, in construction of law, will take under that use so limited to the right heirs of Samuel Rolle for ever, and to and for and upon no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever, in an instrument made by George Earl of Orford, describing himself to be "the only son and heir of Robert Earl of Orford by Margaret his wife, who was the daughter and only surviving child and heir of Samuel Rolle, late of Heanton, in the county of Devon, Esquire, deceased, who was the only son and heir at law of Robert Rolle, of the same place, Esquire, by Arabella his wife, who was the daughter and one of the co-heirs of Theophilus Clinton, Earl of Lincoln and Baron of Clinton, also deceased, of the one part," and those other persons of the other part.

The next instrument which I will state, is a deed of the 4th and 6th of June 1785; it is made between certain persons here described, and particularly George Earl of Orford, the person who had made the deed of 1781: it recites the term in the deed of 1701; and in the recital, it points to a fact which has been repeatedly mentioned, that part of those mortgaged premises are in the county of Dorset; and we have no mortgagee here representing the lands in the county of Dorset; the other parts of them are in the counties of Devon and Cornwall. It then recites certain articles that had been made on the marriage in 1724, and that that marriage had taken place by which Robert Lord Walpole had become entitled to the sum of £20,000, which was the portion to be raised under [52] the first instruments. Then it states certain proceedings in the Court of Chancery, under which a mortgage was made of the term of two hundred years, to raise that sum of £20,000 for Robert Walpole. Then it recites that the mortgage was transferred to Lord Keppel and others, and by various assignments of the term, finally in 1811 became a mortgage for the benefit of Lord Clinton. On that assignment of 1811, much has been argued at the bar.

This mortgage having been made, and the assignment of the term having been made at the same time, it appears, that in the year 1792, a conveyance was made by Robert George William Trefusis late Lord Clinton, George Earl of Orford having died in December 1791. It is stated in the pleadings, that upon the death of George Earl of Orford, this Lord Clinton entered into the possession and receipt of the rents and profits of the premises; and being so in possession, and conceiving, either according to law, or without sufficient warrant of law, that under the limitation of the deed of 1781, he was entitled, on the death of George Earl of Orford, to enter into possession; he accordingly did enter into the possession, and proceeded immediately to act as the owner of the property, for in the year 1792, on the 6th day of October, he executed a deed which recites the mortgage for the £20,000, and that by divers mesne acts as to the term and fee, they became vested in Lord Keppel; it recites the death of Margaret Countess of Orford, that her son George Earl of Orford, being tenant in tail, suffered recoveries; that Lord Keppel had occasion for the money; [53] and that the Earl of Orford had applied to Sir Edward Hughes to advance the £20,000: it states the title as vested in Sir Edward Hughes; and then it represents the effect of the deed of 1781, which contains the disputed limitation. It then has the following recitals: "Whereas the said Earl of Orford never did make any appointment of the said manors and premises; and the said Robert George William Trefusis is also heir of the said Earl of Orford, ex parte maternâ." (Horatio Earl of Orford, was not a party to this deed; but it will be to be considered, what is to be the effect of his joining in another deed, which takes notice of this deed.) "And whereas the said Robert George William Trefusis, is desirous of raising the sum of £34,000 for certain purposes, and such further or other sum or sums as hereinafter mentioned, and hath proposed to convey the settled premises subject to the mortgage money of £20,000 to the Earl of Coventry, Humphrey Hall, Ambrose St. John, and John Inglett Fortescue." (Some of them are dead, and other trustees appointed in the stead of them.) Then all these premises in the counties of Devon and Cornwall, but not in the county of Dorset, are conveyed by this deed to the Earl of Coventry, Humphrey Hall, Ambrose Saint John, and John Inglett Fortescue; and they are to raise the sum of £34,000 for certain purposes which I shall have occasion to mention to your Lordships presently; and subject to those charges by another deed of the 7th and 8th of October, 1792, the estates are conveyed first of all to raise some pin money for the grantor's lady, then to himself for life, then to [54] trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and then to the intent that she should receive her rent charge of £700 a year. (It is said that she is dead.) Then there is a term created in Robert Mackreth and Sir William Lemon for 300 years, and then there is a term of 500 years, and subject to that term of 500 years the estate is limited to the use of Robert Cotton St. John Trefusis, eldest son of Robert George William Trefusis, for life, and after his death to the trustees, to support the contingent remainders; then to the sons of Robert Cotton St. John Trefusis, one after the other; and then to various other persons of the name of Trefusis and their issue, male and female.

Under the term of 300 years, the limitations are extremely extensive with respect to the number of persons who in different events are to take under them; with respect to the term of 500 years that is expressed to be in trust to raise several sums of money as portions for sons and daughters; in some instances for daughters only, in others for the sons and daughters; and whether there may or may not now be alive individuals who may have interests under that term of 500 years, I know not; if there are, one question is, whether they also would not have a right to litigate the question before your Lordships.

This deed having been made in the year 1792, a doubt seems to have arisen in the year 1794, and to have been communicated to Horatio Earl of Orford, with respect to what might be the effect of the mortgage which had been made in 1785 upon the deed of 1781. If the intention of Earl George was that that deed of 1781 should have [55] effect at his death, and if that deed of 1781 should be a deed which, if it had not effect at his death, his intention in that deed might be supposed to be an intention which would miscarry, it was of very little importance whether his deed of 1781 had or had not been revoked by that deed of 1785, supposing that under that deed of 1781 he was himself to take as the heir of Samuel Rolle; for then the effect of that deed would amount to no more than if that limitation had not been expressed in the deed: because if a person entitled to the fee of an estate makes no ultimate limitation, it vests in himself. It seems, therefore, to be another proof, either that he did not mean that deed of 1781 to operate in favour of himself, or that he was still under some mistake, or had not discovered that it would have that operation, or that he meant that some operation should be given to it, which it is contended is not given to it by the effect of that deed of 1794, and that it has no effect in either law or equity, with reference not only to the Clinton family, but with reference to all the persons who after that deed of 1794, had upon the faith of that deed, but, as it is said, under a mistake of its real meaning, advanced their money in very considerable sums.

That deed bears date on the 2d of April, 1794, and if the operation of the deed turns out to be mistaken, it is enough to make men tremble whose property depends upon the accuracy of deeds. You have here a gentleman made tenant to the precept, Mr. Joshua Sharpe, whom my noble friend (Lord Redesdale) [56] and I recollect to have been a man of great knowledge in his profession; you have the opinion of the late Sir Archibald McDonald, and of as complete a conveyancer as existed in our time, the late Mr. Shadwell, before whom cases were laid. Undoubtedly their attention was not directed to the point; but if it should appear that mistake has crept in, the case having travelled through so much advice, any man might be alarmed for fear his instruments should not operate according to his intention; and this deed contains a particularity of description and expression which will very well deserve your attention. It is one thing certainly (and ought to be remembered) to say that a deed of confirmation, (if you may give it that name,) shall not go to weaken the title which it was meant to confirm, and another thing to say that a deed of confirmation shall come to strengthen a title that before existed. They are different propositions in law, and with reference to both, this case must be considered. The parties are described as "The Right Honourable Horatio Earl of Orford, uncle and heir at law of the Right Honourable George late Earl of Orford, deceased, of the first part; the Right Honourable George William Earl of Coventry, Humphrey Hall, Ambrose St. John, and John Inglett Fortescue, Esquires, (the trustees,) of the second part;"—"The Right Honourable George William Baron Clinton, eldest son and heir at law of Robert Cotton Trefusis, late of Trefusis, in the county of Cornwall, Esq. deceased," (the description of whom only three years after the death of George Earl of Orford, is not unimportant;) "who was the eldest son and [57] heir at law of Robert Trefusis, of the same place, Esq., also deceased, who was the eldest son and heir at law of Samuel Trefusis, of the same place, Esq., also deceased, who was the eldest son and heir at law of Francis Trefusis, of the same place, Esq., also deceased, by Bridget his wife, who was the daughter of Robert Rolle, formerly of Heanton Satchville Hall, in the parish of Petrockstow, in the county of Devon, Esq., deceased, by Arabella his wife, the daughter of Theophilus Earl of Lincoln, Baron Clinton, and Baron Saye, deceased, and was also the only surviving sister to Samuel Rolle, late of Heanton aforesaid, Esq., deceased, the only son of the said Robert Rolle by the said Arabella his wife." (You see the extreme anxiety of description to point out who this individual was, and then the description is concluded by this still more general description;) "and the said Lord Clinton being also heir at law, ex parte maternâ, of the said George Earl of Orford, and also Baron Clinton, who was the son and only child and heir at law of the Right Honourable Margaret Countess of Orford, deceased, who was the daughter and only child of the said Samuel Rolle, of the third part;" it then recites the deed of August, 1781, (and, in law, this is the recital of Horatio Earl of Orford, as well as the recital of the other parties;) and then it recites, that the said Samuel Rolle died in November, 1749, without revoking his will, leaving the said Margaret Rolle, his daughter and only child, him surviving, who afterwards intermarried with the said Robert, then Lord Walpole, afterwards Earl of Orford; it also recites, that the said Margaret Countess [58] of Orford did in or about the month of January then last past depart this life, leaving the said George Earl of Orford her son and only child, who by virtue of the afore-said will of the said Samuel Rolle, became entitled to all his manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, as tenant in tail: then it proceeds to state that two recoveries of those manors had been suffered, but that the said George Earl of Orford was willing and desirous that the same premises should continue and remain in the family and blood of the said Samuel Rolle: it then recites, "that by the indenture of release of August 1781 it was witnessed, that in consideration of the natural love and affection which the said George Earl of Orford had and bore unto his relations the heirs of the said Samuel Rolle," (that is, (taking the limitation to operate in favour of himself) in consideration of the natural love and affection he had for himself, as the relation of the said Samuel Rolle;) "and to the intent that the said manors, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments therein and hereinafter mentioned might remain, continue, and be in the family and blood of his late mother the said late Margaret Countess of Orford, on the side or part of her said father the said Samuel Rolle, and in consideration of 5s. by the said Joshua Sharpe to the said Earl of Orford paid, and for other good causes and considerations, him the said George Earl of Orford thereunto moving:" and then (for those considerations, and with this intent thus expressed) subject to the estates vested in his own issue, comes a limitation in this deed, as recited in the deed of 1794, "to the right heirs [59] of the said Samuel Rolle for ever." (Upon which limitation the question arises, whether in point of law this instrument, by "the right heirs of the said Samuel Rolle," means the grantor of the deed according to the construction which law must put on the words, or whether, with this exposition of the intent, the general legal effect of the words will or will not in point of law give way to the expression of a particular purpose, supposing that particular purpose to be sufficiently expressed for the intent of raising that question.) The deed of 1794 then proceeds to state the indenture of 1785 (which is an instrument of mortgage, and that instrument of mortgage having been made after the deed of 1781, a doubt, (so much at least must be admitted clearly to be the fact,) arose as to what was the effect of the deed of 1785 on the deed of 1781). The deed of 1794 then goes on with the following recital: "And whereas by indentures of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 7th and 8th of October, 1792, the release being tripartite, and made or mentioned to be made between the said Lord Clinton:" (then he is described in these words:) "who was and is heir at law of the said Samuel Rolle by his then name of Robert George William Trefusis, and such description as hereinbefore contained, of the first part." It then mentions the other parties of the second and third parts, reciting that the said manors, lordships, and hereditaments therein and hereinafter mentioned and described to be the estates and inheritance of the said Samuel Rolle, and thereby granted and released, with others, did, upon the decease of the [60] said George late Earl of Orford, come to and vest in the said Lord Clinton, subject and liable, together with other manors and hereditaments situate and being in the county of Dorset, to a mortgage made by the said George Earl of Orford by the before-mentioned indentures of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 5th and 6th days of June, 1785, for securing the repayment of the said sum of £20,000; and that Lord Clinton, by indenture of the 6th of October, 1792, had conveyed the estates to Lord Coventry and others for the purpose of raising the £34,000 and such further sum of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of £10,000, as should be found requisite and necessary as therein mentioned, in the manner directed by that instrument of 1792: (it will be material to state to your Lordships presently what was directed to be the application of those sums raised under the deed of 1792;) and this deed of 1794, to which Horatio Earl of Orford was a party and Lord Clinton was a party, under the particular descriptions of each of them, which I have before mentioned, does not rest with the mere general statement of the effect of the deed of 1792, with a view to the power of raising that sum of £34,000 and the sum of £10,000, but it goes on to state with great particularity, all the limitations that were made by the settlement of 1792, subject to the raising those sums of money upon all the various branches of the Trefusis family: and then it recites this: "And whereas doubts have arisen whether the said George Earl of Orford's having joined in the said indenture of release of the 6th day of June, 1785, [61] did not revoke the limitations contained in the said recited indenture of release of the 2d day of August, 1781, and thereby defeat the said recited settlement of the 8th of October, which was in the year 1792, and vest the hereditaments comprized in the last-mentioned indenture in the said Horatio Earl of Orford, as heir at law of the said George Earl of Orford; but the said Horatio Earl of Orford being well satisfied that the said late Earl did not intend to alter the said uses limited in and by the said recited indenture of the 2d day of August, 1781, hath, at the request of the said Lord Clinton, agreed to confirm the uses of the said settlement in manner hereinafter mentioned." Those words are very important in this case; for the doubt that is here stated, is a doubt founded upon the notion that the deed of 1781 did not vest the hereditaments in the heir at law of George Earl of Orford by the last limitation, and therefore did not vest the hereditaments in George Earl of Orford himself, so that the heir might take it, and it is a singular circumstance if it so turns out that the deed of 1781 did so vest the estate; but the law must be administered, if it should so turn out. This instrument was prepared in consequence of the opinions given, and a doubt which had arisen, whether the deed of 1785 would not vest the hereditaments in the heir of George Earl of Orford; and it will be singular if the fact be, that the deed of 1781, independent of the deed of 1785, had vested these premises in the heir at law of George Earl of Orford; but under the deed of 1794 Horatio Earl of Orford being well satisfied that the said late [62] Earl did not intend to alter the uses made in and by the said recited indenture of the 2d day of August, 1781, had, at the request of Lord Clinton, agreed to confirm the uses of the said settlement, in manner hereinafter mentioned. This is certainly a declaration, in any way of putting the case, of the intention of Horatio Earl of Orford not to alter the uses limited by the deed of settlement of 1781; but I think it is likewise undeniable that he thought, and whether by mistake or otherwise is another question, but taking for granted it was by mistake, he thought it one of the uses limited by the indenture of the 2d of August, 1781, namely, the last use not to give the estate to George Earl of Orford, and therefore not to himself, but to give it to some person other than himself, and other than George Earl of Orford; and two questions will arise upon this instrument, one of them particularly founded upon the subsequent parts of this instrument, namely, what is the effect of this instrument, regard being had to the recitals of it; and, secondly, whether this instrument is to have a more limited effect than you can bring yourselves to believe that Horatio Earl of Orford meant it should have, and to have that more limited effect because the rules of law require you to give it a more limited effect. Another question, which will not depend altogether on this deed, but on considerations of equity, is, whether after such a deed as this is executed, there is equity in the heirs at law of Horatio Earl of Orford, at the distance of twenty years, to disturb this deed of 1794, without regard to the fact that he lived till 1797, and when it does not [63] appear that in the course of his life he ever meant to disturb what he actually thought he had done, but which, in one way of putting the case, he was mistaken in thinking he had done by this deed of 1794? By that deed, after stating his entire satisfaction with respect to the intention of George Earl of Orford, he goes on to say, "Now this indenture witnesseth, that in pursuance of the said recited agreement, and being desirous to confirm the said recited settlements of the 2d day of August, 1781, and the 8th day of October, 1792, and for and in consideration of the premises;" then he releases his estate and interest therein, as far as he can or lawfully may, and he releases the premises with an habendum, the terms of which I will state to your Lordships presently.

The deed of the 7th of August, 1781, contained the limitation, the legal effect of which is in question. The deed of the 8th of October, 1792, is a deed which proceeds upon the persuasion that the person who then represented the Clinton family had, under that limitation of the deed of August 1781, become entitled to the estate for the various purposes of raising money, and for the purpose subject to the purpose of raising money, of sending it throughout all the branches of the family; and this at least must be clear, that Horatio Earl of Orford takes upon himself to confirm that settlement, as well as the deed of August 1781. He therefore says, my meaning is as far as I express myself by this deed, that the person to whom the deed has limited it in 1792, shall take it. Then another question is, what induced in his mind that meaning. They say on the one hand, he [64] meant to confirm that settlement, because he meant to confirm the deed of 1781, and he meant to confirm the deed of 1781, because he was ignorant of the effect of that deed of 1781, and being ignorant of the effect of that deed of 1781, when he confirms the deed of 1781, he confirms a deed not to insure the supposed effect of it, but the real effect of it; and if the effect of the deed of 1781 was such as not to give an estate which would enable the heir to make the settlement of 1792, then his confirmation of the settlement of 1792 shall have no more effect than his confirming the settlement of 1781; and that they say is a confirmation, only so far as it operates as a confirmation of the settlement which vested the estate in George and Horatio, Earls of Orford, and not in the parties to that deed of 1792; and they further contend, that this is to be the more regarded in consequence of the peculiar expressions in the habendum of the release, which is, that the premises are to be held by the Earl of Coventry and others, "to for and upon such and so many of the uses, trusts, intents and purposes, and under and subject to such and so many of the powers, provisos, limitations, declarations and agreements limited and declared, or anywise expressed of and concerning the same, by the indentures bearing date respectively the 6th of October and the 8th of October, which was in the year 1792, as are now existing undetermined and capable of taking effect, in the same manner as if the said indenture of the 6th day of June, 1785 had not been made, and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever;" and then it is said, this being the effect of the deed [65] of the "6th of October and the 8th of October, 1792," you are to enquire how the premises would have been held on the two deeds of the 6th and 8th of October, 1792, in the same manner as if the indenture of the 6th day of June, 1785 had not been made; and if that deed had not been made, though the settlement of the 6th of October purported to convey the estates to raise money, and that of the 8th to convey to the purposes therein expressed for a family settlement; yet if the deed of 1785 had not been made, the deed of 1781 could have no new effect as was supposed in 1792, and therefore the deeds of 1781 and 1792 must not be confirmed at all; that is the way in which it is argued on one side.

On the other it is insisted, that whether Horatio, Earl of Orford, was under a mistake or not with respect to the deed of 1781, this deed of 1791 contains evidence of his intent, that these estates should go in the manner or be applied for the purposes, and be enjoyed by the persons named in the instruments of 1792; and your Lordships will have to consider the nature of those instruments, particularly with respect to those mortgagees, whose case I shall have occasion to mention presently, and with respect to the other persons to take under the settlement of 1792: it is further contended that with respect to the latter claimants, there will be no equity that will authorise your Lordships to disturb the settlement that then was made, if it was made under a mistake, it not appearing that Horatio, Earl of Orford, himself, before his death had discovered that mistake, and it not appearing positively that if he had discovered [66] that mistake he would have set up that equity which is contended for by those who claim under him. That is stated with reference to those who take, if I may so express it by way of distinction, as volunteers under the settlement of 1792. But it is said as to the subsequent mortgagees, that this became part of the title which your Lordships ought to suppose was relied upon by those who lent their money, and there can be no equity, it is insisted, as against the mortgagees who have lent their money, upon a mistake of the law if you please so to put it; that is on the mistake of the legal construction of the deed of 1781, when as they say for the purposes of their dealing with the estate and lending the money, the individual who had a right to take advantage of the mistake had, by the execution of this deed, and by the assertion of such facts as are contained in the recital of this deed, authorized the parties claiming under the instruments of 1792, to go to the market with the property for the purpose of raising that money, which Horatio, Earl of Orford, could not but know was the purpose of executing those deeds of 1792, which deeds of 1792 he professes here to confirm.

This deed, which was made upon the 1st and 2d of April, 1794, was followed by a transaction which took place with Sir Lawrence Palk, on the 5th of July, 1794, that is, in about three months after the deed of confirmation; and that deed states the purposes to which the money so to be raised was to be applied (Appendix, p. 47). It states that the £34,000 was to be disposed of in this way, namely, "the sum of [67] £4000, part of the said sum of £34,000, for and in the purchase of all and every or any of the messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, and other the premises late of the said George Earl of Orford, deceased, situate, lying and being in or near the borough of Ashburton, in the county of Devon; and likewise some other premises which were also late the estate and inheritance of the said late Earl of Orford," then they were to apply a further part of the sum of £34,000 "in the purchase of the several and respective estates, hereditaments and premises thereafter mentioned, and which were formerly the estates, hereditaments, and premises of the said Robert Cotton Trefusis, the late father of the said Baron Clinton;" and it goes on to state the manner in which this sum of money was to be laid out.

These deeds having been executed, the possession, (subject to any qualification that belongs to that expression,) the actual possession and perception of the rents and profits prior to the execution of all these deeds, and subsequent to the execution of all these deeds, until the filing of this bill was had by the late Lord Clinton, whose personal representative is not before the Court, and whose situation must be materially affected by the decision of this question. Upon his death, the rents and profits were received by persons who, as between themselves and the Clinton family, were clearly trustees for the Clinton family, and certainly not for Lord Cholmondeley or Mrs. Damer. They received those rents and profits for a considerable time; afterwards the Court of Chancery took possession of the rents and profits; a receiver was appointed of the rents and profits; and passing over the various periods in which the rents and profits were received by the late Lord Clinton, the trustees and the receiver; an account is prayed only against the present Lord Clinton.

It is unnecessary for me to state the various assignments that were made of the term of 200 years, which became finally vested in Mr. Seymour; but it is necessary to call your attention to a deed of the 26th and 27th of November 1811, which was made between Sir Edward Hughes Ball, who was understood to be a trustee or mortgagee, of the first part; and Coutts, Antrobus, and Trotter of the second part; it states the indentures of lease and release of 1785, mentioning the premises in Dorset, as well as the premises in Devon and in Cornwall; it traces the title to the fee of the estate, and the title to the money secured by the mortgage; it recites certain transactions that took place in the Court of Chancery, by which it was determined, that this Mr. Ball was a mortgagee in trust for Coutts, Antrobus and Trotter, as the executors of Dame Ruth Hughes, deceased; and then by direction of the Court of Chancery, by which the Master's report is confirmed, he is made to convey the whole of the premises, "subject to the like benefit and equity of redemption, on payment of the said principal sum of £20,000, and the interest henceforth to grow due for the same, as the said manors, lordships, hundreds, messuages, mills, lands, tenements, and hereditaments are now held by those persons under and by virtue of the said hereinbefore recited indentures of lease and release, [69] bearing date respectively on or about the 1th and 6th days of June, 1785, except so far as the right to the said sum of £20,000 and the interest henceforth to become due for the same, is altered or varied by these presents."

I call your Lordships' attention to this deed, because, with respect to the question between Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer and Lord Clinton, it is said, that this is to be considered as a deed in which the person of the name of Drake, accepting the conveyance from this infant trustee, is to be deemed a trustee for Lord Clinton; that Mr. Drake, therefore, in 1811, acknowledges the equity of redemption as existing, because this conveyance is made to him, subject to the equity of redemption, and that he being a trustee for Lord Clinton, it must be considered that Lord Clinton himself has, by his trustee, acknowledged that the equity of redemption existed in 1811.

With reference to that question, your Lordships will have to consider, first, what the effect of such an instrument as that would be with reference to such a question as exists in this case, attending to the practice of equity with respect to reconveyances of mortgages, and what is the duty of persons to reconvey; whether the persons reconveying are ever to be considered at liberty to decide where the right in the equity of redemption really exists, or whether, on the other hand, they are not to convey according to the equity of redemption, as it was left under the instrument by which they became mortgagees, leaving it to the forms of courts of justice to whom they may resort, to say what is the effect of the conveyance, subject to [70] such equity of redemption; whether it is to go according to the terms used, or according to the rights of those who have got claims, either founded on contract with, or on adverse possession against those to whom in terms the equity of redemption was originally reserved.

With respect to the mortgage which was made to Sir Edward Hughes, and which was finally vested in Mr. Drake, he stating himself to be trustee for Lord Clinton, your Lordships will have the questions in this case to consider, which have been stated at the bar, and likewise the questions in respect to those who have claimed under the powers of raising money, namely, the £34,000 which I have before mentioned: and, when we come to consider what is the decree that should be made against the mortgagees, supposing the event that Lord Clinton cannot sustain the existing decree, I apprehend it will be your duty to see what is stated in this bill as against them, all the circumstances of this case being considered, and especially the effect of the deed of 1794 considered with respect to their lending their money after that deed was executed. They certainly have likewise a right of agitating the general question, which Lord Clinton himself is entitled to agitate, the general question, laying out of consideration the legal effect of the deed of 1781, and taking it as if nothing of the kind had happened: and provided there is not a vice in the title of Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer, for the reason I have before stated, you will have to consider the doctrine of a court of equity with respect to adverse enjoyment, whether taken by wrong or mistake, or in any other manner.

[71] I do not think that this is a case which can be decided upon the well known doctrines that obtain between mortgagor and mortgagee; but that in considering this case, you will have to declare who is in the contemplation of a court of equity, after twenty years have expired, to be taken to be the mortgagor, Mr. Drake admitting himself certainly to be a mortgagee. If a mortgagee is in possession for twenty years, receiving the rents and profits from time to time, never paying any rents and profits to the mortgagor, never in his deeds or instruments, to which the mortgagor is no party, acknowledging that he is a trustee, there is an end of the question. A mortgagee is quasi a trustee for just nineteen years 364 days and twelve hours, short by five minutes: for if he was called on to account at the end of one year, he must say of these rents and profits, I can retain no more to myself than pays my interest for this year, save that I may apply the remainder of those rents and profits to the payment of my principal. But suppose an estate, producing £500 a year, was mortgaged for £500; in the first year, the mortgagee would receive £500 from the rents of the estates so stated to be £500 a year; and he might be called on to re-convey at the end of the year, and so de anno in annum, till the twenty years ran out; but if the twenty years run out before he is called to account, the obligation binding his conscience in a court of equity is shifted. He may hold his tongue, or he may say, I will keep the estate myself, if the facts of the case would warrant the assertion. Such would be the case with those who claim under these Plaintiffs and Mr. Drake as the mortgagee, if Mr. Drake had been in possession, and at the [72] end of twenty years could have said, I never acknowledged the mortgage, and they never could have got the estate from him.

I will not say that this is a singular case, because he is a bold man who will say, that because he does not know of such a case being decided, therefore no such case has been decided. But the peculiarity of the case is this, whether the fact that the Clinton family have been in possession for twenty years, will or will not bar those who claim, if they can qualify their claim in the way they put it on the record: whether that fact will or will not entitle the defendants to say that those who claim as plaintiffs are barred whatever was their right originally, or, on the other side, whether, the circumstance of there having been a mortgagee during the whole twenty years, admitting him now to be a mortgagee willing to convey to any person who has the right, the intervention of such a third person who has during the period stated in the pleadings been dealing with the Clinton family as if they were his mortgagors, and dealt with by the Clinton family as if he was their mortgagee, and never dealt with by the other family as standing in any relation to them after the death of George Earl of Orford in 1791, considering the doctrines established to quiet not merely legal but equitable titles does not form a bar to the relief sought by such a bill as this, and likewise whether, regard being had to what should be taken to be the true effect of the deed of 1791, that deed does not amount to a confirmation that would go to prejudice the titles of the Plaintiffs more than if such a deed had not existed.

These appear to be the general questions you [73] have to decide; I hope I have, in the course of what I have stated, avoided giving any opinion upon it; I am only anxious, if I can, to state the questions as they have affected my mind, with a view of seeing whether, in your Lordships' opinion, or in the opinion of others, I have mistaken the points to which judicial attention ought to be given. If I have not mistaken those points, I do not deny that I have an opinion; what that opinion is I shall not intimate at all, because, if by minute examination of the doctrines in the course of next week, I shall see any reason to alter that opinion, I shall act better in withholding it, than in stating it now; and I can only say, I shall address myself to the decision of this case with all the attention due to its great importance to both parties; with all the attention due to its great importance, as it affects others; with all the attention due to the knowledge and learning of the Judges who have before differed upon the question; certainly not failing to recollect, that the original decision was made by a learned Judge, who, as he has now left the judicial seat, I may be permitted to say of him, that his name will remain respected by the profession as long as it exists; and under the influence of all these impressions, I shall endeavour first to enable myself duly to execute justice, by delivering that opinion which is right; and by giving that attention which will enable me, with satisfaction to say to myself, that if I have erred, I am not able to convince my own mind of it, though it may be manifest to others.

Lord Redesdale: My Lords, I will trouble you with a very few remarks to relieve my mind [74] from the embarrassment which I feel, and for the purpose of stating what will be the considerations which I shall give to this question, in the interval between the present time, and the time that has been mentioned by the noble Lord.

The question which I conceive I shall have to agitate in my own mind during that period, putting out of my consideration what is the true construction of the deed of 1781, and assuming, for the purpose of discussing the other questions, that the construction is as contended on the part of Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer, is whether your Lordships can decide the case which is now before you, assuming that such is the just construction of the deed of 1781.

If the true construction of the deed of 1781 was to be discussed at this moment, unquestionably you would wish to have the assistance of the Judges, that they might give their opinions seriatim upon the subject. But, if that exposition of the law is not necessary, it would not be proper to give them the trouble of attending for the purpose of stating their opinions. It would not be proper to enter into a discussion of that question, if finally your Lordships were not upon that ground to decide this case; and I think it most important that you should not unnecessarily decide that part of the case, because that is a question which can affect only few titles, whereas the other questions are questions which affect most importantly almost every title in the kingdom. Your Lordships must recollect, if you advert only to the settlements in your own families, that almost the whole property of the country, I may say, is covered in some way or other by equitable interests, [75] resting upon the protection of legal maxims, by mortgages, by terms of years created for the purpose of raising portions for younger children and other purposes, which the necessities of families create; and, therefore, it is of the utmost importance for you to decide, whether the effect of an interest of that kind subsisting upon that property, is to defeat the whole beneficial effect of the statute of limitations, and the statute of fines.

The policy of the law with respect to those statutes, is unquestionably this: possession is always regarded by the law as prima facie title, and it is so regarded with a view to public benefit. It is not with a view to the benefit of the individuals who may be in possession or out of possession, who may have title or who may not have title, but it is with a view to public benefit, because it is the public policy that possession should remain undisturbed. The statute against pretended titles is formed on this view, and it is on such ground that a person out of possession is not at liberty to deal with the property in any way whatever, because it tends to disturb the actual possession to the injury of the public at large.

It strikes me, therefore, that the questions which you will have to consider are numerous: First, you will have to consider what is the effect of the possession, such as it has been, qualified as it may be, of the Clinton family from the death of George Earl of Orford, for there the possession must commence, and indeed upon the face of the bill, which is now under your Lordships' consideration, it is stated, that upon the death of George Earl of Orford, the late Lord Clinton entered into posses-[76]-sion, or into the receipt of the rents and profits of this estate. You are, therefore, as I conceive upon the face of the bill itself, to consider the possession as with the late Lord Clinton, and those claiming under him from the death of George Earl of Orford.

Then comes the question, whether, on the death of George Earl of Orford, the title vested in Earl Horace and not in Lord Clinton: that question I put out of the case as a question of right, because I assume, for the purposes of the view which you are now to take of the case, that the title was in Horace Earl of Orford and not in Lord Clinton. Then, you will have to consider whether, under all the circumstances of the case, supposing the title upon the death of George Earl of Orford to have been in Horace Earl of Orford, that title so vested in Horace Earl of Orford remained, at the time when this bill was filed, untouched.

Whether it remains at the time that this bill was filed untouched, will depend upon the nature of the possession that was then taken by Lord Clinton, the effect of that possession, the acts which have since been done, and the time which has since elapsed.

With respect to the acts done, (putting for the time out of consideration the acts done by Lord Clinton himself,) I am to consider what were the acts done by Horace Earl of Orford, and whether the deed which he executed in 1794, has the effect of preventing any claim either by Lord Cholmondeley or Mrs. Damer, both claiming under Horace Earl of Orford.

That deed of 1794 is a deed operating to confirm [77] the settlement made by Lord Clinton in 1792, but in terms which unquestionably are to a certain degree ambiguous: it is not an absolute confirmation of that settlement in words, because it is not a confirmation so far as that settlement might be impeached, supposing the deed of 1781 not to have been affected by the deed of 1785.

But there is one very important question, as it seems to me, for your consideration, and which, perhaps, has not been very fully discussed, namely, what is the effect of the deed executed by Earl Horace in 1794, by which he has put a construction upon the deed of 1781? For Earl Horace, by the deed of 1794, has assumed, that if the deed of 1781 was not affected by the deed of 1785, the deed of 1781 had constituted Lord Clinton the rightful owner of the estate. You will, therefore, have to consider, whether Horace Earl of Orford having put that construction upon the deed of 1781, he himself could, to the prejudice of third persons, say that such was not the construction of the deed of 1781. That has always struck my mind as a very important subject of consideration in this case. He has led all the world to believe (that is, all who had any dealing with this property) that the true construction of the deed of 1781 gave the property to Lord Clinton. That is a part of the case which it strikes me it will be very important for your Lordships to consider.

There is another question which, upon the deed of 1794, appears to me very important to be considered, viz. what was the motive of Horace Earl of Orford for executing the deed of 1794? It was to fulfil what he conceived to be the intent of [78] George Earl of Orford in the deed of 1781. If Earl Horace were now living, if he had filed this bill, a consideration might arise very different, as it seems to me, from that which will arise upon a bill filed not by him, but by persons claiming under him. Supposing he had not precluded himself by what he has done, he might have a right to say, my intent went no farther. But whether persons claiming under him have the same right, it strikes my mind, is a very different thing, because they cannot have a knowledge of what passed in his mind upon the subject. Whether it can now be said, that if Horace Earl of Orford were living, he would at this moment be at liberty to impeach the title which Lord Clinton supposed himself to have derived, and which Horace Earl of Orford seems to have supposed he had derived under the deed of 1781 may be questioned. It strikes me that there is a very material distinction between what Earl Horace might himself have done, and what persons claiming under him, and claiming under him without any expression of what was his intention upon the subject, can now do.

The next consideration is, whether the length of time which has elapsed since the death of George Earl of Orford is a bar to the relief which is sought by this bill. That I apprehend is a question which is founded upon what is called in law the laches of persons, the inattention to their rights of persons who have rights, and who do not exert those rights in the manner in which, or at the time when the law requires that they should be exerted. With a view to that subject, the common law, to a certain point, [79] and the legislature more expressly, has laid down certain rules, and the statutes of limitation were formed with a view of drawing certain lines, by which courts of justice should be guided upon that subject. The old rule of law is a general rule, the statutes of limitations have drawn particular lines, beyond which the courts of justice are not to be allowed to pass.

You will then have to consider how those statutes are to affect, first, Mrs. Damer, supposing she were otherwise capable of claiming as devisee of Horace Earl of Orford; secondly, Lord Cholmondeley, supposing he were capable of claiming as heir of Horace Earl of Orford, under the supposition that the will of Horace Earl of Orford does not touch his title.

With respect to the title of Mrs. Damer, she claims as devisee of Horace Earl of Orford. Either there is no limitation created by the statute of limitations with respect to what are called equitable titles, or the time which has elapsed must, I presume, be considered as being a bar to her right; I mean, taking the possession to have been a possession of that description which is under the protection of the law, and taking that possession to have commenced upon the death of George Earl of Orford.

With respect to Lord Cholmondeley, his title is alleged in this bill as heir of Horace Earl of Orford. Now, upon any question which he can raise upon this subject, you will have to consider, whether all the ground of equity which is insisted upon against the title of Lord Clinton is not a ground of equity which will have the effect of [80] making the disposition of Horace Earl of Orford a good disposition, though he was not seised as required by the statute of wills, because courts of equity have constantly considered equitable rights by analogy to legal rights, and if an equitable right was vested in the party who makes the will, the will disposes of that property, though that person was not in the view of the law, supposing it to be a legal title, seised of the estate which he devised.

It seems to me, therefore, that you will have to consider, whether, as between Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer, (supposing you can enter into any consideration of the titles between them,) the will of Horace Earl of Orford might not be considered (I am not certain that it would be so, but it might be so considered) as a bar to the claim of Lord Cholmondeley. Lord Cholmondeley's title must also be affected in the same way by the release of Earl Horace; for although a person out of possession cannot deal with a wrong, a person out of possession, having a good title, may release to a person in possession having a bad title or no title at all; you will therefore have to consider with respect to Lord Cholmondeley, as well as with respect to Mrs. Damer, what is the operation of the deed executed in 1791 by Horace Earl of Orford.

With respect to the statute of limitations, as affecting the claim of Lord Cholmondeley, I apprehend that you will find, that in no instance (at least I have been unable to find any) has a court of equity considered the privilege given to an heir at law of suing by a writ of right, and that of not being barred in less than sixty years, as that limit-[81]ation which, in the case of an heir at law, is fixed in equity with respect to equitable titles; it is a particular privilege given to a particular right. There are other rights to which also particular privileges are given; but if the heir at law is not to pursue, and does not pursue by that particular right, but pursues by another mode of proceeding; for instance, if he proceeds by ejectment the heir at law is as much barred by twenty years' possession as any other person.

Then comes another consideration, which does not decide precisely upon the rights of the parties, but may decide the present suit. You observe that in this suit Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer are co-plaintiffs. Now, if you were of opinion that the right is in Mrs. Damer, the consequence must be, that Lord Cholmondeley has no right; but you are to decide that question against Lord Cholmondeley; you cannot decide that question, as I apprehend, against Lord Cholmondeley upon this bill.

because between co-plaintiffs you cannot so decide; your decision now must be in favour of Mrs. Damer, that the property passed by the will of Horace Earl of Orford, and you must establish that will as an effectual instrument against Lord Cholmondeley by a decree; and for that purpose, I apprehend, he must have been a defendant to the suit, and not a co-plaintiff. In the same manner, if you are to determine in favour of Lord Cholmondeley you must decide against Mrs. Damer, and you must decree against Mrs. Damer, that the will of Horace Earl of Orford did not operate upon this property.

[82] An attempt has been made to avoid this difficulty by the frame of the bill, by stating an agreement between the parties to divide the property between them. The noble and learned Lord who has just addressed you has stated what is the effect of such an agreement. Unquestionably it is an agreement directly contrary to law; and if such an agreement actually existed and were now produced before your Lordships, that agreement would unquestionably subject each of these parties to a proceeding which would have the effect of making each of them liable to forfeit a sum equal to the value of the whole of this property. I therefore hope that the agreement has never been reduced into the form of a deed, and indeed no such deed is offered to the House. It is therefore to be considered as a mere allegation contained in this bill. It has not that which binds the parties; but, independent of the allegation of that agreement, it will be impossible to sustain this bill between these two parties as co-plaintiffs. I should be extremely unwilling that such should be the ground upon which you should come finally to a decision upon the subject, because it would not determine the important question in this case with respect to the effect of possession upon a property where the legal estate is in one person, and the possession in another person. I take that to be a question of the highest importance to the safety and the quiet enjoyment of the property of almost every person in the country; because in consequence of what are now the habits of the country, there is scarcely any property in which the legal estate is not in one person, and the equitable estate somehow or other in another.

[83] These are the considerations which I shall think myself bound to enter into between the present time and the time when you shall come to a final decision upon the subject. I have thought it my duty to state to your Lordships what pressed on my mind on the subject, for the purpose of drawing the attention of all your Lordships to the same subjects; and to request that you will consider them with all the attention you are capable of giving to them, conceiving there perhaps never was a case which came in judgment before your Lordships more important in respect to the general rights of persons possessing landed property than this case.

The Lord Chancellor: My Lords, you will not fail to call to your recollection, that the mode you have been pleased to adopt in this proceeding, is, for the present, to assume that the effect of the ultimate limitation in the deed of 1781, was such as the present Plaintiffs represent it to be, namely, that that ultimate limitation vested the estate in the grantor of that deed himself, and not in a third person. Taking that for granted, for the present, I would take the liberty, at this moment, to intimate, that although you are bound by law to give the legal effect to the terms in which the instrument is expressed, I am not ready to admit, that if the limitation has had a different effect from that which appears to have been the intention of the grantor, provided you can, by legal means, get at the evidence of that intention, and if that intention, differing from the legal effect of the deed, has [84] been followed by a great variety of most important acts, deeply interesting to the welfare and property of other persons, I am not prepared to say, that, because such might be the legal effect of that limitation, therefore the grantor having mistaken his way of executing his intention, a party who has permitted those acts, proceeding upon the supposed intention, can at all times effectually come into a court of equity, and obtain a relief which must be injurious to those parties whose acts he has permitted.

I took the liberty the other day, for the purpose of saving time, to endeavour to represent to your Lordships the facts of this case; and it does not appear to me to be material to call your attention in much of detail, or repetition of those facts and circumstances. At the same time, with a view to render intelligible what I shall have the honour to state, I will simply repeat the dates of the several transactions, the effect of which is to be considered: and perhaps mention one or two circumstances which it did not occur to me at the time when I before addressed your Lordships to take notice of.

The first instrument you will recollect, was a deed of the year 1701. In that deed there is a term of 200 years created: the deed provides for what we call the cesser of that term: but the circumstances, if I understand the case upon which that term was to determine, have not yet taken effect, and the term remains a subsisting term, by virtue of the assignment of 1811, in a gentleman of the name of Seymour. I wish to call your most particular attention to this part of the case, [85] because, unless I now misunderstand, and unless I have misunderstood for a good many years in which I have been laboriously in different situations discharging the duties which belong to the profession of which I have the honour to be a member, there arise, out of the circumstances which I am about to mention, many observations bearing upon this case with a great degree of importance; and bearing, unless I misunderstand the case very much, upon the titles to property in this kingdom.

This deed of 1704 provides for the cessation of the interest which the term creates. Let me suppose, for a moment, that there had been no such declaration with respect to the cesser of the term, or what comes to the same thing, that the state of things has not yet arisen in which the term is to cease. That term, created in 1704, would, according to all the ideas that I ever had of the law of this country, (I am speaking now of what would have been done twenty-five years ago, instead of speaking particularly of the present time,) be considered as a term which, whether the instrument that created it or not did so declare, would be attendant upon the inheritance, when the ends and trusts of it were satisfied, that is, it would be to be considered as a term where neither presumption that it was satisfied, or presumption that it was surrendered, would, at that period, have been entertained, unless there had been some dealing with the term, which would authorize a presumption either of the one nature or of the other; but it would be taken to be, what, in the language of those who are now no more, I have often heard stated to be the best part of a title, namely, an old [86] term that could be got in to protect the inheritance; and I conceive, that such a term, whether there was any intention that it should or should not attend the inheritance, would be a term held in trust to attend the inheritance, protecting the equities of all who had equities, during the existence of that term: (all the estates to a certain extent, that is, for the duration of the term, would be equitable estates;) but protecting them all according to the due course and order, and priority in which they existed, and according to their equities.

Give me leave then to ask, if it be true that the trust and the equity are indissolubly connected, what is the consequence of that, supposing we had no mortgage in fee here at all? I would put the case, that George Lord Orford had been living in the year 1705, and that George Lord Orford had made, in the year 1705, the deed which now bears date in 1781, then that he had died in 1706; and having died in 1706, that the ancestors of the claimant had taken possession of this estate in 1706; and taking it so, had paid the interest on the mortgage created by virtue of that term, which is dated in 1701. Suppose a mortgage had been created to raise the £20,000 in 1701, if the doctrine which has held the equitable estate not to be capable of being barred, as long as the legal estate existed, be correct, it seems to me, it must follow of course that if the Clintons had been in possession since 1706 down to 1811, yet that adverse possession would not do. If that adverse possession would do, it would have been effectual on no other ground whatever, but because it was [87] long adverse possession; and we are not puzzled in this case, as we have been in many Scotch cases, as to what is a long lease, and what is a short lease, what is a long adverse possession, and what is a short adverse possession; I take twenty years, in such a case as this, to be a long adverse possession; and it is a matter of no moment whether one half minute had elapsed after the twenty years had closed, or twenty years had elapsed, after the twenty years had closed.

In this case there has been that degree of discretion used which is always commendable, namely, that from time to time this term has been assigned; but either I am very ignorant, or the law has been very much changed; or if there had been no such assignments from time to time, this term not assigned, when the trusts were satisfied, and subject to the satisfaction of the trusts, while they were unsatisfied, would have been a term attendant upon the inheritance, according to the equities of all who claimed that inheritance! But would that connection have been indissoluble?

By no means: for we have long laid it down, and I understand it to be still the law of the land, that if I lend my money on a mortgage, and the noble Lord who sits near me afterwards lends his money upon a mortgage of the same estate, having no notice of my mortgage: if he goes to the trustee of an old term, and gets in that term, having no notice to affect his conscience that I have a mortgage before, although that term was held prior to his getting it in, in trust, first for me, and then for him; yet his conscience not being barred against the getting in that term, he will protect himself by that term; [88] that is, he shifts the equity, which was first in me, into himself, and by his diligence he gets the advantage, which by my negligence I have lost. I have thought it necessary to say thus much as to this term of 1704, because I have found it extremely difficult to know how to deal with the objection which I have now been alluding to; namely, that if this possession of twenty years and upwards, will not do with the objection, what are you to say then, supposing there had been a mortgage, and the possession had been from 1705 to the present day.

Without tracing this down through the different assignments, but again mentioning that this term is vested in Mr. Seymour, I wish to take notice of another circumstance which escaped my attention the last time I had the honour of addressing you; and that is, that this bill expressly states the fact of an entry upon the lands by Lord Clinton's father, immediately upon the death of George Lord Orford: it is not, therefore, a bill stating merely that he claimed the right, but that he had made an entry upon the lands at that time.

I wish also to call to your recollection another circumstance: adverting to the cases, and the opinions that were taken upon those cases, when we are discussing this matter about equitable relief, and more particularly with reference to those circumstances, which I am now about to allude to, and to which there is no allusion whatever made in this record, are we sure that Horace Lord Orford or George Lord Orford did not know the effect of that deed of 1781? There are no allegations in this bill to bring that question forward, as [89] a question to be decided. Now, in February 1792, a case was drawn, and an opinion was taken upon the deed of September 1781, and the deed of September 1785, and the question put upon that occasion was, whether, after the deed of 1785 had been executed, the estates would go to the heir of Lord Orford, or whether they would go according to the deed of 1781. Now those who put that question most clearly understood that the estate going to the heir of Lord Orford, was going one way, and the estate going under the limitation of the deed of 1781, was going another way. That might be a mistake: perhaps it was a mistake, not that I think it makes any difference whether it was a mistake or not; but you may observe that this opinion was taken in February 1792, and this opinion being taken in February 1792, and there being nothing before us to shew what was passing between Horace Lord Orford and the Clinton of that day, not a syllable stated either in the record or in proof about that, the deed to raise the £34,000 is not executed till the month of October 1792, and from the period at which the opinions were taken in February 1792, Horace Lord Orford having those opinions, defers till April 1794, that is to say, more than two years before he executes that deed of confirmation. I point this out, because I think there is some materiality in the period of time during which all parties had an opportunity, if they thought fit, to investigate what were their rights, and what were their claims.

Having mentioned these additional circumstances, and introduced what is a most important question in this cause, by the observations I have [90] made with reference to the rules to affect the term, you will allow me now to state, that for the present I would lay out of the case the question, whether there are proper parties before the Court for a decree at all in this cause? intimating it as my humble opinion, that it is extremely difficult to answer that question affirmatively.

I will for the present also lay out of the question, whether, by consent of parties at the bar, a court of justice can overlook the objection which arises upon the policy of the law, where a bill is filed by persons stating such an agreement between themselves, as (intelligibly or unintelligibly stated) is put upon this record, because, if this agreement falls under the censure of the law with respect to dealings as to titles, I do not conceive that it is according to the duty of a court of justice to overlook that objection, even if the parties wished it might be overlooked. I give no opinion at present upon that, neither shall I say that the parties overlook it: but I am anxious to state this, because I think it of public importance, that it should be known that the Court would itself deem it to be an act which its duty required it to do, to take notice of such an objection if it appeared upon the record, whether taken notice of by counsel or not.

Supposing the record to be free from that objection, there is another question, namely, whether, as these plaintiffs have joined themselves together, and as they have stated the nature of the titles they may respectively have, or that respectively they may not have, the record is put into such a shape that we could give a decree upon it! Upon that question, also, I give no opinion.

[91] There is another question which is upon the effect of the deed of confirmation. That is argued in two ways; indeed in various ways. It is said on the part of those who are counsel for the Appellants, that the deed of 1791, called the deed of confirmation, really operates in this case nothing, and the way in which they put that, is this: they say, that the last limitation in the deed of 1781 gave no estate whatever to those under whom Lord Clinton claims; they say, that the deed of 1785 (the deed of mortgage to Sir Edward Hughes) having been executed, it raised a question, whether the deed of 1785 was a revocation of the instrument of 1781 as to the last limitation; and that the confirmatory deed of 1791 was a deed which was meant to have no other effect, notwithstanding all that it recites, and notwithstanding the terms in which the intent of the instrument is expressed towards the conclusion of the recital, than this, to put the estate exactly in the same circumstances as if the deed of 1785 had not been executed, and then putting the estate exactly in the same circumstances as if the deed of 1785 had not been executed, the matter gets back again to this question, namely, what would the rights of the parties have been if the deed of 1785 had not been executed? and in order to determine that question, you must then ask yourselves another question, what was the effect of the deed of 1781? and if the effect of the deed of 1781 was to give the estate to the grantor himself, that all the subsequent deeds are to be laid out of the question, and that the deed of 1791 is not to be taken as a general confirmation, but as an instrument which was merely to remove out of the way the objection [92] to the title, if an objection can be founded upon that deed of 1785.

With respect to that question, much has been said upon the subject on both sides, and particularly with respect to the mode in which you must proceed, if you mean to insist that this deed is to have no other effect. One side says, You may state it as a matter of defence; the other parties say, No, you must file a bill in order to reduce the effect of it. Now when it is urged that you must file a bill to reduce the effect of it, that introduces the question, What is the effect of it? If the effect of it be no more than I have stated, no bill is necessary to reduce the effect of it. If, on the other hand, the effect of it should be greater than that way of putting it admits, then the question is, whether that effect must not be reduced by a bill expressly filed for the purpose? and with reference to that, I confess I should say, when this instrument is produced as matter of defence, if you can fairly see that this instrument has had an effect beyond that which was intended, I cannot conceive that the parties were reduced to file a bill. But all this for the present may be represented to your Lordships as furnishing a question, upon which it is not necessary at this moment to give an opinion; if it were necessary at this moment to give an opinion upon this question so considered, I should be disposed to say here again, there is a view of this case which may not be unimportant, if we are obliged hereafter to deal with that question; and that is this, if I do more by my deed than I intend to do, there may be an equity, a clear equity, an obvious equity, such as nobody can [93] deny to exist, to relieve me against the excess which has been committed against my intention in the execution of that instrument; but I am not as yet prepared to admit, that if I execute a deed in which I do not effectuate that which I certainly intend to do, that is, if I execute a deed in which I do less than I intended to do; or to put it stronger, if I execute a deed in which I do nothing that I intended to do, and if in the notion of both parties I have done all I intended to do, and if under that common mistake both parties have been acting till the supposed grantee under that instrument has become involved in settlements, in debts, in obligations of every species, which if the mistake is to be rectified must tear him and his property and his family to pieces; although relief in equity might originally have been obtained, I am not prepared to say that subsequent transactions may not produce such an effect as to bar that relief in equity, which might have been given if speedy application had been made to a court for that purpose; nor am I prepared to say, that it must necessarily be the effect in a court of equity that that relief must be given, whether the title to that relief is discovered at the end of one year, or twenty years, or a hundred years, and with that observation for the present I pass over that question.

All these questions, and many more that have not yet been stated, will become necessary to be considered and discussed, if your Lordships shall be finally of opinion, that in this case the circumstance that the late Lord Clinton entered (according to what is expressly stated in this bill) in 1791, and that this bill was not filed till after twenty [94] years, is not decisive. That brings us to what has been stated to be the great point in this case, the point which induces me to trespass upon your time contrary to what is the ordinary practice of this Court when you affirm the judgment. The practice of this House, if you affirm the judgment, is to affirm without saying more. That is certainly the practice of the House; and I take leave now to notice it, because, though I am the last man in the world to question the wisdom of the practice, yet I cannot help saying, that I have frequently felt in the different situations in which I have stood in this House very considerable doubts, whether that is a practice useful in the administration of justice or not.

I proceed, therefore, to give a few reasons why this non-claim for above twenty years, (it signifies nothing whether the excess is an excess of one minute above twenty years, or whether it is an excess of a hundred years above twenty years,) in my judgment, is a bar to this claim. It is not my intention to trouble you with a history of what uses were before the statute of uses, nor is it my intention to trouble you with a statement of all the decisions which took place on trusts when the courts of equity, to a certain degree, if I may so express it, nullified that statute of uses; but I take it, that there is a sort of general rule established with respect to doctrines in a court of equity, without which I do not think that those courts would be endured in this country; I mean that they must, as far as they can, assimilate themselves in their proceedings, in those proceedings that are founded upon great public policy, to [95] the law of the land, that is, they must, as far as the nature of the transactions and their dealings will admit of their so assimilating themselves, proceed according to that analogy, or to use words which have been cited at the bar from decisions in another part of this kingdom, that they must act in obedience to those laws. I say this the rather, because unless I misunderstand the history of jurisprudence in this country, courts of equity have felt at all times the necessity of quieting possession, by prescribing limitations to suits, and that independently of all statutable limitations for that purpose.

Since our different statutes of limitation have passed, I believe I may venture to say, that it has been our endeavour in courts of equity to assimilate our proceedings to those of courts of law, by attending to the statutes of limitation, not regarding them merely with reference to the statutes themselves, but as they do at law, also, with reference to such circumstances as furnish grounds of presumption, that something may have happened that may be a bar to any claim; and we go much further; for even where the time mentioned in statutes of limitation has not run out, where there is no such presumption that there may have happened something which would be a bar to the demand; yet if the demand is made under circumstances of inconvenience to individuals, that would amount to positive oppression, that would break in upon those principles which are established for the peace of all the families, constituting the great family of the public, courts of equity have said, you must go to those courts that were not made for [96] a righteous man, if there be such courts, you cannot have relief in a court of equity.

This being so, unless I misunderstand the law of the country, there is a vast difference between things to which we give the same denomination, I mean trusts. You have a trust expressed; you have a trust implied; you have relations formed between individuals in the matters in which they deal with each other, in which you can hardly say that one of them is a trustee and the other a cestui que trust; and yet you cannot deny, that to some intents and some purposes one is a cestui que trust and the other a trustee. Of the latter character, I take a mortgagor and mortgagee to be; and it is not upon this occasion, as it appears to me, necessary to be entering into the arguments about abatement, disseisin, intrusion, and so on, in the case of strict trustee and cestui que trust; for in the case of strict trustee and cestui que trust, you are to consider not only what was done, but what it was the duty of the person to do. It is the duty of the trustee to take care of the interest of the cestui que trust, and there are many cases in which you will not permit that individual to do any thing for his own interest, adverse to the interest of the cestui que trust. So a tenant has a duty to preserve the interest of his landlord, and there are many acts, therefore, which may be done both by a trustee and a person claiming in the character of a tenant for years, which, if they were done by persons standing in other relations, would be acts to be denominated acts of adverse possession: but when the law makes it the duty of a man to abstain from doing those acts, the law will not permit him to [97] say they are acts of adverse possession, having the effect of acts of adverse possession.

But how is that between mortgagor and mortgagee? When I become a mortgagee, I am bound in the contract of mortgagor and mortgagee to be content with the payment of the interest, not until it is convenient to the mortgagor to pay me my principal, but until it is convenient to me to receive my principal; and if I demand my principal and interest, and he tenders to me my principal and interest, I am a trustee to convey to him the estate: but I am quite at liberty, after the time is out, during which there is a default, to enter and to receive all the rents and profits: and if I choose not to keep an account, that will not protect me, provided there is not negligence. If I make no acknowledgment to myself or a third person: if I do not declare in my will, or somehow or other, that I am only mortgagee, I may go on receiving the rents and profits: and if the negligence of my mortgagor suffers me to go on twenty years, I may turn round and say, "You shall not have your estate again, I will keep it;" why? because public policy says it should be so. I have often heard it said, "This is a very strange kind of public convenience, a very comical kind of public policy; on the last day of the twenty years it has not begun to operate, but at twelve o'clock that night reasons of public policy begin to operate: and though it might be redeemed the minute before, it cannot be redeemed the minute afterwards." Undoubtedly this, so stated, is startling. It seems a singular doctrine: but the fact is, you must lay down some positive rule: if you do not lay [98] down some positive rule, no man knows what he is to do with property: he cannot tell whether he can treat it as his own, or whether he cannot treat it as his own: and unless you lay down some rule applying to all cases, the consequence is, no man in any case can tell how he is to act as to property, or whether it is his property or not: it may be his, or may not be his, according to the caprice of those who may make their demands too soon or too late, as shall suit their own purposes. Without, therefore, reading passages from the books stating those doctrines, which I have been alluding to, with great precision, I may take it for granted, that there can be no doubt that a mortgagor cannot redeem a mortgaged estate after twenty years, except in those cases where there have been accounts kept, etc. that is, in the excepted cases.

I will here mention, lest I should forget it, that a case has been stated in the course of the argument at the bar of the House, which has very long depended before me, as much because I wished to know what would be the ultimate judgment in this case, as from any other reason, I mean the case of Pim v. Godwin. The attention which I have been called upon to give to this case, and my reflections upon that case necessarily connecting themselves with this case, I am now perfectly prepared to know how to deal with that case, and shall give judgment upon it in a very few days. If this had been a legal estate, and the twenty years had been run out, no ejectment could have been brought. But it is said that this is an equitable estate, and it is not only said that this is an equitable, but that it is an equitable estate where there is a third person acknowledging that [99] he is a mortgagee. Let us take those propositions separately. Is it to be contended, that adverse possession will not do as against an equitable estate, let that adverse possession be ever so long? I mean where there is no duty which the person that has the adverse possession has undertaken to discharge for him against whom he pleads that adverse possession, I cannot agree to that: it is a rule I never heard of; and now that almost all the property in the kingdom is equitable property, it does seem to me that would be a most dangerous doctrine indeed. This case illustrates what would be the consequence of it with respect to outstanding terms: if there is a term of 200 years, a term of 500 years, or a term of 1000 years, taking the mere proposition about equitable estates, (independently of the question of mortgage,) and if there is adverse possession, that is a man taking the rents and profits, and putting them into his own pocket with the knowledge of the other party, and with that knowledge generated, if you please, by his mind being under a mistake, is it to be contended, that possession for 200 years, or 500 years, or 1000 years, will not do, and if it will do for 200 years, or 500 years, or 1000 years, you are then to consider why it will not do for twenty years.

Then it is said that there is a mortgage here. It is very true there is a mortgage here; and in the cases of family settlements, to which I have been alluding, how many family estates are there where mortgages go on from generation to generation unpaid off: is it to be understood that the equitable property in fee is never to change in the course of centuries, or in the course of those [100] periods which would give limitation to the title to the estate.

The distinction I take in this case is this: Lord Clinton takes an estate with the consent (founded in mistake, if you please,) of Horace Lord Orford, in the year 1791. His taking the estate by that consent does not make the possession of the estate on his part less adverse, because it is a taking of the possession of the estate for himself, where he owed no duty whatever, as it appeared to me, to Horace Lord Orford, and his taking the possession of the estate, and keeping the possession of the estate during all the time in question, is, as it appears to me, an adverse possession of the estate, and intended to be an adverse possession of the estate. The intention on the part of Horace Lord Orford may have been an intention generated in his mind by mistake: but no person can deny that it was his intention that the former Lord Clinton should have a beneficial interest in the property so handed over to him; and if it was his intention that Lord Clinton should have a beneficial interest in the property so handed over to him, it appears to me it must be the intent that he should have an adverse enjoyment.

I really cannot get rid of a difficulty which has pressed on my mind throughout this case, when it is said the mortgagee admits there is a mortgage. Yes, he does so: but does Lord Clinton admit that any body else has the equity of redemption but himself; and I should be glad to know whether the circumstance of Horace Lord Orford from time to time permitting the Clintons to deal with the equity of redemption as owners of [101] the equity of redemption, and permitting them so to deal with the mortgagee as if he was the mortgagee of the Clintons, and not the mortgagee of Horace Lord Orford, whether that is not an extremely strong case in itself, to shew that adverse possession was intended by Horace Lord Orford: and is it not a strong circumstance to shew, that if a court of equity is not to relieve where persons have been placed in situations of hardship by the concurrence of others, (not fraudulently obtained,) it cannot relieve in such a case as this.

I should be glad to know, whether it is of course that, if a party has no remedy at law, a court of equity is bound to give him relief. The question here is not between mortgagor and mortgagee, but between two persons claiming the equity of redemption, and claiming both of them adverse to the mortgagee; and, under the circumstances, without going through all the cases, every one of which I have carefully examined, it strikes me, that this being the true nature of the question, here has been an adverse possession for above twenty years, and that is a bar in a court of equity. I would ask further, am I entitled to say that there has been mistake? and, if so, am I entitled to say there has been a mistake not discovered? Can I say that Horace Lord Orford, up to the period of his death, had never heard of this doubt? There is nothing in this record to prove the fact of a mistake: then I am in uncertainty on that point: but I go further: for if he died under that mistake, unless I have reason to believe that he would have endeavoured to take advantage of the mistake, which it is very difficult to suppose [102] if you look to the deeds which have been executed, unless I can find that, knowing of that mistake, he would have endeavoured to take advantage of it, I am by no means without considerable doubt whether a court of equity would allow those who claimed under him to take advantage of it.

But there is another view (most important) of this case. As between these parties, Horace Lord Orford had a right to make his own construction of that settlement of 1781. The deed of 1781 may be represented by a lawyer (I will not say whether it is to be so represented), but it may be represented as by the effect of that last limitation vesting the estate in Horace Lord Orford himself; but if he chose to involve other persons in all the consequences of his saying, "that is not my construction of the deed; I believe that George Lord Orford meant that some other persons should take the estate; I do not take, and do not mean to take the estate; I believe that George Lord Orford meant to give it to some other persons, to the Clintons for instance," on what ground is a court of equity to interfere?

With respect to cases, I shall mention only two or three: first, Bonny v. Ridgard, a very strong case,—for there, upon the face of the instrument, the parties who took under that instrument, could not but see, that the grantors in that instrument were not dealing with the property as they ought; but there Lord Kenyon (who, after having presided in a court of equity went into a court of law, in which he found no predecessor who knew more of law than himself; and I must do him memory the credit of saying, that he corrected a [103] great deal of error which had crept into courts of law, particularly in reference to these terms,) says, "there has been so much dealing with respect to those who have acquired interests under this property, that a court of equity must stand neutral."

I have certainly a very strong feeling as to this deed of confirmation, whether it is or not to have effect. In the year 1792 opinions were taken, and the lawyers who read the limitations in the deed of 1781, either did or did not (I cannot tell which) find out what was the effect of that deed. Six months after the opinions were taken that settlement was made, such as you see in the year 1792: money was raised upon those deeds, and the interests of families, family after family, wives and children, after wives and children, are involved in the effect of these transactions. Then comes the deed of 1794, which, in effect, lays before Horace Lord Orford all those deeds; for the deed of 1791 recites them, and I take it, in a court of justice, he must be understood to know the effect of them all. He makes a confirmation, not merely a confirmation stating that he meant to confirm the deed of 1781; but he makes a confirmation eo nomine, of the deed of October, 1792. I agree that it may be limited in the way which I mentioned before; but then, with all the circumstances before him, the property being carried to market, and made a security to strangers for money advanced, it appears to me to be a very difficult thing, after such transactions, to say that a court of equity ought to interfere.

With reference to Sir Lawrence Palk, what is it that we are asked to do? To redeem against him [104] without further enquiry, and that upon speculations at the bar; vide ibidem, that because the deed of 1791 is not recited in his mortgage deed executed a few months afterwards, we are to suppose he had no knowledge of it. If he had knowledge of it, then the case must be discussed upon what would be the effect of his security, having the facts before him; and if we are to take for granted that he had not this before him, the bill, as it appears to me, ought to have been amended. It appears to me that is a measure going a great deal further than we are in the habit of proceeding.

With respect to the other cases of Cashorn v. Searff, and the famous case of Hopkins v. Hopkins, of which we have heard so often; perhaps one may venture to say, as to two cases decided so nearly about the same time, and which contain language so little reconcileable, the one with the language of the other, that the best way of accounting for that is to intimate, that it is extremely possible that the reports may not be accurate in both. I do not carry now in my recollection precisely the case in which it occurred, but I do recollect the late Lord Loughborough stating distinctly, that that case of Hopkins v. Hopkins was most inaccurately reported. When Lord Hardwicke is reported to talk in one of those cases of seisin of equitable estate, I can suppose what he means; but, when he is made to speak of there being no intrusion on an equitable estate, I do not know what he means, with respect to seisin of an equitable estate.

I must act upon my own opinion in this case, as in all cases, but in this case with very great diffidence, because I happen to be differing from [105] the learned Judge who first decided this case; and of whom I should be proud to have that said of me, when I am gone into my grave, which I think may be justly said of him, as a most able Judge in equity. I am bound to give my own opinion upon the case, and I say, without entangling myself with the difficulties about seisin and intrusion, I am of opinion, that the adverse possession of an equity of redemption for twenty years is a bar to any other person claiming that equity of redemption; and it is an adverse possession which produces the same effect as those things you call abatement, intrusion and disseisin which belong to legal estates. It is an adverse possession which has the same effect, and, for the peace of families, and for the peace of the world, I think ought to have the same effect: and therefore, without going through more of the cases, I submit it to your Lordships, as my humble opinion upon this grave and important question, that this bill cannot be maintained.

If I am right in that opinion, the consequence is, that the bill ought to be dismissed. If your Lordships shall be otherwise advised, or shall hold a different opinion, it will be necessary to enter into the other questions which I have taken the liberty of proposing should be reserved until this was disposed of. I have thought it my duty to put your Lordships in possession of this question, in the first instance, for I think it infinitely better it should be decided wrong, (which, I trust, it will not be,) than that it should not be decided at all; because, where a case, involving a point of so much importance, stands on contrary decisions in two Courts, it is impossible to estimate the mis-[106]-chief that would ensue to property in general, if the matter were left in doubt.

Lord Redesdale: My Lords, It appears to me that much of the argument which you have heard at the bar, has been founded upon reasoning drawn from what has been the state of the law at a very distant period, and perhaps without sufficient consideration of the variation which has been introduced by alteration of circumstances, and alteration of the law. In very early times the modes of conveyancing were very simple, but from time to time the devices of men have introduced complications upon that system, and the legislature has interfered upon the subject, and has altered, in a very great degree, the mode which formerly existed of conveying titles from man to man. Your Lordships must well know, that in early times, the simple mode of conveying freehold title was by feoffment and livery of seisin: that is, by delivery of the possession of the property from A. who had the property to B. who was to receive it.

In early times, leases, that is, terms of years granted to tenants, were considered as almost wholly in the power of the person who had the freehold, and were little regarded until a statute (in early times indeed) gave them protection. That alone created a considerable difference with respect to property, because it secured the possession in the person who had a term for years, and it made an entry upon that possession by the person who had the freehold unlawful, unless from some conditions in the grant of the term he had a right to enter. It, therefore, necessarily, has become a very different thing to reason upon titles, [107] since all these changes have been introduced, from what it was in the early history of the law.

Another very great change was effected (originally, as it is supposed) by the contrivance of the church, to appropriate to themselves property by devising what was called the indication of a use. Where the estate was conveyed to A., and he held the estate not for himself, but for B., that brought forward the jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity, operating upon the conscience of the person to whom the estate was conveyed, to give the benefit of the estate to the person for whose benefit it was intended.

A statute was made to remove the inconveniences produced by this mode of conveyance of property, as it affected rights which do not now exist, namely, those rights which were derived from tenures, which have been called Feudal Tenures; whether they have in this country been properly so denominated, or in the extent to which some persons have carried the language which has been used in the statute, it is not very important to determine. I can only say, that as far as I have been able to investigate the subject, the law of feuds, strictly speaking, never was the law of this country: and a great deal of the argument which will be found in modern cases, and which is not to be found in more ancient cases, I think is founded in mistake. However, we cannot now reason upon these principles, if we consider what is the manner in which property is now held: for the actual possession of property in the hands of the owner is now a comparatively rare part of the possessions of this country. The property is in the hands of tenants: those tenants, in many [108] parts, enjoying under terms, created for the purpose of giving to the person who was entitled to the inheritance the benefit of the property in the shape of rent, or some other shape.

Much of the reasoning in the cases at the bar has been founded upon an idea which

I shall be obliged to advert to by-and-by in speaking of the statute of James, to which I confess I think a great deal more of consequence has been given in some late cases than ought to have been given, without more consideration, at least, than it appears to me those cases have had. I mention this because a good deal of the argument at the bar has been founded upon the authority of recent decisions, which do appear to me to require a great deal of consideration. The statute is almost a nullity with respect to a great deal of property in this country, if the construction with respect to the words entry and right, and title of entry, is to be that which has been supposed. It is perfectly clear that, in courts of equity, (and your Lordships are now considering yourselves as in a court of equity,) the possession and enjoyment of the estate by receipt of the rents and profits, whether by the hands of the tenant or the owner actually taking the profit from the land, has been considered as that possession which courts of equity are bound to protect. I have said so much upon this subject, because it appears to me extremely clear that the distinction between courts of equity and courts of law, supposing the recent decisions in courts of law to be well founded, is material to your decision of this case; and further, because if those decisions are correct, it does seem to me it would be high time for your Lordships to [109] act in your legislative capacity to make a new statute for limitation of actions.

I propose to consider the questions before you, independently of the construction of the words in the deed of 1781, limiting the estate to the heirs of Samuel Rolle, supposing the true construction to be that which has been put upon them by the Appellants in this case, and entering in no degree into a discussion of that question, upon which, whatever opinion I may have formed, I must have formed without having heard it argued at your Lordships' bar, which I ought to do before I come to any decision upon the subject. I will take up the question simply upon the consideration whether you ought to allow that question to be discussed in the way in which it ought to be discussed in a court of law, by removing the legal bars to a discussion in a court of law which may exist. The nature of the suit which has been instituted by Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer, is this, in effect; it is saying, we have a legal title; having that legal title, in one sense of the word, there exist legal bars to our exercising that title in a court of law, and we desire a court of equity to remove those bars; that is the most favourable way, in my humble opinion, of discussing the question on their part. The manner in which they have attempted to discuss it has been by considering the property in question as a right in the nature of an estate; and considering it in that light, then you are to consider how estates of that description have been dealt with in courts of equity; for as equitable estates are familiar to courts of equity, you can only judge how you are to deal [110] with them, by considering in what manner courts of equity have dealt with such estates.

Lord Cholmondeley and Mrs. Damer come into a court of equity to say that George Earl of Orford being seised of the lands in question, subject to certain interests which he had created, but with an ultimate limitation (all the other interests being now merged) to vest in him the fee-simple, made a mortgage in fee; and upon that occasion a trust term which had been created long previous to his title, but under the settlement by which he derived his title, was assigned to a trustee; that, therefore, George Earl of Orford at the time of his death had, in law, no estate in the strict construction of law, but only an equity of redemption of a mortgaged estate, and a right to have the term considered as a term attendant upon his estate of inheritance, that no person claiming under him could claim more than that equity of redemption, except the mortgagee; that under those circumstances, if a mortgage had not existed, they could have proceeded at law to assert a title to the estate, as vested in the heir of Horace Earl of Orford, or the legatee of Horace Earl of Orford. Horace Earl of Orford having been the heir of George Earl of Orford. They come into equity, therefore, to obtain, first of all, redemption of the mortgage, and a conveyance of the legal estate to them; which legal estate, if conveyed to them, could give them the power of proceeding for the purpose of obtaining the estate and possession at law; and they go on further to pray, also, an account of the rents and profits, which have been received in the mean time. They state, however, that on the death of [111] Earl George, so long ago as December 1794, the late Lord

Clinton entered upon this estate, and received the rents and profits, and that the rents and profits have from that time, to the time of filing their bill, been received by the late Lord Clinton, and the person claiming under him. They contend, that upon the death of George Earl of Orford, Horace Earl of Orford became entitled to this property: and inasmuch as it was an equitable estate, that although he had not actual possession of the estate, he was entitled to that possession: and, therefore, as contended on the part of Mrs. Damer, that it passed by his will, and by Lord Cholmondeley, that the estate, if it did not pass by the will of Earl Horace, vested in him, as heir of Earl Horace, both of them asserting, therefore, that this was an equitable title: that Earl Horace, on the death of Earl George, became the rightful owner of that property: and that, being the rightful owner of that property, a court of equity ought to give the estate, either to the devisee or the heir of Earl Horace. It is observable, that Lord Cholmondeley does not claim the property as heir of Earl George, and therefore he must claim this, if at all, as the heir of Earl Horace.

The objections which are raised on the part of the Defendants to this suit, independently of the construction of the deed, are founded upon the length of possession, upon the construction given by Earl Horace himself to the deed of 1784, the settlement which has been made in 1792, the deed of confirmation of 1794, and the subsequent transactions, all of which have been founded in confidence of the perfectness of that title, which Lord Clinton supposed he had when he entered, [112] in December 1791, upon the death of Earl George: and your Lordships are now called upon, sitting in a Court of Appeal, to say, that after this lapse of time you are to destroy the effect of all those transactions, and to involve all the persons who have been engaged in them in all the difficulties that would necessarily follow, because it is according to good conscience that the estate should be delivered either to Lord Cholmondeley or to Mrs. Damer.

The ground upon which this is attempted to be founded, is, that the possession which was had by the late Lord Clinton, and by those who claimed under him since that time, must be taken to be the possession of the mortgagee: because, according to a maxim which has been adopted in courts of equity, and in a certain degree in courts of law, the mortgagor being permitted to remain in possession, with the privity of the mortgagee, the mortgagee receiving his interest, so that there could be no ground for presuming satisfaction, the mortgagor is to be considered as tenant at will of the mortgagee. That is the ground of the argument: and it has been considered as resembling the case of a cestui que trust in possession of a property vested in the trustees, the trustees permitting that enjoyment by the person who was the cestui que trust.

Now, we ought to consider upon what ground it was that courts have adopted this principle, that the possession of a mortgagor shall be considered as the possession of the mortgagee, and that the mortgagor is to be considered as tenant at will to the mortgagee. It is founded upon the principle of effectuating the security to the mortgagee, and [113] for no other purpose: and being founded upon that view, is to be carried no farther. But the counsel for the Appellants have endeavoured to assimilate the case of a mortgagee to that of a trustee: and a doctrine has been urged here as in the Court below, a position of law, which is submitted in the argument, certainly on a very high authority, that an estate could not be gained by disseisin, intrusion, or abatement, to the prejudice of a party for whom the persons having the legal estate were trustees. Now, that Lord Hardwicke should have used those words in the wide and extended sense attributed is impossible, considering what he himself had done in other cases. The report of Hopkins v. Hopkins, as given by Mr. Atkyns, will, upon inspection, be found to be certainly a very inaccurate report, even inaccurate in the statement of the facts of the case, and of the will. I have formerly compared it with the will of Mr. Hopkins, and I found it to be inaccurate in every part: and Lord Loughborough, in the case of Abbott v. Vincent, when Hopkins v. Hopkins was quoted, said that the case was incorrect throughout: that he had compared it with Mr. Forrester's notes, who was extremely correct, and it differed materially. I happen to have a note of the case, which I believe was Mr. Joddrell's: I have compared it with Mr. Forrester's notes, and there is certainly a very considerable difference between the two notes. However, I will take Lord Hardwicke to have used exactly the words which are stated in Mr. Atkyns's report; but we are to consider for what purpose Lord Hardwicke uses these words. Lord Hardwicke uses these words simply for this purpose. Mr. Hopkins had devised the estate to trustees and [114] their heirs, to the use of them and their heirs, so as to make it a complete use executed in them, upon the trust and for the purposes after mentioned. Then, says Lord Hardwicke, they are trustees for all the purposes after mentioned. Mr. Hopkins had devised his estate to the son of his heir at law, and his first and other sons; and if there should be a failure of that estate, then to any after-born sons of the heir at law successively; and if they should all fail, then to the unborn sons of the daughter of this heir at law. There were other remainders in the will, which Lord Hardwicke says went beyond what the law permits in the disposition of property, limiting an estate for life to unborn persons; and he considers simply this, whether an estate limited to those trustees, to the use of them and their heirs in trust for the purposes after mentioned, would or would not support the several contingent estates, and he says nobody can doubt that it would support the contingent estates; therefore, says he, what necessity is there, when the whole is devised upon trust for all the purposes mentioned in the will, to insert distinctly the estates of the same trustees to support contingent remainders: it would not only be nugatory, but it would really be absurd; and then he refers to cases at law before the statute of uses, in which it was clear that such had been the construction of the courts of law before the statute of uses, that when the estate was conveyed to persons to the use of others, the estate so conveyed to the use of others was held sufficient to support contingent remainders, and his sole meaning in introducing those words, appears to me to be, that by the effect of the conveyance to the trustees to the [115] use of them and their heirs, in trust for the purposes after mentioned, the estate so vested in them would, from time to time, serve for the purpose of supporting contingent trust estates; and in the ancient conveyances, before the statute of uses, such a conveyance would have supported contingent remainders. He illustrates this perfectly by referring to what were the common means of destroying contingent uses where the estate was limited at law; that is, if the estate was conveyed to A. for life, with remainder to the first and other sons in tail male, he having no sons born, so that there was no person in being capable of taking that limitation, and therefore the limitation could not vest, that the conveyance of the person who had the estate for life would have destroyed that contingent remainder, because the estate to support that contingency was gone; and then, he says, the way adopted to obviate that was to substitute trustees, so that if the tenant for life thought fit to destroy his own estate, then the estate of the trustees rose instantly, and supported the contingent remainders; and that in reason the case before him was exactly the same thing, because, when the trustees under Mr. Hopkins's will were trustees for all the purposes of the will, they were trustees for the purpose of permitting the enjoyment, by the tenant for life, so long as he should live, and upon his death, conveying the estate to the person who thereupon would become entitled, and therefore in the mean time preserving the estate for the persons entitled, in the same manner as if trustees for preserving contingent remainders had been interposed.

I have made this statement of the case of Hop[116]kins v. Hopkins, because I observe, that in a very learned judgment, given originally in this case, an expression of Lord Hardwicke, as reported by Mr. Atkyns, and which is very nearly like that in Mr. Joddrell's note, is taken by that learned person in a sense which it was not intended by Lord Hardwicke to convey; it would be perfectly inconsistent with what Lord Hardwicke himself said in other cases. It is clear, from what he says in this very case, that that could not be his meaning, because he distinguishes the case of a devise of a legal estate to the trustees in trust for express purposes, and a devise of an estate of which the deviser had only the trust interest, and which was vested in trustees for him: he says, in such a case, the person who had the equitable interest for life might destroy the equitable remainder, because it was not the purpose of the trust originally created to support the equitable remainder; but the purpose of the trust originally created was to enable the person who had the devise to dispose of the estate, but to dispose of it in the same manner as if it had been a legal estate.

Putting, therefore, that authority out of the question, the only consideration, as it strikes my mind, is this, whether the courts of equity have not constantly considered equitable estates precisely in the situation, and the same in the enjoyment of them, as they have considered legal estates. I do not mean where a trust estate is created for the express purpose of doing certain acts, because there, according to what Lord Hardwicke determined in Hopkins v. Hopkins, the trust was to effect all the purposes for which it was created; but I mean a trust estate, having no concern what-[117]-ever with the disposition of the acts in question, where a person, having a trust estate, acts upon it, and the whole is in the contemplation of a court of equity, precisely as if it was a legal estate: and in this very case of Hopkins v. Hopkins, Lord Hardwicke over and over again says, that unless such had been the rule in courts of equity, the country could not have endured the existence of that species of estate, it would have introduced so much confusion.

Under these circumstances, the question for your Lordships' consideration is this, Whether the lapse of time between the death of George Earl of Orford and the time of the bill being brought in this case is not a lapse of time which, by the provision of the statute, is a bar to relief in a court of equity. All the statutes for the limitation of actions, are statutes expressly made for the purpose of quieting possession: that is the great object of the policy of those statutes. It is generally immaterial to the public at large, whether A. or B. is the owner of a particular estate; but it is highly important to the public at large, that the person who is in possession should be the owner, for he is dealt with by all men as the owner, they seeing that he is in possession, and therefore it is a consideration of public policy. The statutes of limitation are not simply for the purpose of quieting rights between individuals, but they are founded upon public policy, that the person who is possession having the credit attributed to that possession, his possession should not be lightly disturbed. The different statutes, made at different times, have given different terms to the limitation of actions. The last, that of 21 James I., limits cer-[118]-tain actions upon particular writs, which apply only to particular persons. The general provision, that no entry shall be made by any person, unless within twenty years after the right or title of entry shall have accrued, Lord Hardwicke, and other judges in equity, have said is a provision in the statute upon which courts of equity have acted. It has been attempted, at your bar, to argue upon the ground that Lord Cholmondeley, claiming as heir, might bring a writ of right, if the question was open at law; but that is a particular writ, in which particular privileges are allowed, and the courts of equity have never regarded that, or the writ of formedon, or any other particular writ, but have considered the limitation in the statute of James I., of twenty years after the rights or title of entry accrued, as that which was to decide.

Now, how is right and title of entry to be construed with respect to an equitable estate? The right and title of entry, in a court of equity, cannot mean a right to go upon the land and take possession of it, in the form of the old entry at the common law; but it means the right of instituting a suit in equity upon the subject, to avoid a fine, if a fine is levied of an equitable estate: it is not by entry in the common way, but it is laid down, over and over again in very ancient cases, that the claim must be by subpoena, because your title is a title with respect to a right in equity, and the way of asserting the title of entry is not by entering on the lands, but by instituting a suit in equity.

I conceive therefore that the very words of the statute of James I., if it is a statute which has any application to a court of equity, apply to such a case as this. The title to this property accrued [119] above twenty years before the bill filed, and therefore that title in a court of equity is barred by this statute, supposing it to be a statute which courts of equity are to consider as affecting their proceedings, as well as proceedings at common law. Now, although the statute itself applies only to proceedings at common law, in direct words, it must be understood to have been intended by the legislature to affect proceedings in courts of equity: for courts of equity have been constantly declaring, we will, with respect to equitable titles, proceed by analogy to the proceedings of courts of common law; and when the lawgivers were prescribing the mode of proceeding in the courts of law, they must have been considered as intending to make an act of parliament to regulate the proceedings in courts of equity also. It is extremely difficult to frame precise words upon that subject: but if the legislature, at the time when they passed that act, were aware that there were suits in equity, and that all large estates and every considerable property was constantly turned into an equitable property, and if the object of that act was to quiet possession, they would have provided for that very imperfectly, if they had not intended that the enactment contained in that act should be considered as binding upon the courts of equity, as well as the courts of law, according to the mode of proceeding in those courts. I take it therefore to be a positive law, which ought to bind all courts, and for that reason I have taken the liberty in another place to say, that I considered it not simply a rule adopted by courts of equity by analogy to what had been done in courts of law under the statute, but that it was a proceeding in obedience to the statute, [120] and that the framers of that statute must have meant that courts of equity should adopt that rule of proceeding.

If it were otherwise, only consider in what a situation property in this country would be, where in large settlements of estates terms are created, provisions made for younger children, and mortgages subsist upon the property. The consequence would be, that the title of the person in actual possession would be doubtful: a very large portion of the property of the country being equitable and not legal, if the statute of limitations did not apply even by its enactment to that sort of property, the whole property of the country would be in danger of being disturbed by suits without number, and the object of the statute, namely, the quieting of possession, could never be obtained.

With respect to fines, it is over and over again determined, that a fine will bar an equitable as much as it will a legal estate—it is over and over again determined, that a court of equity does not enter into the question, whether there shall be entry. It is impossible to suppose that Lord Hardwicke, in the case of Hopkins v. Hopkins, should not have had this subject in his contemplation.

The next consideration is upon the effect of the deed of 1794. Now, I apprehend, that that deed is extremely important to be considered with respect to the lapse of time: because, independently of the statute of limitations, and if there had been no such statute, what is the effect of that deed of 1794? The deed of 1794 recites the deed of 1781, it recites that under that deed Lord Clinton entered into possession: the deed of 1794 acknowledges that he had a legal title under that [121] deed, unless it was qualified by the deed of 1785, and then noticing the settlement of 1792, it confirms that settlement, certainly, with a qualification in point of words, so far as the deed of 1781 might have been revoked by the deed of 1785. First of all the deed of 1794 recites, that the motives of Lord Horace in that deed were his conviction that such was the intention of Earl George, and that therefore, if he had the legal right, furthering that intention, he would have preserved that intention. He has, in the same deed, stated his conviction, that under the deed of 1781, if not affected by the deed of 1785, Lord Clinton had by the intention of George Earl of Orford a right to this estate; and what reason is there to suppose that Horace Earl of Orford, had not the same view of the subject, with respect to the deed of 1781. It can hardly be doubted, whether under the deed of 1781, the estate did or did not go to Lord Clinton, whether there was a mistake, or whether it was affected by the deed of 1785 or not. If Lord Horace was here, he might say such was not my intention, but how can Lord Cholmondeley or Mrs. Damer say so; they know nothing of what passed in his mind, except what is in his deed, and what do you see in his deed? you see he was anxious that the intention of Earl George should be carried into execution; not simply, that what was the real right between the parties should have effect, but that the intention of Earl George should be carried into effect, that is, the intention of Earl George to limit his own estate to the person who should be heir of the Rolle family, and Earl Horace might have felt a conscientious desire to perform what he must know was the anxious wish of Earl George. It was the [122] wish of Lord Horace also: Lord Horace, by executing the deed of 1794, has declared to all the world, who could deal with the property: "the construction I put on the deed of 1781 is, that it gives the estate to Lord Clinton, for the deed of 1794 recites the deed of 1781: it recites the possession of Lord Clinton, under the deed of 1781, upon the death of George Earl of Orford on the 5th of December, 1791, and it recites the settlement of 1792, and the recital in that settlement, that those estates did, on the decease of the said George late Earl of Orford, come to and vest in the said Lord Clinton, subject and liable with other estates, to the mortgage made by George Earl of Orford." By this deed so executed by him, the contents of which it is to be presumed he was cognizant of, Lord Horace has declared, such is my construction of the deed of 1781: he might have taken it for granted, that that deed did vest the estate in Lord Clinton: but either he did take that for granted, or he was willing that such should be the construction, and he held out to all the world, that the deed of 1781 had conveyed the estate to Lord Clinton. He having held out to all the world that idea, can persons, claiming under him at this distance of time, say that a court of equity is to interfere as a court of conscience, to affect all persons who have been dealing with the property.

What is the common case: If A. were to say to B., C. has a good title to such an estate, therefore, you may deal with him, I will be responsible in damages! If A. himself had the title and said that he would be responsible for all the dealings, it never could be permitted for him to frustrate what had been done in consequence of that declaration. [123] I conceive, therefore, that under this deed of 1794, a title is gained by those who deal with it, which will prevent a court of equity interfering as a court of conscience, against the effect which Earl Horace has, in that deed, given to the deed of 1781.

The next consideration is with respect to the frame of this bill: and it is utterly impossible that any decree could be made upon this bill, because the persons who are co-Plaintiffs in this bill have opposite interests. If the estate passed by the will of Horace Earl of Orford, Lord Cholmondeley has nothing to do with it; if it did not pass by the will of Horace Earl of Orford, Mrs. Damer has nothing to do with it. Then in what manner would this question arise? If there was no other objection to it, there might be a bill filed by Mrs. Damer, and another by Lord Cholmondeley; and to the bill filed by Mrs. Damer, Lord Cholmondeley must be a party; and to the bill filed by Lord Cholmondeley, Mrs. Damer must be a party; and the court must decree, that Mrs. Damer had no right, in one instance, and Lord Cholmondeley in another; and, how is this sought to be avoided? By an alleged agreement, and that is directly contrary to law. They are both of them out of possession, and are incompetent to make a bargain upon the subject, affecting any person, except the person in possession; they are both competent to make a composition with him, if he thought fit, but competent to deal with no other person by the statute, which is only an affirmation of the common law upon the subject of pretended titles, by adding penalties. By that statute, this agreement is not only contrary to law, but would make the persons who entered into it, liable to heavy penalties.

[124] It is, therefore, impossible for any decree to be made here; you could not make a decree, if nothing was stated, as to the agreement, because the relation of parties would be inconsistent with the decree. You cannot make a decree at the suit of A. and B. which is to destroy the right of A. and give the right to B.: or give the right to A. and destroy the right of B.: it is utterly inconsistent. To avoid that inconsistency, they state this agreement, which is contrary to law, and which you are bound to destroy. Nothing can be more dangerous than such contracts; and the act against pretended titles, was as much to protect possession, as the statute of limitations: the great object of the law, the policy of the law throughout, has been to protect possession. It is immaterial to the public at large whether the estate belong to A. or B.: but it is material, that the person in possession, should be quieted in that possession, and that all who deal with him, should be protected.

I concur in what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord who last addressed you, that this bill ought to be dismissed. I wish to have it understood, that I am clearly of opinion, that upon the statute of limitations, a court of equity has not jurisdiction to entertain the question, because the right was barred by the effect of that statute. I am also clearly of opinion, that the deed of 1794 has such an effect upon the property, that it would be against conscience for your Lordships now to interfere in the manner which is sought by this bill; and I am further of opinion, that upon this bill, framed as it is, with this allegation of an agreement, it is not only impossible for your Lordships to make a decree, but that it would be the duty of [125] your Lordships to dismiss the bill, whatever the rights of the parties were. I do not wish to decide the question upon that ground, but principally upon the operation of the statute of limitations, because that is a question which affects all the titles in the kingdom. The other two are more particularly applicable to the particular case; I feel it therefore more important, that it should be understood, that the opinion of the House upon this part of the case, is founded on the operation of the statute of limitations, and not on the other parts of the case.

Decree affirmed.

Cuthbert v. Creasy and others.

To a bill of discovery in aid of an action of intrusion brought by a remainder-man in a devise after a lapse of thirty-nine years from the death of the tenant for life, and twenty-seven years from the time when the remainder-man attained the age of twenty-one, demurrer allowed.

[Mews' Dig. v. 961 ; ix. 178.]

THE bill filed on the 18th of July, 1820, and amended by order dated 7th of February, 1821, stated that Robert Cuthbert, late of Friskney, in the county of Lincoln, grazier, was, at the time of making his will, and thenceforward to the time of his death, seised of or otherwise well entitled in fee-simple in possession to certain messuages, cottages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, situate, lying, and being in the said parish of Friskney, and the said Robert Cuthbert being so seised or entitled, and being of sound and disposing mind, memory, and understanding, duly made and published his last will and testament in writing, bearing date the 24th of October, 1767, which was duly executed and attested so as to pass freehold estates by devise, and whereby the said testator devised the said messuages, cottages, tenements, lands, and hereditaments to his wife Ann Cuthbert, for her life, if she should so long continue his widow, with remainder to his sons George Cuthbert and Robert Cuthbert, and their heirs for ever, as tenants in common.

That the said testator departed this life about the year 1771, without having altered or revoked his said will, leaving the said George Cuthbert, his eldest son and heir at law.

That upon or shortly after the death of the said testator, the said Ann Cuthbert entered into the possession of the said pre-[126]mises, or into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and continued in the possession thereof, or in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, till the time of her death, which happened on or about the 9th of September, 1781.

That upon or about or within a few years after the time of the death of the said Ann Cuthbert, and in or about the years 1780, 1781, 1782, or 1783, the then churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Friskney entered upon and took possession of the said premises so devised by the said will of the said testator Robert Cuthbert as aforesaid, and they and their successors have ever since continued in the possession thereof, or in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and the present churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish of Friskney now are, and ever since their appointment to their said situations or offices of churchwardens and overseers of the poor of said parish of Friskney have been, in the possession of the said premises, or in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and claim to be entitled thereto by virtue of their said situations or offices.

The bill further stated, that the said George Cuthbert, the devisee, departed this life a long time ago, and in the lifetime of the said Ann Cuthbert, intestate and without issue, leaving the Plaintiff, his eldest son and heir at law; and the said Robert Cuthbert, about forty years ago left this kingdom, and went abroad, and has never since been heard of, but is or must be now presumed to be dead intestate and without issue, and Plaintiff is the heir at law of the said Robert Cuthbert, the devisee, and also the heir at law of the said testator; and Plaintiff is, under the circumstances aforesaid, entitled to the said premises in fee-simple.

The bill then stated that the churchwarden and overseers of the said parish refused to deliver up to the Plaintiff the possession of the said premises, and Plaintiff was going to commence an action, by a writ of entry upon an intrusion in the post, against the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of said parish of Friskney, to obtain possession of said premises; and that the Plaintiff had been advised, that it was absolutely necessary, that the writ to be issued by Plaintiff for the recovery of the said premises in the said action should contain the names of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of said parish of Friskney in office at the time of the death of the said Ann Cuthbert, the tenant for life, or at the time when the said churchwarden and overseers first took possession of the said premises, for the purpose of stating by whom the intrusion was [127] originally made, and that Plaintiff was entirely ignorant what were or was, or are or is, the names or name of the churchwarden or overseers of the poor of Friskney, or any of them, at the time of the death of said Ann Cuthbert, or at the time when the said churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish first took possession of the said premises as aforesaid, and that the Plaintiff, previous to the 13th of November, 1813, and also since that time, had made and caused to be made all possible enquiries and researches, but in vain, to ascertain who were the churchwarden and overseers of the poor of the said parish who first took possession of the said premises as aforesaid.

That Plaintiff, accompanied by his solicitor, on the 13th of November, 1819, went to the said parish of Friskney, and personally demanded of Bletcher Creasy, Thomas Williamson, Thomas Redford, and William Bollon, the churchwarden and overseers of the poor of the said parish of Friskney, permission to inspect the parish books for the purpose of ascertaining the names of the churchwarden and overseers of the poor of the said parish of Friskney by whom the said intrusion was originally made, and that Plaintiff and his said solicitors did at the said time deliver to each of them the said B. Creasy, Thomas Williamson, Thomas Redford, and William Bollon, a demand in writing in the words and figures following: namely, "To Bletcher Creasy, Thomas Williamson, Thomas Redford, and William Bollon, churchwarden and overseers of the poor of the parish of Friskney, in the county of Lincoln, I, Robert Cuthbert, of Swineshead, in the county of Lincoln, miller, do hereby demand of you and require permission to inspect the book or books in which the appointment of the parish officers for your said parish of Friskney is written or contained for the years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783. Dated this 13th day of November, 1819. Robert Cuthbert. Witness, William Walker."

That the said Thomas Williamson, Thomas Redford, and William Bollon, upon such demand being made and delivered, declared that they were the overseers of the poor of the said parish of Friskney, but that they had not the books to produce; and Bletcher Creasy then acknowledged that he was the churchwarden of the said parish of Friskney, and could produce the books demanded, but the said Bletcher Creasy positively refused to produce the said books so demanded as aforesaid to Plaintiff, or any other person than a charge bearer.

That the Plaintiff was not a charge bearer of the said parish.

[128] That the said Bletcher Creasy is the present churchwarden of said parish, and that the said William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter were the (then present) overseers of the poor of the said parish of Friskney, and that B. Creasy, William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter were in the possession of said premises, or in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and that the B. Creasy, William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter had in their possession or power the book or books of the said parish, in which were entered the names of the parish officers of the said parish, and particularly of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish for said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, and that Plaintiff is entitled to have the same produced to him, in order that he may inspect the same, and ascertain the names of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish for said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783.

The bill charged, that Bletcher Creasy, William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter knew the names of each of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish for each of the said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, and when they respectively entered into their said respective situations or offices as such churchwardens and overseers, and also knew or believed, or had some reason to know or believe, which of them first took possession of the said premises, and when they or he first took possession thereof, and that Bletcher Creasy, William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter ought to set forth and discover who were the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish of Friskney in each of the said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, and when they respectively entered into their said situations or offices, and how long they respectively continued therein, and which of them first took possession of the said premises, or entered into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and when.

The bill further charged, that Robert Cuthbert, the son of the testator, was, at the time of the death of Ann Cuthbert, and for a long time afterwards, and to the time of his death abroad, in very indigent circumstances, and ignorant of his interest and rights in or to the said premises; and Plaintiff was, at the time of the death of the said Ann Cuthbert, and for many years afterwards, an infant, and in indigent circumstances, and at a great distance from the said parish of Friskney, and ignorant of his rights, and attained his age of twenty-one years in the year 1793, but was then and for many years afterwards in very indigent cir-[129]-cumstances, and ignorant of his rights, and at a great distance from the said parish of Friskney.

The bill then charged, that the Defendants ought to set forth a list or schedule of all books, accounts, papers, and writings in their or any of their possession or power containing any entries relative to the said premises, and the possession thereof, and the rents and profits thereof, and ought also to set forth the particulars of all such entries for each of the said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, in the words and figures thereof; that the Plaintiff on or about the 6th of July, 1820, applied to the said Bletcher Creasy, William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter, and requested them to produce and shew to him the said parish books or book containing the names of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish for the said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, in order that Plaintiff might inspect the same for the purposes aforesaid; but the said Bletcher Creasy, William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter refused to shew the same to Plaintiff, and that Plaintiff has frequently applied, and frequent applications have since been made on his behalf, to the said Bletcher Creasy, William Bollon, Robert Pinder, and Thomas Carter to produce for Plaintiff's inspection the book or books of the said parish in which are contained the names of the parish officers of the said parish, and particularly of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish for the said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, and to discover to Plaintiff which of the said churchwardens and overseers of the said parish took possession of the said premises, and when; and also to produce and shew to Plaintiff the said other books, accounts, documents, papers, and writings relating to the said premises, and the possession thereof, and the receipt of the rents and profits thereof; but they refused to comply with such applications.

The bill further charged that it would be necessary for Plaintiff, in order to sustain his intended action for the recovery of the said premises, to have the said books or book, accounts, documents, papers, and writings containing the entries aforesaid, produced at the trial of such action, but that the Plaintiff would not be able to enforce the production thereof without the assistance and order of the Court.

The bill therefore prayed that the Defendants might be ordered to produce, for the inspection of Plaintiff and his solicitor or agent, the book or books of the said parish in their or any of their possession or power containing the entries of [130] the names of the several churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the said parish for the said years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, and also all other books, accounts, documents, papers, and writings in their or any of their possession or power containing any entries relative to the said premises, and the possession thereof, and the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, for the said several years 1780, 1781, 1782, and 1783, and each or any of them; and that all the said books or book, accounts or account, papers, documents, and writings might also be produced for Plaintiff's benefit at the trial of the said intended action.

To this bill the Defendants put in a general demurrer for want of equity, both as to the discovery and the relief.

The demurrer was argued before the Vice-Chancellor (Sir John Leach), in February, 1821, when liberty was given to amend the bill, which was accordingly done, and a demurrer was filed to the amended bill. The demurrer to the amended bill was argued in November, 1821, principally on the grounds that such an action could not be maintained, and if it could be maintained, that a court of equity would not aid such an action by a discovery. But the demurrer was overruled, and thereupon a petition of appeal against the order overruling the demurrer, was presented to the Lord Chancellor (Earl of Eldon). The case was argued in December, 1821, by Mr. Horne (Sir W. Horne, Attorney-General) and Mr. Pemberton for the Appeal, and by Mr. W. Agar and Mr. Duckworth for the Respondents.

The heads of the argument for the Appellant were as follows:

The first question is, whether the Court will interfere to assist a claim at law after the lapse of twenty years. Secondly, if the Plaintiffs are not able to sustain any action at law, and the Defendant can shew this fact, then the Court will not give any discovery.

The Plaintiff claims under a will, bearing date in the year 1767, and the testator died in or about the year 1771; and in the year 1781 the tenant for life died, and thereupon the Plaintiff became entitled to one moiety, and as to the other moiety there is a lapse of thirty years.

The Court will never interfere in favour of parties who have been out of possession for more than twenty years, against parties who have been in adverse possession for more than twenty [131] years. The measure of legal right is not the measure of equitable right. Will a court of equity after twenty years interfere by direct relief or indirect relief by removing impediments: or by enforcing discovery. Discovery is a species of equitable relief. The limitation of twenty years was adopted by courts of equity above a century previous to the statute of limitations, and continued for a century afterwards without any reference to the statute, and has been now finally established.

Wincheomb v. Hall (1 Ch. Rep. 22, 5 Chap. 1) was a case to have a deed set aside as being a conveyance by the father in a state of imbecility. The relief was refused, twenty years having elapsed, and two purchases having been made. But this estate might have been recovered at law by writ of right.

In cases of bills for redemption the Court has refused relief at different periods, sometimes thirty years, sometimes twenty years, but the Court always requires the party seeking relief to shew that he comes within a reasonable time.

Pearson v. Pulley (1 Ch. Ca. 102) is the first case in which twenty years was suggested. It was a case of redemption before Lord Nottingham.

There are cases in Vernon's Reports which establish the same doctrine.

Low v. Burron (3 P. W. 264) is precisely in point. It was a bill for an account of rents and profits after thirty years. It was not a suit to set aside the deeds for the purpose of trying the right. A plea of the statute of limitations was allowed.

In Cook v. Arnhem (Ibid. 287) it was held, that fourteen years laches, as it would not bar an ejectment, would not bar redemption. In the note to that case, it is laid down, upon authorities cited, that as the twenty years would bar an ejectment, the same period is proper to bar redemption. The Court always fixed the time of twenty years with reference to the statute of James, and not to that of Hen. 8.

In Cook v. Cook (2 Atk. 67) it was held, that a court of equity will not interfere after twenty years: and it was ordered, that the Defendant should be quieted in his possession after a lapse of twenty-one years. In 3 Atk. (Anon. 313) there is a case of a bill for redemption, and the rule as to redemption was held to be analogous to the rule in the statute. All the cases establish this point.

In Deloraine v. Brown (3 B. C. C. 653; see 2 S. and L. 637) it appears that the doctrine that [132] length of time will bar equitable relief is not novel, but as old as the Court. Smith v. Clay in the note to the last case is to the same effect. Cholmondeley v. Clinton (2 J. and M. and M. D. P. ante) is the last case and conclusive. It may be doubted whether twenty years is not by the provision of the statute a bar to relief in equity. Sidney v. Perry (Red. Tr. Pl. 207).

Not one case is to be found in which a court of equity has ever interfered after a lapse of twenty years, as against adverse possession. Foster v. Hodgson (19 Ves. 185), Germyn v. Best. It may also be questioned whether writs of entry are not within the statute 21 Jac. 1. and therefore barred. Writs of entry are possessory actions; and if so, is there any instance where the entry is taken away? How can entry be taken away without right of possession? A writ of right is barred by 60 years, but this might last 100 years.

For the Respondents: Pickering v. Stamford, Roe v. Acherley, Hindeman v. Taylor (2 Dick. 651) Harwood v. Oglander (6 Ves. 199), Pim v. Goodwin (Post), Bailey v. Sibbald (15 Ves. 185), The Dean and Chapter of Westminster v. Cross (Bunb. 60), and Marston v. Claypole (Ibid. 213) were cited.

In reply it was said: The principle on which the demurrer rests is, that after so great length of time, the Plaintiff has no right to call for equity. Pickering v. Stamford is a case of cestui que trusts. Roe v. Acherley does not apply, because there was no adverse possession or ouster. Harwood v. Oglander was a very peculiar case, and has no relation to the point in question. There was no ouster of the Plaintiff, for one tenant in common cannot oust another: but the question of ouster must have been tried. The Dean and Chapter of Westminster v. Cross (Ibid. 60), and Marston v. Claypole (Ibid. 213), are loose notes of no authority.

The bill prays not merely discovery, but inspection and production of documents also. The Plaintiff in equity must shew not only that it is not against conscience, but that it is agreeable to equity that he should recover. The Plaintiff has no title in equity, and the Defendant has title.

The case stood over for consideration until the 11th of March, 1823, when the Lord Chancellor pronounced a judgment reversing the order by which the demurrer was overruled; ordering that the demurrer should be allowed, and that the deposit should be returned.

[133] The case before the Vice-Chancellor was argued almost wholly upon the question of law upon the statute of Hen. 8.; viz. whether the time elapsed since the death of the settlor was not a bar to the claim. Before the Lord Chancellor, the argument turned principally and almost wholly upon the general question of limitation in equity, and the Lord Chancellor having said at the conclusion of the argument, that the case would require much consideration, a review of all the authorities, and a reference to the principles of a court of equity on the subject of limitation of suits, finally decided the case on the authority of Cholmondeley v. Clinton, which he considered as establishing the rule, that a lapse of twenty years operated generally as a limitation and bar to suits in equity.—Ex. Rel. Mr. J. Walker.

Pim v. Goodwin.

[Mews' Dig. ix. 178.]

The bill was filed in 1806, by Richard Pim, of, etc. labourer, and Anne his wife, William Spencer of Derby, etc. and Mary his wife, and Hannah Proctor of Derby, etc. spinster, stating that Joseph Wainwright, of, etc. in the county of Derby, yeoman, was at the time of his death seised in fee of a close of land called Goodages, situate in Chaddesten, containing about six acres, and then in the occupation of John Goodwin; and being so seised, mortgaged (no date) the close to Elizabeth Edwards, of Derby, widow, then deceased, either in fee or for a long term of years, to secure the principal sum of £70 and interest, or some other small sum of money which J. W. did not pay off in his lifetime, but being entitled to the equity of redemption of the close, and being of sound mind, made and published his will (no date), legally executed and in writing, which in part was the words and figures following: that is to say, "my just debts, etc. being paid, all the residue of my estate, both real and personal, I give, devise, and bequeath unto my wife for her life, hereby giving her full power to give, devise, and dispose of the same to my daughter Anne Wainwright, and my two daughters-in-law, Hannah Newham and Eliz. Newham, in such proportions as my wife shall think proper, but not to any other person, provided they live, all or any of them; and if they shall die before they possess the same, my wife shall have full power to give and devise the same to whom she shall think most convenient." The bill then stated, that Joseph Wain-[134]wright died (no date) without having revoked or altered the will, leaving Elizabeth Wainwright his widow, and Anne, the wife of Benjamin Cockayne, deceased, his only child and heir at law; that Elizabeth Wainwright, soon after the death of the testator, entered upon (no date) and took possession of the mortgaged estate, and for some time continued in the possession thereof, but afterwards delivered up possession to Francis Goodwin, then deceased, who was the son in law of Elizabeth Wainwright; and that it was alleged that Elizabeth Wainwright delivered up possession of the mortgaged estate to Francis Goodwin, in consideration of a provision on his part that he would provide for Elizabeth Wainwright during her life. The will then stated that Elizabeth Wainwright died (no date) without having made any disposition, by devise or otherwise, except as above mentioned, of the mortgaged premises, leaving Anne Cockayne surviving, who thereupon became entitled in possession to the close and premises, subject to the mortgage; that Anne Cockayne afterwards died (no date) intestate in the lifetime of her husband, leaving four daughters, her only children and heirs at law, viz. Hannah, etc.; whereupon the Plaintiffs became entitled to the equity of redemption of the premises as the heirs at law of Anne Cockayne, and also of the testator. The bill then stated that Francis Goodwin, while he was in possession of the mortgaged estate, paid off the principal and interest due upon the mortgage, and procured an assignment of the estate and interest of the mortgagee in the mortgaged premises, and the money due thereon to be made to him, and ever afterwards continued as mortgagee in the possession of the mortgaged estate, and receipt of the rents and profits during his life, and by such means received or might have received more than the amount of the money remaining due for principal and interest upon the mortgage. The bill then stated that Francis Goodwin died in thousand (sic) hundred and (sic), and by his will devised the mortgaged premises, and all his estate and interest therein, to his son Francis Goodwin, the Defendant, whom he appointed sole executor of his will; that the Defendant proved the bill, and became the legal personal representative of his father, and possessed assets sufficient to pay, etc. and entered upon and took possession of the mortgaged estate, and had ever since been and then was in possession and receipt of the rents and profits thereof. The bill then stated applications and requests to the Defendant to reconvey the mortgaged premises, to deliver up the title-deeds relating [135] thereto, and to account, etc. for the rents received, and pay over the balance; the Plaintiff offering to pay any balance which might be found due upon the account.

The bill then charged, that if any conveyance was made to the Defendant or his father, it was made by way of mortgage or assignment of mortgage, as would appear if the Defendant would set forth the contents and dates of any such conveyance or assignment. The bill then, after the usual interrogatories, prayed that the Defendant might set forth the deeds under which he claimed to hold; that an account might be taken of the rents received by the Defendant and his father, that the Plaintiff might be admitted to redeem the mortgage on payment of what (if any thing) should be found due, an account of the assets, etc. and a reconveyance, etc.

Francis Goodwin by his answer said, he believed and admitted it to be true, that J. Wainwright in the complainant's said bill of complaint mentioned, was in his lifetime, and at the time of his death, seised in fee-simple of a certain close called the new close, and situate in Chaddesden, in the county of Derby, containing six acres three roods and eight perches, or thereabouts, and which abuts on the north side thereof on lands belonging to Sir R. Wilmot, Bart.; and on the east side thereof on lands belonging to Mrs. J. Goodwin; and on the south side thereof on lands belonging to Sir R. Wilmot, Bart.; and on the west side thereof on lands belonging to the said Sir R. Wilmot, Bart., and which this Defendant believed was the close or piece of ground in the said complainant's bill meant and intended to be described by the name of the Goodages, and which is now in the occupation of John Goodwin; and that he did not know, except by the said bill, that the said J. W. did ever convey the said estate and premises to Elizabeth Edwards by way of mortgage or otherwise, to secure the sum of £70, or any sum of money. But the said Defendant said, that by indenture, bearing date the 6th day of April, 1759, and made between the said J. W. of the one part, and Francis Goodwin deceased of the other part, and which was duly executed by the said J. W., he the said J. W. in consideration of the sum of £120 to the said J. W. in hand paid by the said Francis Goodwin, the receipt whereof is thereby acknowledged, granted, bargained, sold, demised, leased, set, and to farm let unto the said Francis Goodwin, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the said close or parcel of land, with the appurtenances, to hold the same to the said Francis Goodwin, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the day of [136] the date thereof for the term of 500 years from thence next ensuing, without impeachment of waste, yielding yearly a pepper-corn, if demanded, but subject to a proviso for redemption thereof if the said J. W., his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns should pay or cause to be paid to the said F. G., his executors, administrators, or assigns, the full sum of £120, together with interest for the same, after the rate of £3 10s. per cent. per annum, at and upon the 6th day of October then next; and the Defendant admitted it to be true that the said J. W. did duly make and publish, and legally execute his last will and testament in writing, bearing date the 14th of December, 1743, and that the same was executed and attested as by law is required to pass real estates, and that the same was of such purport and effect as in the said bill set forth, and that he appointed the said Elizabeth his wife sole executrix thereof, who duly proved the same in the proper ecclesiastical court, and that the said J. W. departed this life on or about the 11th day of May, 1761, leaving the said Elizabeth W. his widow, and Ann, the wife of B. Cockayne, his only child and heir at law him surviving, and that he did not alter his said will, and that Elizabeth W. did upon, or soon after the death of the said testator, enter into the possession of or into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said mortgaged estate and premises, and continued in the possession thereof, or in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof until the said F. Goodwin entered into the possession thereof, or into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof as hereinafter mentioned, and that by indenture of feoffment, bearing date the 16th day of February, 1765, and made between the said Elizabeth W. of the one part, and the said F. G. of the other part, and which was duly executed by the said Elizabeth W., the said Elizabeth W., in consideration of the sum of £200 to her paid by the said F. Goodwin, and also in consideration of the sum of £3 per year and every year from the date thereof, to be annually paid to her by the said F. G., his heirs, executors, and administrators, or any of them, during her life, granted, bargained, sold, enfeoffed, and confirmed unto the said F. G., his heirs and assigns, all the said close of land called the New Close, then in the occupation of the said Elizabeth W., with the appurtenances, to hold the same unto the said F. G., his heirs and assigns, to the use of the said F. G., his heirs and assigns for ever: and thereupon livery of seisin of the said close of land was, on the day of the date of the said indenture, delivered to the said F. G., the father, by the said Elizabeth W., and that [137] at or about the time when the said indenture of feoffment bears date the said Francis Goodwin entered into the possession or into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said close or parcel of land, with the appurtenances, and continued in the possession thereof, or into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, until his death, and the Defendant said that the said Elizabeth W. did not to his knowledge, information, or belief, deliver up the possession of the said mortgaged premises to the said F. G. for the reason in the said bill of complaint mentioned, or for any other reason than such as are thereinbefore in that behalf mentioned, although the Defendant admitted that the said F. G. was the son-in-law of the said Elizabeth W., and that the said E. W. did not to his knowledge, information, or belief, ever make any other disposition of the said mortgaged premises than such as thereinbefore mentioned. And the Defendant said that the said Elizabeth W. departed this life on or about the 14th day of March, 1768, and that she left Ann Cockayne, in the said bill mentioned, who was then of the age of thirty-four years, and under no legal disability of claiming the said close and premises, had she been entitled thereto, the only child and heir at law of the said testator J. W., her surviving. But he submitted and insisted that the said Ann Cockayne did not upon the death of the said Elizabeth W. become entitled to the equity of redemption of the said mortgaged premises, the said Elizabeth W. having conveyed the same away in manner aforesaid; but in case no such disposition had been made thereof, nor any other act done by which the right to redeem the said mortgaged premises was extinguished, he submitted whether the said Ann Cockayne would have become entitled to the same, or whether the said Hannah Newham and Elizabeth Newham took any interest in the same under the will of the said J. W. And the Defendant further said that the said Ann Cockayne departed this life in the lifetime of her husband, and for any thing Defendant knew to the contrary, she might die intestate; and he believed that the said Ann Cockayne left Elizabeth Preston, Ann Pim, Mary Spencer, and Hannah Cockayne, her only children, etc. heiresses at law, her surviving; and that the said Elizabeth Preston departed this life at or about the time in the said bill mentioned, intestate, leaving her three sisters, and the said complainant Hannah Preston, her only child and heiress at law, her surviving; and that the said Hannah Cockayne departed this life at or about the 30th of October, 1793, without having been married, and intestate, leaving her said two sisters, the com-[138]-plainants Ann Pim and Mary Spencer, and the complainant Hannah Preston, her surviving; and that the said Elizabeth Preston, Ann Pim, Mary Spencer, and Hannah Cockayne were at the death of their mother, the said Ann Cockayne, as the Defendant believed, all of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, and under no legal disability of claiming the said close and premises had they or any of them been entitled thereto; and that the said complainants were then the sole heiresses at law of the said Ann Cockayne and also of the said testator J. W. But the Defendant humbly submitted that the said complainants were not entitled to the equity of redemption of the said mortgaged premises, for the reasons thereafter mentioned; and the said Defendant said, that the said Francis Goodwin did not, to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, ever procure any other assignment of the said mortgaged premises to be made to him, than the said indentures of mortgage and feoffment herein-before mentioned, which were in the possession or power of the Defendant, but the Defendant submitted and insisted that the said complainants were not entitled to call upon him to produce the same; and the Defendant further said, he verily believed that the said Francis Goodwin duly paid the sums of £80 and £200, the consideration money in the said indentures mentioned, to the said J. W. and Eliz. W. respectively, or as they directed; and he said, that the said Francis Goodwin continued in the possession of the said estate and premises, or in receipt of the rents and profits during his life, and until the time of his death; and that the said F. Goodwin, the father, departed this life on or about the 20th day of November, 1789, and that previously to his death, he duly made and published his last will and testament, bearing date on or about the 9th day of February, 1787, which was duly executed and attested so as to pass real estates, and thereby gave and bequeathed the said mortgaged premises unto his wife Hannah, for and during the term of her natural life; and from and after her decease, he gave and devised the same unto the Defendant, his heirs and assigns for ever; and he thereby appointed his sons, the Defendant and John Goodwin of Chaddesden aforesaid, farmer, joint executors, but the Defendant alone duly proved the said will of his said father in the consistory court of Lichfield and Coventry, and which he believed was the proper ecclesiastical court, and possessed himself of the said testator's personal estate and effects, or of such parts thereof as he had been able; but the Defendant submitted that the said complainants had no right, [139] under the circumstances thereinbefore and thereafter mentioned, to any account of such assets. And the Defendant said, that upon the death of his said father, and the said Hannah his mother, he the Defendant did, under and by virtue of the said will, enter upon and take possession of the said close and premises, and ever since had, and was then, by himself or his tenants, in possession thereof, and in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof; and that the said Hannah, the Defendant's mother, departed this life about a week after the death of his said father, and the Defendant denied that the said complainants had made any such applications and requests to him as in the said bill mentioned; but, in case any such had been made to him, he should not have complied therewith, for he said, the said J. W. had, as he was advised, made liable the whole of his estate and effects to the payment of his debts; and that the said Eliz. W. had, therefore, full power and authority to dispose of the equity of redemption of the said premises, which she accordingly did in manner thereinbefore mentioned; but, in case the said Francis Goodwin had been a mortgagee of the said premises only, yet the said F. G., some time in the year 1765, being upwards of forty years before filing the bill of complaint in this case, entered into the possession, or into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said premises; and that the said F. G. in his life, and the Defendant since his death, had, ever since the said F. G. entered into the possession thereof, or into receipt of the rents and profits thereof, in the year 1765 been in the peaceable and quiet possession thereof, or in the peaceable and quiet receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and having during all such time treated and considered the same as their own estate, of which they were seised in fee-simple, and had never in any manner since the time when possession was taken thereof in the year 1765 as aforesaid, treated or acknowledged the same as a mortgage, or received any sum of money from any person as for principal or interest of the said mortgage, but have received and taken the rents and profits of the said estate for their own use and benefit; that under the circumstances, and after such length of time, he submitted the said complainants were not entitled to such relief as in the said bill prayed, nor to any discovery of the rents and profits of the said premises, or to any production or discovery of the title-deeds or writings relating to the same except as aforesaid; and the Defendant insisted on the statute in that case made and provided, entitled "An Act for Limitations of Actions, and for avoiding Suits at [140] Law," and humbly hoped to have the same benefit thereof as if he had pleaded the same in bar to the said bill of complaint.

The reporter, after the utmost research, has been unable to procure any note of the argument or judgment in the case, if any judgment was ever pronounced. Mr. Barbor, who was solicitor for the Plaintiff, informed the reporter, that the case stood in the paper for judgment from 1812 to 1821, when his client Pim died. Mr. Bell, the king's counsel, has stated to the reporter, that after long hesitation Lord Eldon dismissed the bill in 1823, after the decision of Foster v. Blake in the House of Lords, a case which will be reported hereafter.

Foster v. Blake, D. P. 1823.

[Mews' Dig. ix. 178.]

In this case a mortgage had been made in 1730 of lands belonging to Sir Thomas Blake. In 1733 the mortgage was assigned to Charles Echlin. He in 1737 filed a bill in the Exchequer in Ireland, to obtain the mortgage money by a sale, according to the practice in Ireland, and in 1744 he filed a bill of revivor and supplement. Sir Thomas Blake, by his will in 1748, vested his estate in trustees to raise money by sale or mortgage for the payment of his debts, and subject, etc. he devised his estates to his son Ulick Blake for life, remainder to his issue in tail male; remainder to Thomas Blake for life; remainder to his issue in tail male; remainder to Walter Blake, the father of the Respondent, for life; remainder to his issue, etc. Upon the death of Sir Thomas, the suit of Echlin was revived against Sir Ulick, as heir, taking no notice of the will, which Sir Ulick disputed on the ground that his father was a relapsed Papist. A decree was obtained in 1753, under which the lands were sold as the property of Sir Ulick Blake in fee. After the sale, Walter Blake, the father of the Respondent, applied to the Court for a resale, upon the ground that the estate was sold at an undervalue. Upon the resale, the estate was purchased by a Mr. Kirwan, as trustee for Lady Blake, the wife of Sir Ulick. The money received upon the sale was applied in discharge of incumbrances, and a conveyance was made to Kirwan in the year 1765. Sir Ulick died in 1767, and thereupon Sir Thomas Blake claiming as a remainder-man under the will of the deviser, Sir Thomas filed a bill against Lady Blake, as guardian of the daughter of Sir Ulick, for an account of rents and possession of the estate. Lady Blake, by her answer, claimed the estate as purchaser under the decree.

[141] The suit was not prosecuted, but Sir Thomas filed a bill against Lady Blake in 1768, insisting that she being a Papist could not purchase or hold the estate. In 1772 a compromise was effected between the parties, and a deed executed to carry it into effect.

In the year 1786 a bill was filed to impeach the purchase by Sir Thomas Blake of Bourdeaux, another party claiming by remainder under the will. He died without issue in 1787, and the suit was revived (according to Irish practice at that day) by Walter Blake, the father of the Respondent, claiming as remainder-man under the will. Lady Blake died in 1791, when her daughter, Mrs. Forster, entered upon the estate under a settlement made in 1771. Answers were put in by Lady Blake and Mrs. Forster to the bill of Walter Blake, who took no step in the cause, and died in 1802. Sir John Blake, in 1802, filed an original bill to set aside the sale in 1765 as fraudulent. In this suit a decree was made in 1813 that the bill should be retained, and that Sir John Blake should bring an ejectment to try whether Thomas Blake, the deviser, was competent to make the will of July 1748. In 1817 Sir John Blake obtained leave, by order of Court, to amend his bill, so as to have the benefit of the proceedings of Sir Thomas and Sir Walter Blake in the suits before mentioned. The bill was accordingly amended, and a prayer was added, that the Plaintiff might be at liberty to redeem the mortgage as remainder-man under the will of Sir Thomas Blake, etc. Upon this bill, so amended, a decree was made for redemption, etc. Against this decree an appeal was presented to the House of Lords, and the decree was reversed, principally on the ground of lapse of time.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

HENRY JOHN LORD SELSEY and others,—Appellants; THOMAS
RHOADES,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 262, 428; viii. 861; xiv. 1773. S. C. 2 Sim. and S. 41. Considered in Molony v. Kernan, 1842 2 Dr. and War. 31 at p. 38; and Dunne v. English, 1874, L.R., 18 Eq. 524 at p. 534; and see note to Ward v. Hartpole, 1776, 3 Bli. 470.]

In 1804, A. tenant for life under a settlement with a power to grant leases for twenty-one years, concurred with B, the next tenant for life in an agreement to grant to the steward and solicitor of A. a lease of part of the lands, etc. in settlement for twenty-one years absolute at a rent fixed upon a valuation, which omitted to estimate certain rights of common annexed to the lands, on the alleged ground that those rights were disputed by the copyholders of the manor. In 1809, B, having become tenant for life, on the death of A, executed a lease, according to the agreement.

In 1810, under an Act for inclosure of waste lands, a very large allotment of the waste was made, in respect of the lands leased, the rights of common having been admitted. B died in 1816, when the reversion of the lands, subject to the lease, vested in C, who accepted the rent reserved till 1821, when he filed a bill to set aside the lease.

Held in the Court below, that the transaction was unimpeachable on the ground of fraud. On appeal, held that the [2] relief was barred by acts of confirmation and acquiescence; but whether considering the facts and the relation of the parties the lease might not have been avoided, on the ground of fraud (or mistake,) if the persons interested had questioned the lease recently after the transaction—Quære: semb. affirm.

This was an appeal * against a decree of the Vice Chancellor, dismissing a bill filed by the Appellants, as personal representatives of James Lord Selsey, and by H. J. Lord Selsey, in his own right, as remainder-man under a settlement to set aside a lease granted by James Lord Selsey and Mr. Peachy his son, to the Respondent, he being at the time steward and solicitor of James Lord Selsey.

The bill stated that the Respondent was employed by John Lord Selsey, and afterwards by John Lord Selsey, his son, as steward and receiver of their lands, and also as solicitor or law agent; that, in the course of such employment, he became intimately acquainted with their farms and the rights attached to them; and being so, that he prevailed on James Lord Selsey and Mr. Peachey, his son, (afterwards John Lord Selsey,) to concur in signing an agreement for granting to him a lease for twenty-one years of a farm called Amberley Castle, promising that it should be fairly valued; that a valuation was afterwards made by a Mr. Eager, who fixed the rent to be paid, allowing certain deductions, at a sum of £330 per annum, at which rent a lease was accordingly granted; that the farm was then subject to a lease having two years to run, on the expiration of which the Respondent entered, and James Lord Selsey having died, a lease was granted by John Lord Selsey, according to the agreement, for the residue of the term: that James and John Lords Selsey were successively tenants for life, with a power, under a settlement, of granting leases for twenty-one years, on the usual conditions; that the Appellant H. J. Lord Selsey became entitled, on the death of his father John Lord Selsey, to the premises in question, for term of life, with remainders over, upon such limitations that the whole interest, subject to trusts for issue, vested in the Appellants, who were also the personal representatives of James and John Lords Selsey.

The bill then stated, as facts recently discovered, that a proposal had been made to the Respondent, by the executors of the former tenant, to give £500 a year for Amberley Castle Farm, which was refused by the Respondent, on a false allegation that the farm was disposed of, and that he falsely represented to his employers that such offer was made merely from a sense of disappointment; that upon an inclosure of waste lands in Amberley, under an Act, passed in 1810, four hundred acres of land were allotted to Amberley Castle Farm, a considerable part of which was made in lieu of rights of common appurtenant to the farm; that these rights of common had been altogether omitted by Mr. Eager, in his valuation.

The bill farther alleged, that the Respondent took advantage of his confidential situation, and obtained the lease by misrepresentation, and upon a false valuation of the land; that the agreement for the lease was obtained so long before the expiration of the subsisting lease, for the purpose of preventing competition; that the term of twenty-one years absolute was contrary to the usual mode of letting the land; that the Respondent did not inform Lord Selsey of the offer of £500 a year for the farm; that he knew of the rights of common, and that they [4] were valuable and extensive, and were not included in the valuation; that the tithes of the farm were not valued by Mr. Eager, according to the number of acres, which the Respondent knew, and did not inform James or John Lord Selsey of the fact; that in 1818, upon application of the Appellant H. J. Lord Selsey to be furnished with particulars of the lands comprising his estates, the Respondent described the lands held by him, under the lease, as consisting of five hundred acres, knowing at the time, from plans in his possession, that such lands comprised more than eight hundred acres.

The bill further charged that the rent was inadequate, and prayed that the lease might be declared fraudulent and void, and that the Respondent might be charged with a fair occupation rent, during the period of his possession.

In his answer to this bill, the Respondent stated, that the former tenant of the farm having died without children, there was no tenant having a preference; that he applied, in Sept. 1803, to have the lease for a son under age of infirm health, and with a view that he should have a term of fourteen years from the time of his coming of age; that Mr. Eager was chosen by the lessors to survey the farm, and did not know who was to be the tenant, at the time of his valuation; that there were undisputed rights of common attached to certain small portions of the lands, and claims to right of common over extensive wastes, which were disputed by the copyholders of the manor, who exercised or claimed rights of common, without stint, over all the wastes; that these claims and rights as well as the tithe lands, were considered and estimated by the surveyor in his valuation, and the lessors were fully informed of all the [5] circumstances of the farm; that the trustees under the will of the former tenant, offered to James Lord Selsey £500 per annum for the farm, upon a renewal of the lease, but that they knew, at the time of the offer, that the lessor was bound by the agreement with the Respondent; that James Lord Selsey questioned Mr. Eager as to the difference between his valuation and this offer, and was satisfied that the offer was not made bonâ fide, and was no proof of the real value; that the Respondent nevertheless offered to give up the agreement for a lease, and have the farm revalued, which offer was declined by James Lord Selsey, who declared he was satisfied with the valuation of Mr. Eager, and continued to employ him as a valuer; that the Respondent had expended large sums in the improvement and stocking of the farm; that the first proposal for inclosure, in 1805, was abandoned in consequence of the opposition of James Lord Selsey and the Respondent, who thought it would not be beneficial to Amberley Farm; that in 1810, upon a renewed proposal of inclosure, a discussion took place as to the right of common, which, after much difficulty, was admitted by the copyholders to be in the Lord, and two hundred and eighty-six acres were allotted in respect of the lands held under the lease; that the Respondent expended large sums of money in the cultivation of the allotments, being open down, rough and unproductive lands; that James Lord Selsey died in 1808, and John Lord Selsey, who succeeded him, executed the lease, in 1809, according to the agreement, and died in 1816; that both James and John Lords Selsey lived in the neighbourhood of the farm, and were active and attentive to their interests; that the Appellant succeeding to John Lord Selsey, in 1816, [6] inspected the property, acted upon the lease, and accepted the rent reserved until 1821, when differences arose between him and the Respondent upon other subjects.

The points made by the answer were generally sustained by the depositions in the cause, and some of the passages of the answer being read by the Plaintiffs, on the hearing of the cause, became evidence for the Defendant; but it appeared that the rights of common were not noticed by Mr. Eager in his valuation, and he deposed in chief and upon cross examination, that it is usual to mention in the return (valuation) rights of common, when valuable, but not when they are insignificant or small in comparison with the value of the farm. Upon cross examination, he further deposed, that he omitted to specify the rights of common in his valuation, because he was informed by Joseph Foster (the bailiff of the farm) and other persons in the parish of Amberley, that the common rights were but of little value, inasmuch as the commons were stocked and eaten up by persons, many of whom had no right whatever. In his deposition to one of the interrogatories, he said he had reason to believe, that in the year 1805, John Lord Selsey was aware that some common rights belonged to Amberley Castle Farm; but whether or not he knew the extent or particulars of such common rights he could not say.

Joseph Florance, a surveyor, deposed, that the rights of common claimed for Amberley Castle Farm, were disputed by the copyholders, but that upon a discussion, at a meeting before the commissioners of inclosure, the copyholders were advised by their solicitor, that Amberley Castle Farm had gained a right to share in the commons, according to the value of the [7] farm. The encroachments on the common by strangers, and the dispute as to the right of Amberley Castle Farm, were proved by other witnesses. An agreement, between John Lord Selsey, the Respondents, and others, as to the costs of inclosure, and the proportions in which they were to be borne by the several parties, was produced, and it was proved that John Lord Selsey and the Respondent acted upon that agreement. Various accounts between James and John Lords Selsey and the Appellant H. J. Lord Selsey, containing entries as to the expenses of the inclosures, were also produced and proved. With respect to the offer made by the representatives of the former tenant, before the expiration of the lease, the evidence was contradictory as to the circumstances. Some points, not distinctly put in issue by the bill, were introduced, on behalf of the Plaintiff, on the hearing, particularly whether the lease was not void, as exceeding the power, but that was considered (if put in issue) to be a question at law.

The Vice Chancellor, upon argument of the case, was of opinion, that the principal having been fully informed of all the circumstances under which the lease was granted, it was valid, although the lessee was his agent and solicitor, inasmuch as no rule of equity prevented a lord from granting a lease of land to his steward, from motives of bounty, or from mixed motives of bounty and a money consideration, provided the principal had all the information necessary to enable him to measure the extent of his bounty. With respect to the omission of the rights of common, in the valuation of Mr. Eager, he was of opinion that the Respondent, having no other means of knowledge than Mr. Eager, the valuer chosen by [8] Lord Selsey, could not be chargeable with fraudulent suppression so as to affect the lease; and by the decree the bill was dismissed with costs. Against this decree the Appeal was presented.

The case was argued for the Appellants by Mr. Horne and Mr. Sugden.

For the Respondents by Mr. Heald and Mr. Pepys.

26th Feb. 1827. The Lord Chancellor: I have looked into this case, with a desire to affect the lease; for the situation of the parties was such as to induce a Court of Equity to look at the transaction with great suspicion. If the suit had been instituted recently after the contract, and there had been no acts of confirmation, probably the lease might not have stood; but James Lord Selsey and John Lord Selsey acquiesced so long, being well acquainted with the facts, that it is difficult to say that they could have impeached the lease, and the Appellant H. J. Lord Selsey cannot do that which they could not have done. We cannot set aside the lease, upon the grounds stated in the pleadings. There is a ground upon which the lease might have been set aside; but the parties have not gone upon that ground, and we cannot set aside the lease upon grounds on which they did not proceed. This is not a case for costs of the appeal. I should not have given costs in the Court below.

26th Feb. 1827. Decree affirmed, without costs.

COURT OF CHANCERY, ENGLAND.

THOMAS WALKER, THOMAS ANDREW the Younger, and GEORGE ANDREW,—

Appellants: The WARDEN and FELLOWS of the COLLEGE of CHRIST, in Manchester, in the County of Lancaster, and WILLIAM JOULE.—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. iv. 636.]

The Members of a corporation having filed an original bill in their individual names, but stating their corporate character, upon an abatement of their suit, file a bill of revivor in their corporate name only. A demurrer for want of privity between the plaintiffs in the original bill and the bill of revivor was overruled in the Court below and on appeal.

The Respondents, by the description of the Reverend Thomas Blackburne, Doctor of Laws, Warden of the College of Christ, in Manchester, in the county of Lancaster, founded by King Charles the First; the Reverend James Bayley, clerk; the Reverend John Griffith, clerk; the Reverend John Gatliff, clerk; and the Reverend Charles Wickstead Ethelston, clerk; the Fellows of the said College, and also the said William Joule, on the 24th day of April, 1806, filed their bill in Chancery against Thomas Jepson, Thomas Dewsbury, Thomas Foster, James Dean, Thomas Roberts, Samuel Taylor, John Cheetham the elder, Thomas Andrew, Thomas Walker, and Margaret Chorlton, stating that the said [10] Thomas Blackburne was in and prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and four, and had ever since been, and then was the Warden of the said College, and the said James Bayley, John Griffith, John Gatliff, and Charles Wickstead Ethelston, were in and prior to the said year one thousand eight hundred and four, and had ever since been, and then were all the Fellows of the said College, and were as such, Warden and Fellows, in and prior to the said year one thousand eight hundred and four, and still were seized or lawfully entitled to them and their successors, Warden and Fellows of the same College of or to the Rectory of Manchester in the county of Lancaster, and that they or their lessee or lessees were in and prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and four, and had ever since been, and then were lawfully entitled to all the tithes, both great and small, arising within the parish of Manchester aforesaid, and the titheable places thereof, and to all Easter offerings, and other dues which became due and payable from the several inhabitants of the said parish of Manchester, and the titheable places thereof. That the said Thomas Blackburne, James Bayley, John Griffith, John Gatliff, and Charles Wickstead Ethelston, as Warden and Fellows of the said College by an indenture duly executed under the common seal of the said College dated 25th December, 1804, and made between the said Warden and Fellows of the one part, and the said William Joule of the other part, did in consideration of the rent and the performance of the covenants therein mentioned, demise, grant, and set unto the said William Joule, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all and singular the tithes, both great and small, together with the offerings [11] usually called Easter offerings, and other offerings, oblations, mortuaries, and all other customary dues and payments arising or to arise, or become due or payable to the said Warden and Fellows, or their successors, during the term thereby demised, from any person or persons whomsoever, occupiers of lands or premises, or inhabitants within the twenty-three townships, precincts, or hamlets therein mentioned, and every of them, and of and from all and every the messuages, tenements, lands and hereditaments, situate within the said several townships, precincts or hamlets, in the said parish of Manchester, or otherwise in respect thereof, to have, receive, take, and enjoy the same, unto the said William Joule, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the date thereof, for and during the term of twenty-one years thence next ensuing, paying, therefore, during the said term, unto the said Warden and Fellows of the said College, and their successors Warden and Fellows of the said College, the yearly rent therein mentioned; That a counter-part of the said lease was duly executed by the said William Joule, and he by virtue of the said indenture became, and had ever since the said 25th day of December, 1804, been entitled to all the tithes, both great and small, arising within the several townships, precincts and hamlets, in the said parish of Manchester, mentioned in the said lease, in kind, and such tithes, and all Easter offerings, and other dues and emoluments, arising, or becoming payable from the inhabitants or others within the said townships, or the titheable places thereof, ought to have been paid and answered to the said William Joule accordingly. That the said Thomas Jepson, Thomas Dewsbury, Thomas Foster, James Dean, Thomas [12] Roberts, Samuel Taylor, John Cheetham, Thomas Andrew, Thomas Walker, and Margaret Chorlton, had, ever since the said 25th day of December, 1804, occupied farms and lands within the said townships, or some of them, and in the said year 1805, previous to the separation of the said tithes, had had notice given by or on behalf of the said William Joule, to set out, yield, and pay unto him, the said William Joule, who would take the same in kind, the tithes of the several titheable matters arising and growing upon their farms and lands respectively, but which they had declined to do or to pay, or make him, the said William Joule, any satisfaction for the same, and for the said Easter offerings and other dues, and praying that the said Thomas Jepson, Thomas Dewsbury, Thomas Foster, James Dean, Thomas Roberts, Samuel Taylor, John Cheetham, Thomas Andrew, Thomas Walker, and Margaret Chorlton, might set forth the particular quantities and values of the said tithes, and might account with the said William Joule, or with the Plaintiffs in the said cause, for the single value of the said tithes, and the said Easter offerings and other dues, and might be decreed to pay to him or them, what should appear to be due or owing to him or them from the Defendants respectively on the taking of the said accounts, and for further relief.

To this bill Thomas Jepson, Thomas Dewsbury, Thomas Foster, James Dean, Thomas Roberts, Samuel Taylor, John Cheetham, Thomas Andrew, Thomas Walker, and Margaret Chorlton, appeared and put in their answers, and replication having been filed, a great number of witnesses were examined, as well on the part of the Plaintiffs as of the Defendants, and the cause afterwards came on to be [13] heard before Sir William Grant, then Master of the Rolls, who on the 3d day of August, 1810, pronounced a decree therein, dismissing the bill as to some of the tithes claimed, and directing issues as to others.

Against this decree, the Defendants presented a petition to rehear the cause, and the same was accordingly reheard, and on the 10th day of August, 1813, affirmed.

From the decree so affirmed, the Defendants appealed to the Lord Chancellor, and the Plaintiffs in the cause also appealed against some parts of the decree, which appeals were afterwards heard by the Lord Chancellor, who made an order thereon, dated the 25th day of June, 1818, partly reversing and partly affirming the decree.

Subsequent to the date of the last-mentioned order, the suit abated by the deaths of the Defendants, Thomas Andrew, Samuel Taylor, and Thomas Walker, whereupon the Respondents not describing themselves individually but suing in their corporate character only as the Warden and Fellows of the College, and William Joule, on the 27th day of November, 1823, filed their bill of revivor and supplement against Thomas Walker, as the administrator of the said Thomas Walker deceased: against Thomas Hutchinson, George Hutchinson, and Edmund Yates, as the executors of Samuel

Taylor, and against Thomas Andrew the younger, George Andrew, and Littlewood Andrew, as the executors of Thomas Andrew, praying that the suit and proceedings might be revived, and that the Plaintiffs in the bill of revivor and supplement, might have the same relief against the Defendants thereto, as the last-mentioned Plaintiffs were entitled to against Thomas Walker deceased, Thomas Andrew, [14] and Samuel Taylor, at the respective times of their death, and requiring the Defendants to the bill of revivor and supplement, to admit assets of the several persons to whom they were respectively representatives, to answer the demands made against them in the suit. To this bill of revivor and supplement all the Defendants thereto demurred, and for cause alleged, that it did not appear by the bill that the complainants, the Warden and Fellows of the College of Christ, in Manchester, in the County of Lancaster, founded by King Charles the First, were entitled to have the suit, and proceedings in the bill of revivor mentioned, revived against the Defendants thereto, or any of them, or to have any relief in the said Court against them, or any of them, and for that the Reverend Thomas Blackburn, the Rev. James Bayley, clerk; the Reverend John Griffith, clerk; the Reverend John Gatliff, clerk; and the Reverend Charles Wickstead Ethelston, clerk; five of the complainants named in the original bill of complaint in the said bill of revivor mentioned, and who all appeared by the said bill of revivor, to have been, and to be parties interested in the said suit and proceedings, were not, nor was any of them parties, or a party to the bill of revivor.

The Demurrer having been argued before the Lord Chancellor, by an order dated on the 5th day of February, 1824, was over-ruled. From this order Thomas Walker, Thomas Andrew the younger, and George Andrew, appealed to the House of Lords.

For the Appellants it was argued, that the original bill was filed by certain plaintiffs in their individual capacity, seeking relief on the subject of the rights mentioned in the original bill, and the bill purporting to be a bill of revivor, is a bill filed by the [15] Respondent, William Joule, and the Respondents the Warden and Fellows of the College, who are a body corporate, and according to the practice and principles of a Court of Equity, there is no such privity of character or title between the individuals who are the Plaintiffs in the original suit or any of them, and the body corporate as will entitle the body corporate to revive the original suit; that Blackburn, Bayley, Griffith, Gatliff, and Ethelston, Plaintiffs in the original bill, who by the bill of revivor appear to have been and to be parties interested in the suit and proceedings, are not parties to the bill of revivor.

For the Respondents it was argued, that the original bill was filed on the behalf of the Warden and Fellows of the College of Christ, in Manchester, who are a corporate body, and of William Joule their lessee, and although the names of the then Warden and Fellows are inserted in the said bill, yet it is evident that the bill was not filed by the then Warden and Fellows as individuals, but in their corporate capacity; that it was not necessary to have inserted the names of the then Warden and Fellows in the original bill, and that it was not necessary to insert the names of the Warden and Fellows in the bill of revivor and supplement.

That the Plaintiff, William Joule, as lessee of the Warden and Fellows of the said College, would have been entitled alone, and without the Warden and Fellows, to have filed the bill of revivor and supplement against the Defendants thereto.

For the Appellants: Mr. Hart, Mr. Duckworth.

For the Respondents: Mr. Agar, Mr. Parker.

On the 26th of February, the Lord Chancellor, in [16] moving the judgment, said that the naming of individuals while the proceeding purports to be in the corporate character and the corporate names are added, is mere surplusage; that the appeal was apparently brought for delay, and therefore costs should be given, but as the Respondents introduced the surplusage on the record that the costs should be moderate.

Decree affirmed, with £50 costs.

ENGLAND.

(ON AN APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY.)

THE BAILIFFS, BURGESSES, and COMMONALTY, of the Town or Borough of Ludlow, in the County of Salop, and the Right Honourable EDWARD EARL of POWIS.—Appellants: RICHARD GREENHOUSE, (since deceased) JOHN COLEMAN, JOHN HICKMAN, RICHARD GARDNER, ROBERT TENCH, RICHARD TAYLOR, JOHN STEPHENS, and EDWARD POWELL.—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. iii. 228: S. C. sub nom. ex parte Greenhouse, 1 Madd. 92. The cases as to the scope of 52 Geo. III. c. 101 (Romilly's Act), are collected in a note to In re Hall's Charity, 1851, 14 Beav. at p. 120; see also In re Manchester New College, 1853, 16 Beav. at p. 617; A. G. v. Earl of Devon, 1846, 15 Sim. at p. 261; In re Dean Clarke's Charity, 1836, 8 Sim. at p. 42; A. G. v. Dublin (Mayor of), 1827, 1 Bli. N. S. 312, at p. 335.]

A. having purchased an ancient chapel with a parcel of ground adjoining, devises it by a will dated in 1590, together with certain messuages, etc., in trust to complete the building of certain almshouses which he had commenced on the ground near the chapel, and to apply the rents of the messuages, etc., to the support of four poor people, with directions for keeping up the chapel and appointing a minister, chiefly for the benefit of the almshouses; but partly also for any other persons who might think fit to attend the service. In 1769, the chapel having fallen into decay, is conveyed, together with the piece of ground, the almshouses, and the messuages, etc., by the heir of the surviving trustee to the Corporation of Ludlow, who in 1771 pull down the chapel, convert the materials to other purposes, and grant leases of the piece of ground near the chapel, upon which houses are built.

Held (reversing the decision of the inferior court), that this is not a case within the jurisdiction of the court under the enactments of the 52 Geo. III. c. 101.

The operation of the Act is confined to the simple cases of a clear breach of trust. In cases of breach of trust, courts of equity may decree an account of all the profits made; but (Semb.) they cannot award damages, (i.e.) compensation for damage done to the trust property.

The Attorney General having signed and allowed a petition under the Act, is at liberty to appear for the Respondents to argue their case.

[18] A person cannot present or join in a petition of appeal, although he may have an interest in the question, unless he was (or represents) a party in the matter in the Court below.

There cannot be a prospective order to pay costs, as of proceedings to be had before the Master. The question as to such costs ought always to be reserved.

Charles Foxe, being seized to him and his heirs of an ancient Chapel called Saint Leonard's Chapel, standing without the walls of the town of Ludlow, and of a piece of ground near the chapel, and other hereditaments, by his will, bearing date the 12th day of October, 1590, expressed himself in relation to the said chapel of Saint Leonard, Almshouses, and premises, in these words:—(viz.)

"Whereas I have lately began a foundation to erect four almshouses or chambers upon a parcel of ground near the chapel of Saint Leonard, in Corve-street, in Ludlow, in the said County of Salop, which ground, together with the said chapel, I lately purchased to me and mine heirs, of one _____ for the relief and maintenance of four poor and impotent persons to be there from time to time kept and relieved; my will, intent and meaning is, that if I shall happen to decease out of this mortal life at any time before the said almshouses be thoroughly finished and erected, then mine executors, with so much of the rents, issues, revenues, and profits of my mortgaged lands and the sums of money thereupon and in redemption thereof due, shall build up and finish the same in as short time as conveniently they may, according to the plot or foundation there already begun, and for and towards the relief and maintenance of the said four poor persons, as also for divine service to be had and maintained, as shall [19] be hereafter appointed within the said chapel of Saint Leonard. I do give and bequeath unto Edward Foxe, my brother, and Edmund Foxe, my son, two of the executors of my last will and testament and to their heirs and assigns for ever, all those four messuages or burgages, and all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, with their appurtenances, etc. in the city of Worcester and suburbs thereof, etc. being now of the rent or value of £8 by the year; upon condition and to the end that the said Edward and Edmund or their heirs shall within the space of three years next after my decease (if in my life time the same be not to those uses by me conveyed and assured) by their sufficient deed lawfully and duly executed enfeoff some three, four or more of my next name and kindred of my body descending; and in default of them some others with them and their heirs, of and in the said messuages, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, and hereditaments in Worcester aforesaid, and suburbs thereof; to the uses and intents hereinafter limited and appointed—viz., That he or they to whom such feoffment shall be made, and their heirs, shall stand seized of the same lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and out of the rents, issues, and profits thereof from time to time shall yearly pay unto the said four poor or impotent persons for the time being that shall be placed or allowed in the said new hospital or almshouse, £4 to be equally divided between them quarterly in four terms or times in the year; and moreover, shall yearly pay unto the curate or chaplain of Ludlow for the time being, or to some other sufficient chaplain or minister, to read and say to the poor there divine service at certain times [20] in the week, as shall be appointed, 40s., and shall also pay and give yearly unto some sufficient and learned preacher, for a sermon to be made and preached in the said Chapel of Saint Leonard's yearly, at some convenient time within the feast of Christmas, 6s. 8d., and other 6s. 8d. for a like sermon to be made and preached in the said chapel yearly in the time of Lent, for the better edifying and instructing of the said poor and such other people as shall then resort thither. And touching the residue of the said rents of the premises shall remain and be employed as and for the necessary repairing the said almshouses and chapel of Saint Leonard's from time to time, as need and occasion shall require; and for levying and gathering the said rents yearly and other necessary charges. And that the said feoffees and their heirs and the survivors and survivor of them shall yearly make account unto the churchwardens of Bromfield, how the profits and revenues thereof have been defrayed, and what surplusage remaineth to pay and deliver unto the churchwardens of Bromfield aforesaid, and their order to be taken how the said surplus if any be shall be employed and bestowed, by the advice of the Vicar of Bromfield aforesaid for the time being. And I give also two bells which I have in my sollar at Bromfield, to be hanged up in the steeple of the said chapel to ring into service when any is there said, and there to remain for evermore."

The testator died shortly after the date of the will, leaving Charles Foxe, of Bromfield, his heir at law, and Edward Foxe and Edmund Foxe proved, and took upon themselves the execution of the will.

By Indenture of the 2nd April 1593, between [21] Edward Foxe and Edmund Foxe (executors of the testator) of the first part, Charles Foxe son and heir at law of the testator, Roger Foxe, Richard Foxe, and Francis Foxe, the three sons of the last named Charles Foxe, of the second part; Edward Foxe and Henry Foxe, younger sons of the testator, of the third part; and Charles Foxe, son and heir apparent of Edmund Foxe, of the fourth part. The first-mentioned Edward and Edmund Foxe, in performance of the will of the testator, granted, enfeoffed, and confirmed unto the several parties of the second, third, and fourth parts, together with the said burgages in the city of Worcester, all those messuages, lands, and tenements, with the appurtenances, situate in or near Ludlow, near to the chapel of Saint Leonard, in a street there called Corves-street, on which the testator in his life time erected four almshouses, for four poor impotent and needy persons to be therein maintained and relieved for ever; and also the said chapel of Saint Leonard, and the land, ground, and soyle of the same messuages, lands, tenements, and chapel, and all other houses, etc. of the said testator, by the testator devised or assured unto his executors for the use benefit and relief of four poor impotent persons, to hold the same unto the several parties thereto of the second, third, and fourth parts, their heirs and assigns for ever, upon trust nevertheless, that they and the survivors and survivor and his and their heirs should perform, fulfil and accomplish all and singular the articles, orders, and ordinances mentioned in the schedule quadripartite indented thereunto annexed, and according to the true intent and meaning of the same, and of the now reciting indenture."

Henry Foxe the surviving trustee named in the indenture of the 2d of April, 1593, by indenture, dated the 8th of February, 1640, conveyed and assured the almshouses, messuages, chapel, and premises, unto and to the use of Somerset Foxe the elder, Edward Foxe, Richard Foxe, John Foxe, and Ralph Foxe and Somerset Foxe, of Cainham and Henry Foxe, and their heirs and assigns, in trust for the charitable uses and purposes in the indenture of the 2nd of April, 1593, and the ordinances mentioned.

Somerset Foxe and Henry Foxe being the surviving trustees named in the last mentioned indenture, by indenture of the 1st of October, 1684, made between Somerset Foxe and Henry Foxe on the one part, and Charles Foxe of Westminster, Chesterton Foxe, Henry Foxe of Reteskin, Francis Foxe, Edward Foxe, Matthias Foxe, John Foxe, and Charles Foxe of Ludlow, of the other part; after reciting the testator's will and the indentures and ordinances of the 2d of April, 1593, and the last mentioned indenture, and also reciting that the chapel was then lately re-edified at the sole costs of Somerset Foxe (party thereto): it was witnessed, and Somerset Foxe and Henry Foxe, for the continuance and preservation of the charitable work so founded by the testator, and for other good and valuable considerations, gave, [29] granted, enfeoffed, and confirmed the premises unto Charles Foxe of Westminster, Chesterton Foxe, Henry Foxe of Reteskin, Francis Foxe, Edward Foxe, Matthias Foxe, John Foxe, and Charles Foxe of Ludlow and the survivor and the heirs and assigns of the survivor for ever: upon trust and confidence that they, and the survivor and the heirs and assigns of such survivor should and would from time to time dispose of the said premises, and employ the rents and profits thereof according to the charitable intention of the testator mentioned and comprised in the articles of the 2d of April, 1593, a copy whereof was unto the now reciting indenture annexed.

Henry Foxe of Reteskin having survived his co-trustees named in the last mentioned indenture, died about the year 1726, leaving Henry Foxe, then of Leominster, his eldest son and heir at law, who died intestate, leaving James Foxe, his brother, and heir at law.

By a deed of feoffment, dated the 10th day of April 1769, and made between James Foxe, brother and heir of Henry Foxe, and also grandson and heir at law of Henry Foxe of Reteskin, who at his death was the only surviving trustee for the charity, of the one part, and the Bailiffs, etc. of Ludlow, of the other part: after reciting the indenture of the 2d of April 1593, and the articles and ordinances of the same date, the indenture of the 8th day of February 1640, the will of Charles Foxe; and that under the indenture of the 2d of April 1593, the premises at Worcester, almshouses, and chapel of Saint Leonards, became vested in the before-mentioned feoffees, the said Henry Foxe and others, who were since dead, and also reciting the indenture of the 1st day of October 1684: and that all the trustees, named [30] in that indenture, had long been dead: that Henry Foxe, of Reteskin, was the surviving trustee: but died about the year 1726, leaving only two grandchildren, both infants, viz. Henry Foxe, brother of James Foxe, and the said James Foxe party thereto, and the said Henry Foxe and James Foxe, the grandsons of Henry Foxe of Reteskin, being infants at the time of the decease of Henry Foxe, their grandfather, and their own father dying before their grandfather, the said infants were brought up in parts beyond the seas: and the charity during their infancy, became neglected, and the chapel went greatly to decay, as did also the four messuages and burgages, in the city of Worcester; and also reciting, that Henry Foxe, deceased, the brother of James Foxe, party thereto, upon his attaining the age of twenty-one years, and coming into England, and being informed that the said trust was then become vested in him, and that the occupiers of the premises in Worcester (who were in low circumstances) set up a right to the same, caused application to be made to such persons for the possession of the premises, in the city of Worcester, or that they would attorn tenants to him for the use of the charity; which being refused, Henry Foxe caused a suit in ejectment to be brought on his demise in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench, and obtained a verdict upon the trial thereof at Worcester assizes, some time in or about the year 1751; and also, soon afterwards, obtained one other verdict at the assizes held for the county of Salop, for recovering possession of the almshouses or almshouse in Ludlow; and also reciting, that the four houses or burgages, in the city of Worcester, belonging to the charity, and so recovered by [31] Henry Foxe, being gone so ruinous and decayed, were incapable of repair: and therefore, for the making the best advantage thereof, for the use of the charity, Henry Foxe, granted building leases thereof, at the ground rents, and under the several leases therein more particularly mentioned and described. And also reciting, that the four several messuages, tofts, or burgages, and premises, having been so recovered and demised by Henry Foxe, he from the rents and profits of the same, caused the almshouses, in Ludlow, to be repaired, and paid and maintained four poor needy and indigent women therein, until the day of his death, which happened in or about the month of May 1762; upon whose death the trust, vested in James Foxe, as being the only brother of Henry Foxe, and the only grandson and heir of Henry Foxe of Reteskin, the surviving trustee named in the indenture of release of the 1st day of October 1681; and also reciting, that since the decease of Henry Foxe, brother to James Foxe, the said James Foxe had caused the rents of the houses to be received, and had paid and maintained four poor and indigent women within the almshouses; but the chapel called St. Leonard's chapel, in Ludlow, and near adjoining to the almshouses, was many years before the last named Henry Foxe's coming to England, and had been ever since, in a decayed and ruinous state and condition, and there being then not known to be living any person or persons of the name and kin of Charles Foxe, the testator, whereby to fill up a sufficient number of trustees or feoffees of that family, for the continuing and perpetuating the charity, and James Foxe living remote from the premises, had, on application from the bailiffs and commonalty of the town of Ludlow, [32] and on their agreeing to make an order of their council or chambers for affixing their common seal to one part of the now stating indenture, and accepting the trust according to the grant therein made thereof, agreed as far as in him lay, to vest the said chapel, almshouses, and the said messuages or tofts at Worcester and premises, and the trusts thereof, in them the said bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty, and their successors for ever, upon the trusts and ordinances before mentioned relating to the same, and that the said James Foxe had to the now reciting indenture annexed an account of the receipt and application of the rents and profits of the said premises from the time his brother Henry Foxe recovered the said four messuages or tofts at Worcester as before mentioned to the day of the date thereof, It was witnessed that for continuing and perpetuating of the charitable work founded by Charles Foxe, and for the establishing a sufficient number of trustees and feoffees for performance of the charity, and for other good causes thereunto moving, he the said James Foxe did, as trustee, and as far as he lawfully could give, grant, bargain, sell, infeoff, release, and confirm unto the bailiffs, etc. of Ludlow, and their successors for ever, all the aforesaid messuages, lands, and tenements, with the appurtenances situate near to the chapel of St. Leonard, and also the said chapel of Saint Leonards, and the land, soil, and ground of the same messuages or almshouses, and chapel thereunto belonging, and also all those several messuages and premises, in the city of Worcester, and demised by Henry Foxe, brother of James Foxe, for the use of the charity, in and by the several indentures of lease thereinbefore mentioned, to hold subject to those indentures of lease unto [33] the bailiffs, etc. and their successors for ever in trust, and to and for the support of the said almshouses and four poor, needy, and indigent persons, to be paid, kept, and maintained therein, from the rents and profits of the said premises according to the original intention of the said charity, such persons to be thereafter nominated and chosen of the parishes of Ludlow and Bromfield, or one of them by the majority of the bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty for the time being, and for the other charitable uses and purposes set forth in the said recited indentures, articles, and ordinances relating to the said charity: and the bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty for themselves, and their successors, covenanted and agreed with James Foxe, his heirs, executors, and administrators, that they the bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty, and their successors, should from time to time for ever thereafter save harmless and indemnified the said James Foxe, his heirs, executors, and administrators, from and against all costs, charges, and damages which should happen or be occasioned to him or them, by means, or on account of his granting or conveying the premises thereby granted or conveyed unto the bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty, or their successors, on the trusts, and in manner therein mentioned.

Upon this indenture of feoffment livery of seisin was indorsed.

By lease and release dated the 7th and 8th of October 1771, the release being made between James Foxe of the one part, and the bailiffs, burgesses and the commonalty of Ludlow of the other part, reciting the indentures and articles of the 2nd of April 1593, of the 8th of February 1610, and of the 1st of October 1648, it was wit-[34]-nessed that for continuing and perpetuating the charitable work founded by the testator and for establishing a sufficient number of trustees for the performance of the charity and in consideration of ten shillings James Foxe as trustee and as much as in him lay, granted, released, and confirmed unto the said bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty and their successors and assigns for ever the said almshouses, chapel, and premises by the description therein mentioned. To hold the same unto and to the use of the bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty and their successors for ever, In trust for the support of the almshouses and four poor, needy, and indigent persons to be paid, kept, and maintained therein from the rents and profits of the premises according to the original intent of the charity, such persons to be thereafter mentioned and chosen of the parishes of Ludlow and Bromfield or one of them by the bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty or the major part of them. And for such other charitable uses and purposes set forth in the therein recited articles and ordinances relating to the said charity as were then existing and capable of taking effect:—And the indenture contained a similar covenant on the part of the said corporation to indemnify James Foxe, his heirs, executors, and administrators—and a declaration that James Foxe had deposited with the corporation for safe custody the several indentures, articles, and ordinances in or by the now reciting indenture mentioned or recited.

On the 8th of July 1815, The Respondents presented their petition to the Lord Chancellor whereby after stating that the testator Charles Foxe was entitled to the chapel, burial ground and almshouses, and [35] reciting the will of the testator, the indentures and ordinances of the 2d of April 1593, the indenture of the 1st of October 1684, and indentures of lease and release of the 7th and 8th of October 1771, and that the stipend of the minister of the chapel for the time being had been augmented by various other persons who had granted certain endowments thereunto payable for ever and which consisted of an annual payment of one pound out of a certain estate situate in Ludford, an annual payment of one pound out of a certain estate situate in the parish of Ashford Bowdler, the annual sum of fourteen shillings out of certain leasows called chapell leasows, and the annual sum of twelve shillings out of three houses situate in Dinham, which several sums passed to the corporation by the indenture of the 8th of October 1771, and that upon the execution of that indenture the corporation entered upon and took possession of the chapel almshouses and all other the messuages lands and premises belonging to the charity and into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof and had ever since continued to hold the charity premises, but that in the year 1773, the corporation caused the chapel to be pulled down and destroyed contrary to the trusts reposed in them, and without any faculty from the ordinary of the diocese or any other authority for so doing, and that they sold or applied to some other building all the timber and the materials thereof and received the produce arising from such sale amounting to a considerable sum but that they did not apply such produce to the purposes and upon the trusts of the charity, and that soon after such sale the corporation granted a lease of the scite of the chapel and the chapel-yard adjoining to a member of the corpo-[36]-ration, for a term of ninety-nine years at the low and inadequate rent of £1 15s. per annum, and that since the demolition of the chapel the proprietor of the estate in the parish of Ludford had refused to pay the annual sum of £1 on the ground that there being no chapel existing the rent charge for the minister thereof could not be claimed or demanded, and further stating that during the time when the chapel stood many of the parishioners of the parish of St. Lawrence (in which parish the chapel was situate) used to resort thereto for the purpose of attending divine service and that the ceremony of baptism and burial was frequently performed there, but that since the chapel had been pulled down and the scite thereof and the yard adjoining let, the parishioners had been deprived of the benefit and all opportunity of resorting thereto, and had been prevented from using the chapel yard for the purposes of burials, which was attended with great inconvenience to the parish, as the burying ground belonging to the church of Saint Lawrence (which was the only burying ground in the parish) was infinitely too small for the purposes of burial in the parish, and that the bodies of deceased persons were constantly taken up before they ought to be in order to receive the bodies of others, and that the corporation had constantly elected poor persons of the town of Ludlow to fill up the vacancies which had occurred in the almshouses and had not elected any poor persons from the said parish of Bromfield (except in one instance) since the trusts came under their management, and that the trusts of the charity had been in numerous other instances mismanaged and neglected: and that when the chapel was kept in repair there was an excellent pulpit, and many good [37] pews therein, and a very large congregation always attended divine service there, and that when the same was going into decay several of the inhabitants of Ludlow were about to make a subscription for the repairs thereof, which was opposed by the Rev. Thomas Rocke, then rector of Ludlow, who stated that he should be deprived of some Easter dues, if the chapel was repaired: the fact being that the rector of Ludlow had a small glebe but chiefly depended for his income on his Easter dues:—and further stating, that at the time when the chapel was pulled down in the year 1773, the bell belonging to it was removed to the market cross of the town of Ludlow, where it had ever since been and then was, and that the timber of the chapel was either wholly or for the most part sold, and part of the timber was used in building the house of one William Felton, of the town of Ludlow, and the stones of the chapel were applied in building a new bridge over the river Corve, in the town, and some of the pews were removed from the chapel to the parish church of the town and placed in the galleries of the church:—and further stating, that the chapel yard had many grave stones in it and was used for a burying ground during many years, and that the chapel when it was pulled down might have been repaired at a small expense, for the side and end walls were of great thickness and quite sound, and that the timbers consisting of the beams, summers, wallplatts and rafters of the roof were also sound and strong, and that the decay was only in the tiling of the roof: that there was only one church in Ludlow which was not sufficient to contain one-fourth of the inhabitants: that two or three families used one pew, and that the church nearest to it was not in the same county:— [38] and further stating, that the rents and profits of the trust estates when the leases had expired, would be much more than sufficient to answer all the purposes of the charity, but the corporation had not rendered any account thereof to the vicar or churchwardens of Bromfield, or to any other person, and what they had received they had retained or in some manner misapplied: and that the corporation had omitted and neglected to register the charity and the purposes and trusts thereof in manner directed by an Act of Parliament passed in the fifty-second year of his late Majesty's reign entitled "An Act for the registering and securing of Charitable Donations," as by the Act they were bound to do.

The Respondents by the petition prayed, That it might be referred to one of the Masters of the Court to enquire into the trusts of the charity, and to approve a proper scheme for the due regulation and management thereof, and that the lease of the chapel yard might be ordered to be cancelled, and the yard applied to the purposes of burial, and that an account might be taken of the want of repairs to the chapel, when the same was taken down, and what sum of money would have been sufficient to repair the same, and what sum of money it would now cost to rebuild the chapel upon the same plan and dimensions as the old chapel, and that the corporation might be ordered to account for all the rents and profits of the trust estates received by them or by their order or for their use, and also for the timber, pews, stones and other materials of the chapel converted or disposed of by them and that the amount of what should be found due from the corporation upon taking the accounts might be paid into the hands of the Accountant General of the Court, in trust for the charity, and [39] that if on taking the accounts the amount should be found insufficient to rebuild the chapel that the corporation might be ordered to pay such further sum of money sufficient to rebuild the chapel, or put the same into the condition it was in at the time when it was taken down, and that proper persons might be appointed feoffees or trustees of the chapel and charity premises; and that the corporation might be ordered to convey the premises to such new feoffees or trustees upon the trusts of the charity, and that proper directions might be given for registering the charity according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and that the corporation might be ordered to produce and leave with one of the Masters of the Court, for safe custody, all the title deeds, papers and writings in their custody or power, and upon the oath of their treasurer, secretary, town clerk or agent, relating to the charity premises.

This petition having been allowed by the Attorney General, twelve affidavits were filed by the Respondents in support of the allegations of the petition, which came on to be heard on the 17th of November, 1815, before the Vice Chancellor,* when the Appellants the corporation appeared by their counsel and opposed the prayer of the same, having filed nine affidavits in answer to the petitioners' affidavits. After hearing the petition, the Vice Chancellor declared:

"That the bailiffs, burgesses and commonalty of the borough of Ludlow, had been guilty of a breach of trust in pulling down Saint Leonard's chapel in the said petition mentioned, and converting or disposing of the timber, pews, stones, [40] bell and other materials of the said chapel as stated in the said petition, and did therefore order that the said Corporation be discharged from being feoffees or trustees of the charity estate, and did order that it be referred to Mr. Jekyll, one of the Masters of the Court, to appoint new feoffees or trustees of the charity estate in the room of the corporation, and did order that the bailiffs, burgesses and commonalty of Ludlow, should at their expense convey the charity estate to such new feoffees or trustees and their heirs upon the trusts of the said charity, and they were to declare the trusts thereof accordingly. And his Honor did also order that the said Master should settle such conveyance, and that the said Master should enquire and state to the Court what were the timber, pews, stones, bell and other materials of the said chapel, and the value thereof at the time they were converted or disposed of by the said Corporation, and what had become of the said timber, pews, stones, bell and other materials. And did order that the said Master should also inquire and state to the Court what would be the expense of restoring the chapel and the burial ground belonging thereto into the state in which they were at the time such breach of trust was committed, and for the better discovering of the matters aforesaid the parties were to produce before the Master upon oath all books papers and writings in their custody or power relating thereto, and were to be examined upon interrogatories as the Master should direct, and did order that the corporation should pay unto the petitioners their costs of the said application, and of the proceedings to be then had before the Master [41] under the same to be taxed by the Master, and after the Master should have made his report, such further order should be made as should be just."

In July 1816, the corporation presented their petition of appeal to the Lord

* Sir Thos. Plumer. See the Report on the original hearing. 1 Mad. Rep. p. 92. The order was pronounced after Sir T. P. had become Master of the Rolls.

Chancellor against this order which was heard on the 10th, 11th, and 13th days of August 1821, and on the 12th of September following, the order was affirmed.*

Pending the appeal, various proceedings took place before the Master under the original order of the Master of the Rolls, and several orders were made against which no appeal was presented.

Upon the hearing of the petition of appeal the Lord Chancellor observed that unless the possession of the site of the chapel were recovered, the chapel could not be restored, and therefore he suggested that an information with the Attorney General's sanction to vacate the lease granted by the Corporation of the chapel, scite and burial ground should be filed which the Respondents undertook forthwith to do, and accordingly on the 13th of February, 1822, the Attorney General at the relation of Francis Hand, Edward George, William Edwards, and Thomas Cadwalladar, (three of whom were the new feoffees of the charity appointed and approved of by the Master under the reference to him) filed an information in Chancery against [42] Richard Gibbon, and Hannah his wife, and other persons representing or claiming under Edward Acton, the original lessee, praying that the lease granted to Edward Acton by the Corporation of Ludlow might be declared a fraud upon the charity, and that the defendants might be compelled to deliver up the lease to be cancelled. To which information two of the defendants (Sarah Acton and Mary Acton) appeared and put in their answer.

The bailiffs, burgesses, and commonalty of Ludlow, appealed to the House of Lords against so much of the order of the 17th of November 1815, as declares "That they have been guilty of a breach of trust in pulling down and converting and disposing of the timber, pews, stones, bell and other materials of the chapel; and as directs that they shall be discharged from being trustees of the charity estates, and also against so much thereof as directs a reference to the Master to appoint new feoffees or trustees, and also against so much thereof as directs that the Appellants shall at their expense convey the charity estates to such new trustees and their heirs upon the trusts of the charity, and that the Master should settle such conveyance and inquire and state to the Court what were the timber, pews, stones, bell and other materials of the chapel, and the value thereof at the time they were converted and disposed of by the Corporation, and what had become thereof, and to state what would be the expense of restoring the chapel and the burial ground into the state in which they were at the time when such breach of trust was committed.

"And also against so much of the order of the [43] Lord High Chancellor of the 12th of September, 1821, as confirms the order of the 17th of November, 1815."

For the Appellants, The Attorney General and Mr. Hart.

For the Respondents, Mr. Heald and Mr. Roupell.

Before the case was opened an objection was taken on the part of the Respondents, that the Attorney General appearing as Counsel for the Appellants, appeared against his own petition.

Upon this objection, the Lord Chancellor having observed that the Attorney General was no party to the appeal, and although he was a party to the petition which was the foundation of the proceeding, was no party upon the record in the House, proceeded thus:

It affords me great satisfaction that Mr. Heald should have raised a point which in my opinion calls for the judgment of the House upon this subject, because I think that the judgment of the House, if it shall happen to agree with my opinion upon it, may set right the practice in the Court below, which is entirely at variance with what it was when I had the honour of standing outside that bar; and I think my Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Redesdale), who sits near me now will inform your Lordships

* A question was made whether this order of affirmance was absolute and final, or conditional. The minute delivered out by the Lord Chancellor in his own hand writing ran thus:—"Confirm the order of the 17th Nov., 1815, reserving the consideration as to the regularity of the proceedings subsequently had till the next day of petitions; and in the meantime, if the parties mean to file an information, with the Attorney General's sanction, to affect the lease, let the same be filed." E. C. 12th Sept., 1821.

what was the practice with respect to the Attorney General's appearance in every proceeding by information, whether it came on before the Chancellor or at the Rolls.

This Act was passed in the 52d year of the late King, and is known by the name of Sir Samuel Romilly's Act: and having myself in this House taken a part [44] in the passing of that Act, I hope I shall not be thought to speak with any disrespect, which is the last thing in the world I intend to the high character of that individual, when I declare respecting this Act what I believe may be predicted of a great many other Acts introduced by great men, that they have done more harm than good. The interposition of the Attorney General was made necessary by the second clause of the Act, which is in these words:—"Provided always, and be it further enacted, That every petition so to be preferred as aforesaid shall be signed by the persons preferring the same in the presence of, and shall be attested by the Solicitor or Attorney concerned for such petitioners, and every such petition shall be submitted to and allowed by his Majesty's Attorney or Solicitor General, and such allowance shall be certified by him before any such petition shall be presented." Now if this Act is to be construed otherwise than by the application of those principles which belong to informations, or at least if it is not to be construed in some degree by such an application, it appears to me that the extent of the mischief will be very considerable indeed; that is, if the Attorney General has no right to interpose against that to which he has given his own sanction in the same manner and to the same extent as he can interpose with respect to the proceeding by information.

With respect to those proceedings by information, I have often taken the opportunity of stating, that within my own memory neither Lord Thurlow nor Lord Loughborough would permit a matter to proceed in the Court of Chancery on an information unless they were concerned in the cause, and I have known Lord Loughborough very often get up [45] and state to the Court, when he was Solicitor General, that neither he nor the Attorney General had been consulted upon a proceeding that was about to take place. I think my noble and learned friend near me will confirm me in that observation to the extent of saying, that even at the Rolls, the Master of the Rolls would never proceed unless there was somebody instructed to appear as Counsel for the Attorney General, not merely for the relator, but for the Attorney General.

Two cases have been mentioned, in which, certainly, I had not the least notion that I was trespassing against the rule of proceeding: The Attorney General v. the Corporation of Bristol,* and the Attorney General v. the Corporation of Ereter.† In the case of the Attorney General v. the Corporation of Bristol, the object of the information was to find out a fund that was to be applied to some purpose, which the Corporation of Bristol were under an obligation to execute by the application of that fund. The information had been filed, and I suppose had been laid before the Attorney General of that day, and had not been very much considered by him: but the matter when it came before the Court appeared to me to be this, that the information had called for a discovery which was to be put upon the Records of the Court of Chancery demanding information with respect to every title, every property, every right, every valuable thing which that corporation had for the then unnecessary [46] purpose, as it seemed to me, of finding out some fund that might be applied to the purpose for which that information was filed. It had the authority of the Attorney General. He had allowed it by not only putting his name to it, in the case of a petition, but he had allowed it by becoming himself a party to the information, and it did appear to me in that case, as it always appeared to me, that the Attorney General, as representing his Majesty, is bound certainly to take all necessary care of the relators: but, on the other hand, he is equally bound, as representing his Majesty, not to suffer oppression to affect the interest of the defendants, who are equally his Majesty's subjects. I therefore thought myself authorized, and I feel thoroughly convinced that I was right, in calling upon the Attorney General to look into that information, and to inform the Court whether he would abide by the information in that form, or address

* The case is still depending before the Lord Chancellor, on Appeal from the decision of the Vice Chancellor [see 2 Jac. and W. 294]. The case as it stood before the Vice Chancellor is not reported.

† See the case reported as reheard before Sir T. Plumer, M. R., Jacob's Rep. Vol. I. p. 443.—The case before the Chancellor, as alluded to in the text, is not reported himself to a correction of it, making it effectual for the plaintiffs without being oppressive to the defendants.

The same principle was applied to the case of the Corporation of Exeter. The corporation put in an answer, which, as the answer of a corporation is without oath, had been somewhat slovenly drawn with respect to the date, for which they had submitted to account, and there was a matter of law which it may be necessary to set right at the hearing of the cause. I do not recollect how that is, but it appeared to me a most oppressive thing to call upon the corporation to account for two or three centuries, and that therefore was submitted to the Attorney General's consideration, who has the carriage of the relator's cause, and the duty of taking care of it, but such care is not to be oppressive to the defendants in the suit. It was then found that [47] all that justice could require, was to cut down that account to a reasonable period, and that a pretty long period.

I believe it will likewise be found that, even after a decree, when the cause came into the Master's office, it was the custom to require express notice to be given to the Attorney General in cases in which it was important that his consideration should be given to the proceeding in those offices.

Then the question is this. Is the allowance of the Attorney General required by the second section of this Act to have an effect which his being a party to the information would not have, and when the Attorney General has once allowed the petition which at the time of approving it he might think right, is it from that moment out of his power to correct his own opinion, though that correction be for the interest of those whose interests he is to protect, recollecting always that he is bound not to permit the plaintiffs in a cause to oppress the defendants in a cause, but to take care that the proceeding is a reasonable, fair, judicial proceeding as between the parties. I submit therefore to your Lordships, as my humble opinion, that there is no objection to hearing the Attorney General in support of this appeal.

Lord Redesdale: In all cases in which it would be important to substitute summary proceedings instead of the original regular mode of proceeding in courts of justice, this Act ought to be construed as merely intended for the purpose of saving either time or expense. Unquestionably, looking at this Act, it appears to me to be (so far as relates to the concurrence of the Attorney or Solicitor General) which is thrown into the second section of the Act, loosely and incor-[48]rectly worded. The preamble of the Act is, that it is expedient to provide a more summary remedy in cases of breaches of trust created for charitable purposes. It was not intended to alter the law upon the subject, but merely to provide a more summary remedy. Now why was the Attorney General a party before this Act passed to informations filed for the purpose of carrying into execution any charitable purpose or of remedying any abuse which might exist with respect to the application of funds given for the purposes of charity? The ground stated in all the books is this, that the King is to be considered as the pater patrie, that he is the protector of every part of his subjects, and that, therefore, it is the duty of his officer, the Attorney General, to see that justice is done to every part of those subjects. It would be highly improper for the Attorney General assisting in that character to press harder upon one party than upon another. It is his duty to see that justice is done, and it was for that purpose as I conceive that informations in the name of his Majesty's Attorney General were permitted for the purpose of carrying into execution charitable dispositions, or for providing for the due distribution of charitable funds. Relators were required for this reason, because the crown paid no costs. The Attorney General prosecuting as the officer of the crown could not be liable for costs, and a complaint might be made against individuals highly oppressive to them unless there were some person responsible for the costs that might be incurred in consequence of that proceeding.

I conceive that the intention of this Act, however loosely it may be worded, was simply this, to substitute a summary proceeding, instead of a [49] more regular proceeding. I have always considered that it was a wise saying, that the farthest way about is often the nearest way home; and I believe that these summary proceedings will be found to be not always the nearest way home, or at least not the best way home. I have an objection, a fixed and rooted objection, to any rash alterations of established laws, because I am thoroughly persuaded that, generally speaking, such alterations lead to mischief. In the first place, they are generally ill understood, they are precipitately undertaken, and loosely expressed; and that which the wisdom of ages has contrived to have clearly described, is confused by the words of an Act of Parliament, often extremely difficult to interpret. The fair way of interpretation of every Act of this description is, in my opinion, to proceed by analogy to that which existed before, and to conceive that Parliament did not intend that any other alteration should be made, than that which it expressly says shall be made. It says that the proceedings, instead of being in the form of an information, shall be by petition, and upon affidavits, or such evidence as shall be produced, to determine the matter; and such order shall be made for costs and other matters, as the Court shall think proper.

If this case had proceeded in the regular ordinary course, by way of information, that information would have stated clearly what that was which the Attorney General thought a fit object of his protection: it would have been limited according to what the Attorney General thought consistent with justice, with respect to the party whom he called upon to account to him. An answer would have been put in: the matter would have thus been put in issue between the parties; and whatever was not [50] admitted in the form of an answer, must have been proved by the usual mode of giving evidence in Courts of Equity; the cause would then have come to a hearing, and a decree would have been pronounced upon a view of the whole case. The Attorney General would then have had the control of the whole proceedings; he certainly might, and unquestionably often did refuse to proceed to the extent to which relators would proceed, who might be urged on by animosity and by party considerations, especially against a corporation; and it was his duty to see that justice should be done—that justice should be done, not only to those who were the objects of the charity, but to the trustees of that charity. Many things have lately passed with respect to charities, which have had a very unfortunate effect. I know that a great many persons now refuse to be trustees for charities: they say, we are exposed in such a manner to proceedings against us, that we must beg leave to decline being trustees for a charity; and the effect will be to prevent respectable persons being trustees for charities, if they are to be exposed to the sort of proceeding which unfortunately this Act of Parliament has more than once given rise to.

As long as the law was under the direction of what had been established by practice perhaps more than by any original law upon the subject, but by practice founded on principle, namely the right of the King to protect any part of his subjects, the proceeding was perfectly well understood and regular, and, no doubt, was always under the control of the officers of the Crown. It is true that in this Act, all that the Act in words says is, that his Majesty's Attorney or Solicitor General must allow the [51] petition. Now what could his Majesty's Attorney or Solicitor General know of the merits of a case of this description, merely from the representation of the persons who bring such a petition into court. They cannot possibly know what may be the answer to the proceedings, and therefore I think the word allowance, which is introduced into this Act of Parliament, cannot be construed to mean that the Attorney General having once allowed a petition, he should never afterwards have any thing to do with the subject. The Act of Parliament does not pretend to subvert the law upon this subject. It only proposes to substitute a summary proceeding instead of a more formal proceeding; and therefore I conceive that the Attorney General must be considered as having a control over any proceeding by petition as he would over any information.

The looseness with which the Act is framed is evident from these words: "to be approved by his Majesty's Attorney or Solicitor General." Taking that without reference to what was the law previously upon the subject, that would mean that the Solicitor General, without the concurrence of the Attorney General, might approve of these proceedings; but we know very well that according to the previous law the Solicitor General could not file an information except in the vacancy of the office of Attorney General. If there was no Attorney General, the Solicitor General could in the vacancy of the office file an information. But even that was a mooted question, whether in the vacancy of the office of Attorney General the Solicitor General could file an information. The office of Attorney General being vacant, an information was filed in the name of the Solicitor General; but when an [52] Attorney General was appointed, under whose control was that information? not of the Solicitor, but of the Attorney General.

When I was early in life practising in the Court of Chancery, I had no idea that any case of an information could proceed without inquiring of the Attorney General, if it was thought fit to set down the cause for expedition at the Rolls, where the Attorney General did not usually attend, what counsel he chose to have a brief delivered to, on behalf of the Attorney General. That question was always asked, and the Attorney General always directed to whom the brief should be given. The person to whom that brief was given stood in the place of Attorney General; and it was as much his duty to see that every thing was done fairly towards the defendants in the case, as toward the charity who were the objects of the information. He considered himself as standing in the place of the Attorney General, and that it was his duty to see that nothing more was done than what justice required.

I conceive, therefore, that the object of this proceeding has been somewhat mistaken if it is supposed that the Attorney General has no right to interfere. I take it that the true meaning of the Act of Parliament is this: merely to give a summary remedy, instead of a more regular proceeding, which in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred will be found to be the best course at last. But it was intended to give this summary proceeding instead of the more formal proceeding, and was not intended in any manner to alter the law upon the subject, or to put the proceeding out of the control of the Attorney General after he had once given his fiat. I think, therefore, that the objection must be over-ruled.

[53] After these observations the Attorney General proceeded to argue the case for the Appellants.

In the course of the argument, the following observations were made by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Redesdale:—

1. As to the character and quality of the chapel, and the proceedings with respect to it.

Lord Redesdale: I do not see that any attention has been paid to the incumbent of the parish. Does it appear at all what the foundation of this chapel was? I ask that question because I suppose there are not less than three or four hundred spots of ground of this description in this country.

It does not appear whether the chapel was dissolved by the Act of Edward the 6th. That is extremely material; because if it was dissolved by the Act of Edward the 6th, it was desecrated by that Act, and it remained no longer a consecrated chapel; and if it was not subsequently consecrated, I apprehend that no person could, strictly speaking, do what is required to be done in that chapel.

It would have been easy to trace the title to the chapel, because being vested in the Crown it must have been granted by the Crown, and that grant of the Crown would have traced it to the individual to whom it was granted.

The ordinances are very material in one point of view, because they treat this completely as a private chapel to which the trustees had a right to appoint the chaplain, who was merely a private chaplain. Those trustees could have no right to appoint a curate to perform duty in a chapel that was to be the chapel of the parish. It might be lawful for them to have a private chapel for the use of [54] those poor people in the almshouse, but that is a very different thing from having a chapel for the use of a parish. When a chapel is for the use of a parish, I apprehend no person can appoint a curate to it without the consent of the minister of the parish, whoever he is. Is there any evidence that this was a parochial chapel?

The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that the inhabitants were bound to contribute.

The question of its having been a parochial chapel must depend upon the records in the Bishop's Court; it would have been the duty of the Archdeacon to have reported it at the time when the corporation took possession of it. That would all appear upon the record.

The witness noticed in the proceedings is not a competent witness as to the chapel, because he claimed a right to sit there.

The Lord Chancellor: The real character and nature of this chapel does not appear to have been inquired into. With respect to this being a parochial chapel there is no evidence, the order does not say so. I apprehend there are many chapels, the nature of which it is difficult to state, but having been annexed to schools and almshouses, they cannot be considered as desecrated to the extent that they may be turned into playhouses. There are hundreds of chapels not parochial chapels annexed to colleges and other institutions, that could not be so converted.

2. As to parties.

The Lord Chancellor: Unless it can be shown that this is a parochial chapel in the strict sense of those words, what interest have the parishioners in [55] this deed? Do the petitioners state themselves to be parishioners?

In the papers, the churchwardens of Bromfield (to whom the surplus, after repairs, was to go) are mentioned, but I do not observe that the character is given to them in the petition.

Lord Redesdale: The right heirs of Charles Foxe were necessary parties to the proceeding, because they have the right to nominate and appoint the minister.

In the petition they state that the nomination is in the heirs male of Charles Foxe, with a view, I suppose, to the allegation, that all the heirs male are dead. By the ordinances, it is vested in the right heirs of Charles Foxe.

The person who made the conveyance to the corporation was the last heir of the trust, but not of Charles Foxe.

3. As to the breach of trust.

The Lord Chancellor: The agreement entered into with the corporation was a breach of trust, because the corporation undertook by that to indemnify the person, the heir male, against the effect of it—and to be sure, that was a most improper creation of a trust. They could not take the property otherwise than subject to the trusts. The transaction in 1774 was a breach of trust. Suppose this deed of trust executed in 1771, and the pulling down and the selling of the property had happened in the same year. Could the act be held consistent with that trust deed. If there had been any other trustees accepting the trust, what have they to do in destroying the trust, because other persons may not accede to a due execution of it.

[56] The order of the Vice Chancellor takes no notice of other parts of this petition, which state conduct that certainly may be wrong if truly stated: such as payments out of the charity fund on account of pulling down the chapel.

Lord Redesdale: The conveyance to the corporation was a breach of trust, and therefore it is that they indemnify the person who conveys from the consequences. The existence of a burial ground is contrary to the terms of the trust, because whatever was not assigned for gardens for the poor people in the almshouses was to be occupied by the minister.

1. As to the jurisdiction and the form of the proceedings.

The Lord Chancellor: If I remember right, in the Court of Chancery it was thought they could grant no extension of the Act. If that could be done we should be quite ready to admit that there was a jurisdiction: one question is, therefore, whether the Court has jurisdiction? I am glad to see an appeal to the House of Lords to have the point settled. If the House should be of opinion that the jurisdiction does not extend to such cases as this, it may be necessary to have a short Act of Parliament to confirm orders made upon petition which ought to have been made upon bill.

Suppose this had been an information instead of a petition, what could the Court have done with an information two and twenty years after the act committed?*

[57] If the proceeding had been in 1774, before they began to pull down this chapel, for an injunction to prevent their pulling it down, the Court would have granted that injunction.

The order of the Vice Chancellor of 1815 did not necessarily lead to charging the Appellants with any thing beyond the value of the property, the value of which he directed to be inquired into: subsequently he goes a great deal further. But supposing this matter to have come on in the year 1774 instead of the period in which the cause came on in the Vice Chancellor's Court, it would have been a question whether the value of those materials might have been charged against the Corporation as far as they would go in restoring the walls of that chapel.

Supposing the original order to be right, and supposing the confirmatory order to be right, there is nothing in either of those orders that would justify £1220 being

* See the Attorney General v. the Brewers' Company, 4 Meriv. 495, where Grant, Master of the Rolls, said, "It was a point not decided from what period a corporate body should be obliged to account in matters of trust." The decree was in 1816, and the account was directed from 1779. The authority of this case was adopted by Sir Thomas Plumer in the Attorney General v. the Mayor of Exeter, ante, page 45.

demand necessarily; that would be a question when the Master's report came before the Court. The question upon that report would be not whether the £1220 was to be paid, but whether so much of the £1220 as was the value of the materials was to be paid, for there is nothing in either of those orders that necessarily concludes that the whole expense is to be paid; if it turned out upon inquiry, as it might have turned out, that the value of the materials was equal to restoring the chapel to the state in which it was; whether, according to law, the corporation ought to be charged with something in the form of damages ultra what they have received, that is a question quite open.

Lord Redesdale: Is there any case in which the [58] Court of Chancery has awarded damages for a breach of trust? Lord Keeper Coventry was of opinion that he could not. In the case of a chapel of which I am trustee, Lord Coventry declared, that where there was a gross breach of trust, all he could do was to make the persons who had committed it account for all the profits they had made, though the thing had received considerable damage.

The Lord Chancellor: The Vice Chancellor, in the first instance, before there were any proceedings in the Master's office, orders the costs of those proceedings in the Master's office to be paid by the other parties. He does not suspend the order for the costs of the proceedings till an opportunity was had of judging by knowing what the proceedings were, and then deciding which party should pay. When that note (the minute of the order, see ante, p. 41) of mine was delivered, I conceive that it was my intention that that order should be drawn up with a reservation of the question of the regularity of the proceedings. How is it that order is drawn up, supposing it to be my opinion that the whole of the order should be confirmed? When the order was drawn up, it ought not to have been an order for the confirmation of the whole of the Vice Chancellor's order, but expressly reserving that part which relates to the regularity of the proceedings which were subsequently had.

The order of 1815 has given the costs of the subsequent proceedings, of which they complained in their petition of appeal.

With respect to that part of the original order which gave costs in the Master's office, undoubtedly when that order was confirmed there ought to have been a saving of that part of the order.

[59] The House cannot take any notice of the minute (see ante, p. 41), because the minute is not the order of the Court; there is the order of the Court, which whether it be right or wrong is not drawn up according to the minute. And it is upon that order only that this House can proceed.

The order might have been rectified upon rehearing, according to the minute.

Lord Redesdale: If the order was not drawn as it ought to have been by the Register, an application should have been made to the Court to amend the order. If the officer of the Court, in discharging his duty, did it erroneously—if he drew up the order different from the directions given by the Court, your application should have been personally against the Register, for drawing up a wrong order.

The Lord Chancellor: A question would have arisen upon the argument upon the Master's report, supposing there was the breach of trust complained of in this form, whether the Court would be justified in ordering any thing more to be repaid than what was the value of the old timber and other materials. Or if the Court thought it could not order the restoration of the chapel at a greater expense, whether this Corporation was to be visited in damages. If there had been a proceeding right in its nature, proper in its jurisdiction, and all the proper parties brought in at the time, nobody can deny that the Corporation must have been answerable for the materials.

With respect to any orders but those two appealed against, we have nothing whatever to do. If those two orders are confirmed, whether any others are to stand this House cannot decide, because they are [60] not appealed from; if those orders are reversed, then they fall without any order at all.

If the value of the timber and materials was equal to the expense, by incurring which the whole was to be restored, the Court would have been justified in directing that value to be so applied.

At the conclusion of the argument the following observations were made by

The Lord Chancellor: I rise for the purpose of protesting against its being understood that we have any thing to do with the various transactions stated upon the appeal and the printed cases, in the first place with respect to the report of 20

December 1817, the order of the 13th of June 1818, the Report of the 6th of February 1819, and the order of confirmation, bearing date the 22d of February 1819, or the order of the 26th of June 1822, or the 30th of July 1822. The appeal being only against the order of 1815 and part of the order of 1821, it appears to me that a great deal of the argument with respect to what is the law by which you are to charge a Corporation arising out of the other orders, is quite out of the case; because there is no appeal against any of those proceedings. If those proceedings fall to the ground by the reversal of the order of 1815 and the order of 1821, then there is no occasion to say any thing about them. If, on the other hand, these orders do not fall to the ground by reason of that reversal, the consequence is that they must be dealt with as they can be dealt with elsewhere; for there is no appeal against them here. The case therefore must be necessarily confined to the question, are the orders of 1815 and 1821 right or wrong? And that question embraces so many [61] important considerations, that you will have enough to do in confining the subject of the appeal to that question, and not travelling out of it.

Lord Redesdale: This Appeal comes before your Lordships upon a proceeding under the authority of an Act of Parliament which was probably intended for the furtherance of justice, but which undoubtedly, as it appears upon this proceeding, seems only to have tended to increase expense, and answer no useful purpose.

That Act of Parliament was calculated to supply a more summary mode of proceeding, instead of the established mode of proceeding with respect to charities. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, an Act was passed which is commonly called the Statute of Charitable Uses, and that Act authorized the issuing of certain commissions to inquire in respect of what are called charitable uses and trusts. That Act authorized the Court of Chancery to issue commissions directed to certain persons: of those persons, one was to be the bishop of the diocese, with other persons selected for the purpose, and they were authorized to proceed by summoning a jury of the county where the property in question was situated for the purpose of inquiring whether there had been any abuse or misapplication, or mistaken application of the funds belonging to the charity. Several proceedings were had under that Act, and a long train of decisions by the commissioners is reported in a book called "Duke's Law of Charitable Uses." Of those proceedings many were not very consonant to justice: those proceedings, however, were subject to review by the Lord Chancellor, many of them were reviewed, and when [62] reviewed, they were found so puzzling, or at least not obtaining the ends of justice by an easier mode of proceeding, that I believe a commission has not been issued for a great number of years, it having been found to be much more convenient to return to the old mode of proceeding by information by the Attorney General, bringing the matter in question formally upon record, stating the claims that were made upon individuals charged with a breach of trust, calling upon those individuals to make a defence, and putting their defence upon record, and then having a complete issue upon the record, upon which the judgment of the Court of Chancery might be formed.

Commissions for charitable uses having thus fallen into disuse, partly by their abuse (and whoever reads the proceedings under them must see there was frequently great abuse) and partly because they were found insufficient in prosecuting the claim in many instances, and also from being extremely unjust, in many instances, as to the persons called upon to account for property, or the persons sought to be charged by means of those commissions, the proceeding, for many years past, has been by information in the name of the Attorney General. Those informations were necessarily under his control, and it was the duty of the Attorney General to see that they were not improperly exhibited. Unfortunately, I believe, the Attorney General has not always been selected from among persons in the habits of business in the Court of Chancery; and it sometimes happens that informations of this description have been inadvertently signed by the persons holding the office of Attorney General. By the Reports of Atkyns and Vesey you will find that Lord Hardwick frequently [63] found fault with the proceedings of that description. In some cases he dismissed the informations, and ordered the relators to pay the costs, hinting that the Attorney General had not used sufficient caution upon the subject. I mention this, because in the course of the proceeding an objection was taken to the Attorney General appearing in the appeal against the proceeding which has been had for what was supposed to be a furtherance of the charity. I apprehend it was the duty of the Attorney-General to interfere, I do not say exactly in the manner in which he interfered in this case, because I think the Attorney General ought to have stopped the proceeding in an earlier stage of the business, for it is impossible to look at these proceedings without perceiving that the Act has done what could not be the intent of the framer of the Act, under the authority of which it proceeded: it has done that which Lord Hardwick frequently reprehended; it has produced great expense without any possible adequate good.

The Act of Parliament is entitled "An Act to provide a summary remedy in cases of abuses of the trusts created for charitable purposes." If the intent had been to supersede the prior law on the subject, the Act would have been so expressed; but it seems to me it cannot possibly be so intended: indeed I should say that almost in any case it was not a positive Act. It recites, "Whereas it is expedient to provide a more summary remedy in cases of breaches of trust created for charitable purposes, as well as for the just and upright administration of the same, Be it therefore enacted," etc. The preamble seems to me to import, that it was applicable to those cases only in which upon complaint made by petition in this way, the Court of Chancery could see the whole of the [64] proceedings which they were called upon to institute, and all that ought to be done by them in consequence. The Act does not create what one might properly call a new jurisdiction, but it gives the liberty to proceed upon the old jurisdiction in a summary way in certain cases; it certainly does not provide for a variety of cases relating to charitable uses and trusts; it cannot possibly therefore extend to all: it must be considered as referring to certain particular cases. The Act says, that this proceeding shall be "by petition to the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Keeper, or Lords Commissioners for the Custody of the Great Seal, and to the Master of the Rolls for the time being, or to the Court of Exchequer, stating such complaint and praying such relief as the nature of the case may require."

Now, although adverting to the subject in question, the Attorney General might have a choice, perhaps, in which Court he would sue, it does not seem to me that this Act, in that enactment, has been very attentive to what was the established jurisdiction either of the Court of Chancery or the Court of Exchequer in this matter. But it then provides, "That every petition so to be preferred as aforesaid shall be signed by the persons preferring the same in the presence of, and shall be attested by, the Solicitor or Attorney concerned for such petitioners and every such petition shall be submitted to and be allowed by his Majesty's Attorney or Solicitor General and such allowance shall be certified by him before any such petition shall be presented."

I cannot conceive that it was the intention of the framer of that Act merely that the Attorney General should sign his allowance to this as a matter of course, or the Solicitor General: for under this Act [65] parties are told that they may proceed either by the Attorney or Solicitor-General; but it has been determined that the Solicitor General is no officer of the Crown for such a purpose; while there is an Attorney General his office is subordinate, and therefore it cannot have been the intention of the legislature that a practice of that kind should be altered by Acts of Parliament framed sometimes by persons ignorant of the subject to which they apply, which cannot be said in this case, supposing the framer of the Act to have held the office of Solicitor General; he must have known that his office of Solicitor General was subordinate to that of the Attorney General. Having provided that, it does not go on to say the subsequent proceedings shall at all be under the control of the Attorney General, but surely it must be so intended. Can it be imagined that the Attorney General was merely to put his allocatur to this petition, and then it was to proceed without any further control on his part? That would not be at all analogous to a proceeding by information, because, whenever the proceeding is by information in the common and ordinary way, the Attorney General is in every part of the proceeding, though the Attorney General does not always act personally. If he happens to act in the Court of Chancery before the Lord Chancellor, of course he is the person who appears as counsel in the information. It is in the course of business to send a brief to him upon the subject; but if the proceeding is heard at the Rolls, where the Attorney General does not always attend, I believe he never interferes there; then the course I have always understood was to apply to the Attorney General, to know to whom he chose the brief should be deliinstituted for one of these purposes, it was thought fit by Parliament to put an end to it. Perhaps chapels of this description, many of them, could have become, if they had been suffered to remain, chapels of ease to parishes; that would have been a great accommodation to the [69] inhabitants living near those places; but in the progress of the Reformation (we must allow there was a little violence in the proceedings) they were all swept away. Perhaps one reason for that was, that the counsellors and advisers of Henry the 8th and Edward the 6th were rather desirous of obtaining some of these lands, which they did in great plenty. The ancestor of the present Lord Petré was then Secretary of State, and he got a very large grant of that description; and Queen Mary, wishing to restore them to their original purpose, took them from him. This chapel was probably of that description. But whatever it was, the persons who preferred this proceeding have never thought it worth their while to inquire. Now if this had been a proceeding by information, I apprehend the Attorney General, or the person whom he deputed for that purpose to look into the proceedings, would have desired to know what this chapel was; he would have said, If I am to file an information for the purpose of having this chapel rebuilt, which is the object of these proceedings, I must desire to know for what purposes it is to be rebuilt. I must desire to know what it was, and some inquiry must be made on the subject—and I have very little doubt that a little diligence would have found out the origin. It must have been derived from a grant by the Crown; there was nothing to do but to search the calendar of Patents from the Crown previous to 1590, and probably a grant would have been found, for it must have been from the Crown, and they would then have known whether it was possible to be applied to the purposes for which they sought to have it applied.

The persons who present this petition are inhabit[70]-ants of Ludlow, who insist by their petition that this is a chapel which ought to be maintained for their convenience; so far it is a question of the personal interest they have in the subject; and they ought to have informed themselves upon the subject before they went to the extent of filing this petition, praying that this chapel might be appropriated to the uses to which they desire it to be appropriated; for they state expressly they had a right to have it applied to the uses of a parochial chapel.

For the purpose of deciding whether they have a right to this relief or not, there are other persons to be consulted. In the first place, the incumbent of the parish of Ludlow was to be consulted. I doubt whether the person who made this will was not aware of this, for he directs that the curate of Ludlow shall be the person who shall serve this chapel. I have been unable to find out (though I have looked into Mr. Bacon's book for the purpose) what sort of a living the incumbent of Ludlow has; I do not know whether he is a rector or curate or what. I think he is a curate only, and that there is not in Ludlow an ecclesiastical rector; there may be a lay rector or vicar, but no ecclesiastical rector, or if so, I apprehend he has no tithes, because this proceeding states that he had nothing for his maintenance but a small glebe, and the rest of his maintenance consists of his fees for marriages, baptisms, and so on. If he has nothing for his maintenance but this small glebe and those fees, he was importantly interested in these proceedings, for he had a right to contend that no burials, baptisms or marriages should take place in that chapel and that a chaplain should not be appointed. I am not clear whether his Majesty's Attorney General (as I under-[71]-stand now * the appointment of the rector of Ludlow is in the Lord Chancellor, in right of the crown) ought not to be a person appearing for his Majesty's own interests. It seems to me, therefore, that when we consider this case throughout, with respect to the rights of the person who may be rector, or whatever he is called, in Ludlow, (and I cannot help thinking, that although he may be now called rector, that at the time of this bill, he was called curate, because I have known cases of that kind, where a curacy of this description has been transformed into a rectory, by the presentation to the rectory, and so altered in the books,) the person who penned this will evidently conceived there was an interest of some description in the person having the ecclesiastical office in

* The Lord Chancellor had said that he believed he had once or twice made a spiritual rector of Ludlow.

Ludlow, which would be interfered with by the purposes for which he built the chapel.

If it was not a chapel authorised by law, at the time when this will was made, directing it to be applied to the purposes mentioned in the will, the will could not lawfully direct it to be so applied, but it might still be applied, according to the doctrine which is often laid down in cases in Duke's Law of Charitable Uses, to another description of charity. However, the claim upon this proceeding is, that it should be applied to this as a parochial chapel. It is impossible under a summary proceeding of this description, for the Court of Chancery to limit its application in that way, because there are not persons before the court capable of sustaining a proceeding of that description. The will then directs that a further proceeding shall be had after his death, for the purpose of completing certain [72] almshouses he meant to be built, and which formed the first object of his consideration, and also the carrying into execution the rest of the directions in his will, the appointment of people and so on for the almshouses.

After his death a deed was executed for this purpose, in which very complete directions are given with respect to this charity, in conformity with his will. So far directions were not necessary for the purpose of this chapel: those directions apply to the almshouses and the persons to be appointed. That is not the object of this proceeding by petition: that has been totally lost sight of: the almshouses and the people in the almshouses have never been thought of in this proceeding; the minds of the persons engaged in this proceeding were solely confined to this chapel for the convenience of certain persons in Ludlow. Now in the view of the original testator Charles Foxe, and in the view of the person who after his death proceeded, according to the directions of his will, to carry it into effect, the almshouses were the principal object of their consideration, and they appropriated this chapel more with a view to the attendance of the people in the almshouses, than the accommodation of any other persons who might live in the neighbourhood, and who probably, as the parish church of Ludlow is not so convenient to many of the inhabitants as this chapel, would have attended it: in the proceeding upon this petition of appeal, the attention of the court has been directed to the chapel and nothing else.

The deed which was executed in pursuance of the direction in the will of the original testator Charles Foxe, prescribes the manner in which the charity [73] shall be afterwards managed; it provides also for the manner in which new trustees shall be appointed, and it directs that those shall be nominated first of all by the heirs male of Charles Foxe; and if there are no heirs male, then by the heirs general. An inquiry has been made upon these proceedings, whether any such heirs existed, and this has introduced into this proceeding something which appears to be extraordinary. Lord Powis asserts that he is, in right of Lady Powis, entitled to name the trustees of this charity, and entitled also to present to the almshouse and chapel, and therefore he has put himself in as an Appellant with the Corporation of Ludlow. Now he is no party, and therefore, I apprehend, that the appeal, as to him, ought never to have been received, and if the House had attended to the circumstances, the petition of Lord Powis, as an Appellant, ought to have been instantly rejected, as being a person who had no right to appeal: with respect to him, therefore, I apprehend that the appeal must be dismissed as having been improperly received.

With respect to the bailiffs, burgesses and commonalty of Ludlow, they certainly are persons interested in what has been done in the court below, and they have a right to complain of it. It is not possible, upon a proceeding such as this is, in the court below, that any thing can be done effectually for the purposes of this chapel, if it is such as has been represented, because it is impossible, upon that summary proceeding, to make any order effectually upon the subject. This has been found, as I understand, already upon one part of the case, viz. the ground which was the site of this chapel, has been granted for the purpose of a building lease, and is [74] built upon, and in order to erect this chapel, those buildings must be removed, and there must be a proceeding calculated to effect that object against the person in possession of this ground, as lessee, in whom the legal estate appears to have been vested, by the demise which has been made to him, under the circumstances of this case, for the purpose of removing him from that ground, in order to enable the Court to direct that this chapel should be re-erected, if by law it can be used for the purposes mentioned in these proceedings. It has therefore after all been found necessary, as I understand, that an information should be exhibited for that purpose. Now that circumstance alone shows that this application was improperly made to the Court, in the first instance, by way of summary petition. The object of the act of parliament was to save expense, to make it a more easy and less expensive mode of proceeding, to bring before the Court the abuse or any misapplication of a charity; but if there must be also a proceeding by information, of what use is this summary application.

It is often found that attempts to introduce more summary proceedings lead only to greater inconvenience and greater expense; the ordinary and regular proceedings in Courts of Justice are carried on in a way with which all the persons who practise in those Courts are familiar: they proceed regularly in a course which puts in issue all matters that ought to be put in issue, and enables the Court to judge in what manner finally to dispose of such a proceeding. Upon this summary mode of proceeding, calculated it is said to save expense, the taxed costs of the persons who present this petition under the orders pronounced upon that subject (I do not [75] mean to say your Lordships have any thing to do with it, because there are proceedings subsequent to those complained of in this Appeal, but I mention it merely for illustration) that the expense very nearly amount to £300 upon one appeal, including the costs of the other party; and after all there is an information, which information might have included the whole of this case, and brought the expense into one suit, instead of dividing it into two. The proceeding, therefore, instead of saving expense, has created a very considerable additional expense.

But this is not all. I apprehend that the information which has been filed will not do unless they have brought before the Court other persons than are brought before it upon this petition; for in that proceeding, if it is merely a proceeding to vacate the lease and to have the property restored, I presume the Corporation of Ludlow must be parties, and there must be other parties to the proceeding, because if this cannot be restored for the purpose for which it was intended to be applied, what is to be done? Is the Court to direct the chapel to be built for no purpose? Certainly not; that would not be an advantageous application of the funds of this charity, the original object of which was the establishment of almshouses. The Corporation of Ludlow have acted certainly most unadvisedly in this business, and in consequence of having so acted they have got themselves into a great difficulty. It seems to me, that in this case, when this petition came before the Vice Chancellor, he thought that all he had to do was to make them pay for having so acted; for he not only directed the Corporation of Ludlow to pay the costs of the original proceedings, but he directed them to pay the costs of all the pro-[76]ceedings before the Master, however vexatious and improper those proceedings might be; although it is usual, I apprehend, in such cases to reserve the consideration of those costs until it shall appear what has been done. That is a little of the rage that belongs to this sort of proceeding; but he seems never to have thought of the almshouses. Now, what is the object of those relators who are named in this petition as being of the parish of Bromfield—what is their subject of complaint? Their subject of complaint is, that in the appointment of persons to those almshouses the Corporation of Ludlow have with a natural sort of predilection preferred the people of Ludlow to the people of Bromfield; and though the people of Bromfield were entitled as much as the people of Ludlow to have their neighbours appointed to the almshouses, the Corporation of Ludlow had thought of their own people only. There was a pretty good ground of complaint on the part of the inhabitants of Bromfield, yet this petition seems to have been silent upon that point; and the Corporation of Ludlow having neglected their friends at Bromfield, the Vice Chancellor who made the order seems as little to have thought of them, because the counsel probably were instructed only by the good people of Ludlow, and did not care for the people of Bromfield. But nothing effectual can be done in this matter without having before the Court (if they exist) the heirs at law of Mr. Charles Foxe. There may be no heir male of Charles Foxe living; but it is not very probable that Charles Foxe has left no heir—it is extremely improbable: but that is not put in issue in this proceeding—it is not asserted he had no heir, and it is impossible to proceed in this case without the heir at law of Charles Foxe, if there is [77] such heir at law in being; and if there is no such heir at law in being, the right that was in Charles Foxe is vested in the Crown, and the Attorney General, if he is not the party claimant, must be the party defendant. It is clear that this proceeding can answer no purpose but of expense; it can answer no good purpose whatever; it is impossible to act upon it if you had now before you that sum of money that may be finally reported due upon these proceedings; you cannot attend to those subsequent proceedings except for illustration. If you had it now before you, or the Court of Chancery, if they had it in Court, they could do nothing with it; what has taken place since we have nothing to do with, further than as it affords an illustration of these modes of proceeding: it is impossible to proceed upon it. If such an order had been made, the money ought to be paid; if not paid into Court, to trustees appointed for the purpose of carrying the trust into execution: no such trustees are named, as far as I can find, and even the relators are not trustees; they might as well have ordered the money to be paid to any of your Lordships as to these trustees. That is a necessary consequence of this sort of summary proceeding: the view of the Court is confounded by not having before it a regular proceeding on record in which the matters are put in issue, and the decree founded upon the matters so put in issue, and that decree regulating all the subsequent proceedings, the house acting upon the regulation so introduced by the original decree in the cause. I use that only for the purpose of illustration, for otherwise it is not properly before you, although there is a great deal of other matter in these cases. That part of the order of the Vice Chancellor which directs an appointment of new trustees has never [78] been acted upon at all; and I wish to know what right the Master had to make the report he has made without having other parties before him. If one looks at this case one sees with what a temper the whole of these proceedings have been carried on; indeed, I must express my surprise at the original order: the original order proceeds in great degree, though not with the same violence, to charge this Corporation with a breach of trust. Now that they were guilty technically of a breach of trust is certainly true. They were guilty of a breach of trust when they took upon themselves this conveyance—this was itself a breach of trust; they had no right to interpose themselves as trustees, and they must endure all the consequences of that improper conduct on their part: they put themselves into the character of trustees where they had no right to put themselves.

But when I look at this case I think there are facts to try the truth of the evidence without any thing else. The Noble Lord now at the head of the Government in Ireland, when he was in India did me the honour to consult me upon several matters relating to the Mysore country, and amongst other things informed me of a report made to him by the Agent at Mysore, and he related a conversation with a Bramin, the Prime Minister of the Native Prince at Mysore, upon the extraordinary contradiction of evidence he observed in their Courts of Justice: ten persons would swear one way and ten other persons the contrary; and he said, How is it you are able to distinguish the truth? The answer was, it was certainly very difficult, but the way in which we act is this: we endeavour to find out some circumstance which is unquestionably true, and by that circumstance we try all the rest. I happened to mention [79] this to a gentleman, now the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, then Attorney General in Ireland, and he said that is what we are obliged to do in Ireland: we often find ten people swearing one thing and ten people another, directly in contradiction to each other, and we endeavour to find out some fact to try the truth of the evidence. Applying that rule to this case, there is a fact which seems to me to be pretty strong to show that the Vice Chancellor, afterwards the Master of the Rolls, did not properly try the contradictory evidence: for it appears that the surviving trustee named in the last of these deeds died, leaving two infant grandchildren, who were his heirs, and at his death it became the persons interested in this charity, the parish of Ludlow as far as it was interested, and the parish of Bromfield also, that they should immediately at least have instituted a suit to have proper persons appointed; but it was suffered to remain forty years in that condition, and all the objects of the charity alienated. After a length of time, the grandson of the surviving trustee became of age, and returning to England from abroad, he proceeded first of all to recover the property which was the foundation of this grant, and was put to a considerable expense in that proceeding. Upon his dying, his brother went on in the same way with the suit. Those gentlemen were certainly trustees, as heirs of the surviving trustee, therefore they carried it on very properly; being put to expense and trouble in this proceeding they were very glad to get rid of it, and willingly enough transferred this to the Corporation of Ludlow, receiving from that Corporation an indemnity for what had been so done.

[80] Now this fact, that for so many years this charity was left in this situation, proves to me what is the truth of the evidence in respect to the state of this charity. I believe it to be perfectly true, as it is stated, that there was not a whole window in this chapel, and that all the pews were burnt: that the boys and girls of the place played at ball, or any thing else there; nay, that they built up with loose stones a wall for the purpose of playing in that archway: the very circumstance of the desertion of that charity for so many years convinces me that that evidence is true, and that the evidence on the other side is not true.

All that has been done in this proceeding has been money thrown away: and after all is it possible for any effectual proceeding to be had for the purposes of this charity but by an information in the name of the Attorney General? Such an information it is said has been already filed for the purpose of vacating this lease. But how can they proceed in that information if they have not the heirs at law of Charles Foxe before the Court, or cannot show by fair evidence that he died without heirs at law? I apprehend the Court can make no decree upon that information as it stands. The first proceeding upon that information, as I apprehend, must be to direct an inquiry to be made, whether there is such a person as the heir at law of Charles Foxe; and I also apprehend, that upon that proceeding, there must be some means found to ascertain whether this is a chapel for the purposes mentioned in the petition in this case; that is, whether it is a parochial chapel or no: if it is not, what is to be done? Are the funds to be applied for the purpose of rebuilding this chapel if it cannot be used for the purposes mentioned [81] in these papers? It is therefore evident to me that this is not a case within the true intent and meaning of this Act of Parliament; that the Act meant to apply to those sort of single cases where nothing was to be inquired but whether A B and C made parties to the petition, had been guilty of a breach of trust, and to order that to be done in consequence which seemed fit and necessary. Where a proceeding by information is necessary, there can be no use in this summary proceeding, which was certainly intended by this Act to supply the purposes of an information, and to prevent expense; whereas, if it is to be used for the purposes to which it is intended to be applied by these proceedings, there must be an information, and the proceeding by petition only increases the expense.

Under this apprehension, I conceive it is clear that no order could be made by the Vice Chancellor: he ought to have said, this is a case which cannot proceed by the summary mode, you ought to have proceeded by information; this is not a case within the Act of Parliament; I have no jurisdiction to pronounce an order. The Vice Chancellor under the circumstances of this case, was not authorized by this Act of Parliament to pronounce any order whatever; he had no right to direct trustees to be appointed, because the deed before him expressly directed that the heirs of Charles Foxe should nominate the trustees: what right had the Vice Chancellor to supersede that direction in the face of the deed itself? Certainly none: the proceeding was improper, and the order which has been pronounced must be reversed: the petition must be dismissed, the Court not having power to pronounce upon it.

With respect to the subsequent proceedings, they [82] are not before the House, and we cannot pronounce any order upon them. With respect to Lord Powis, he has no business here, and as this is a case in which all parties are wrong, the consequence is, that being all wrong, each must pay his own costs: it is a consequence of the bad advice they have received.

I think it extremely important upon this occasion to signify what appears to me, at least, to be the true and proper construction of this Act: the Act itself, though certainly it has the reputation of being framed by a very respectable and a very able person, yet I must say that it has the appearance somewhat of haste. One question has arisen upon it, I am told, whether an information could not be filed by the Solicitor General? The words in the Act are "the Attorney or Solicitor General." Now that has arisen from the haste used in drawing this Act. The learned person who is supposed to have framed it himself, must have known that the Solicitor General could not act of himself when there was any person occupying the office of Attorney General: perhaps he thought it was so well understood that it was not necessary to insert words for the purpose; but there ought to have been inserted in this Act the words, "by the Attorney General or in the vacancy of that office by the Solicitor General:" Those words, to make this Act correct, ought to have been so inserted, but all who are cognizant of the law must interpret it in that way.

There is another thing which ought in prudence to have been inserted, but perhaps the person who framed the Act thought it the natural construction, viz., that the proceedings should be constantly under the control of the Attorney General, because it seems according to the expressions of the Act, that having [83] signed the petition there is an end of his office, and that the Attorney General has nothing more to do with it. That cannot be the meaning of the Act; the Act does not import that you are to take away from the Crown the authority which it exercised in cases of charity by means of its officer the Attorney General; the Attorney General is merely the representative of the Crown; it is in right of the Crown the Attorney General appears in cases of charity; it is not by any thing that is vested in him as Attorney General except as he is the officer of the Crown. The King, as parens patriæ, interferes to protect his subjects who have an interest and who, from their situation, cannot themselves interpose in cases of charity; and if the application of any part of the property to superstitious uses had formed any part of the establishment of Charles Foxe, it would not have been the officer, but the King, who would have had the right to interfere.

In a case* which has been partly heard, your Lordships will have very seriously to consider these questions: having looked at that case with some view of this subject, I have no doubt in my own mind the information is there by the Attorney General. The only question is, whether the King has a right to interfere; whether, when a duty is imposed and that duty is not discharged, and there is no individual who has a right to compel the performance of that duty and to institute a suit in a court of justice for that purpose, it is not a part of the prerogative of the Crown, or whether the Crown has not generally a right, to compel the performance of that duty?

In the time of Lord Hardwicke, several cases occurred where informations by the Attorney General came before him which he dismissed, making the rela[84]-tor pay the costs; and he dismissed them for this reason, because they were improperly instituted: they were suits in which either the parties personal interests led to the institution of the suit, or the suits might have been wholly avoided; and if this had been an original proceeding before your Lordships, or if the decision of the Vice-Chancellor had originally been to dismiss the petition with costs, I must have concurred in affirming the decision: because if four persons take upon themselves to institute such a proceeding, they ought to inquire whether they are authorized to institute it. I apprehend they are not authorized: at the same time there was an excuse to be made for them, we are told; namely, that in some cases the Court of Chancery had taken upon itself to make orders, which, according to the better judgment of the Court in subsequent cases, it would not now make. I believe Lord Hardwicke presided at the time when this rage for charity, something like the rage for Negro emancipation, carried the zeal of the people too far; and upon one occasion, where there was something extraordinary, (I am not certain that it was before Lord Hardwicke, I think it was Lord Maclesfield,) he said the Courts had forgotten a very common expression, that it was not lawful to steal leather to make poor men's shoes. In this case there can be no doubt there ought to have been an information, and not a proceeding in a summary way. No effectual order can be made upon the proceeding now before your Lordships. As to one part of the case an information has been actually filed, and that information might with propriety have embraced the whole case; instead of saving expense, this has been a proceeding to create an additional and unnecessary expense, and after all it cannot be applied to any useful purpose.

[85] Why were commissions for charitable uses in these cases not pursued? The Act of Queen Elizabeth directs the Court of Chancery to issue in certain cases commissions to inquire by commissioners, who were to be respectable persons, and were to proceed upon the verdicts of juries. Under these commissions questions were tried constitutionally, and by the interposition of a jury. The commissioners, upon the finding of those juries, made decrees, and those decrees were subject to review by the Chancellor, and he might affirm or reverse those decisions founded upon the finding by juries. We may grant that that was a much more solemn way than this, in which questions of fact were to be tried in the ordinary way of trying questions of fact, by the cross-examination of witnesses instead of proceeding as has been done in this case, merely upon affidavit, in which there is no cross-examination. Now in this case can it be doubted, if the persons who made those affidavits had been cross-examined, that the case would have come out very differently on both sides. One side has sworn a great deal too much, because not checked by cross-examination; and the other side a great deal too much the other way. Those are consequences which the commissions for charitable uses provide against, by trying questions of this kind before a jury, in which all the witnesses might be examined in chief and cross-examined. Why have commissions for charitable uses not been issued of late years? because it was found instead of tending to diminish expense that they created it, and unless this Act of Parliament is confined within very narrow limits, I have no doubt in the world it must have the effect it has had in this case, namely, of creating expense instead of diminishing it. Upon [86] the other branch of the question, in what manner the trust shall be executed, and how trustees are to be appointed, that may be done by petition to the Chancellor: it is a very simple case, in which the Chancellor may give directions upon the subject: but if there is a question what is the nature of the trust, and who are the parties to manage it, it is not a case for a petition, but the party ought to proceed by information.

I have troubled your Lordships very much at length upon this case, because I thought it most important that it should be rightly understood that this Act is confined within a narrow compass; and unless it is so confined, instead of being productive of convenience it will be productive of inconvenience, and instead of saving expense in the administration of charities, it will be the means of creating very great expense without at all facilitating the object in view. It is upon this impression that I move your Lordships to reverse the order that has been pronounced by the Vice Chancellor which is complained of, and which is complained of only in part. It is in effect complained of with respect to the whole, though in terms it is complained of only in part, and that has produced some difficulty in my mind on the case; but I apprehend if you are of opinion that under the circumstances no order can be pronounced upon the Vice Chancellor's order, that then you are, from the nature of the case, compelled to reverse the order, without attending to any particular exceptions; and if the substance of the order is wrong, the only course for you to pursue is, to reverse the whole of the order. With respect to the other Appellant, you ought to declare that the interposition of Lord Powis in the character of Ap-[87]pellant, was wholly irregular, and that his petition of appeal ought not to have been received.

The Lord Chancellor: Upon this petition, as to some points, there can be no hesitation what the House ought to do, or to forbear to do. As to the question whether the Master ought to have made his report in 1817, or whether the subsequent orders not appealed against should or should not have been made, the House has nothing to do with the consideration of those points. The single question here is, ought the Vice Chancellor's order of November 1815 to be reversed; if that order is reversed, it follows of course, that what is stated to be the order of the Chancellor of September 1821 (if it be the order of the Chancellor) ought also to be reversed; and I do not think I should be doing justice to the character of a deceased Judge of a very high reputation, if I did not most distinctly admit, that upon the 12th of September, 1821, the present Lord Chancellor had in his own hand writing handed out a minute confirming that order. It is a duty I owe to Sir Thomas Plumer's memory to state, that though that order of confirmation has been most irregularly drawn up, it is most undeniable, that upon the 12th of September, 1821, those words flowed from my own pen, and then the question may be put in this way: are you to reverse or to confirm the order of the Vice Chancellor? and what I must now take to be the order of the Chancellor, whether it was his order or not, for being drawn up, and that order not being discharged by any subsequent application, it stands upon the records of the Court as the order of the Chancellor, proceeding either correctly or incorrectly upon the authorities that are to be found for it.

It is my habit to put down short notes of what I con-[88]-ceive may be right to be done, giving to the parties an opportunity of representing why they think that which I think right, is wrong. This order was made upon the 12th September, 1821, when the Lord Chancellor could have very little assistance from the gentlemen at his own bar. The whole question now is, are those orders made consistently with the true intent and meaning of the Act which is usually called Sir Samuel Romilly's Act? With respect to the jurisdiction of the Attorney General in charity cases, I have always stated it to be his duty to watch every proceeding from the commencement to the end in an information by relators; for certainly I could never understand why relators are to have the sanction of the Attorney General, if it was not founded upon this principle, that the Attorney General, proceeding on the one hand as representing his Majesty in courts of justice, was to take care that those interests should be protected which the relator sought to maintain, and that he was likewise to take care that those against whom it was to be sought, were not to be oppressed.

The Act upon which we are now proceeding is an Act which is part of the law of the land, and according to that law we must proceed in courts of justice. I do not at present enter into the consideration whether Parliament did or did not act wisely in that particular act of legislation. It is an existing Act of Parliament which binds courts of justice. The question therefore is, have we or have we not in this order done that which Parliament meant we should do under the authority of that Act of Parliament? There is no denying that it was a very favorite Act at the time when it passed, though it has been open to great difficulty in the construction. That [89] learned and most respectable person himself, who is known to have been the author of it, did over and over again maintain, as Counsel at the bar of that Court in which I have the honour to preside, a construction of this Act which goes far beyond what is now the acknowledged construction. Those words "breaches of trust," to be found in the Act of Parliament, have been so largely construed as that a great many cases have passed there without an objection being taken that those proceedings were out of the reach of the provisions of the Act in the presence of the author of that Act. However, I think we have now got to this restriction, (and I shall be glad to have the sanction of this House upon the present occasion, if your Lordships agree in the judgment proposed,) that this Act is to apply only to simple cases, and not to cases as involved as some of those have been in which, without all question, orders of the Court have been made upon petitions founded upon a much larger view of the authority of the Court than could be now maintained with any hope of success.

With respect to the petition of Lord Powis, he being no party in the Court below, it appears to me he has no right to interpose by appeal, and that petition must, upon the ground that has been stated, be removed from this table.

With respect to the facts of the case, we find that in the year 1590, there was unquestionably a chapel in this place, called Saint Leonard's Chapel: that is quite clear, because the purchase deed of Mr. Foxe states the fact that there was that chapel. In the year 1769, when the family of that name was reduced to the individual who seems to have wished not to execute the trust any longer, a conveyance was made [90] to the Corporation of Ludlow, and after that conveyance had been made to the Corporation of Ludlow, if an information had been filed in the year 1773, when they were about pulling down that chapel, either to enjoin them from pulling down the chapel, or if they had sold the materials, calling upon them only to account for the price of the materials, I should have said, without all question, that the corporation taking that conveyance in 1769, were parties to a clear breach of trust: that they were guilty of a most obviously clear breach of trust: because notwithstanding all that I can suggest to my own mind, with respect to the right of the Bishop as diocesan, with respect to the right of the Curate of Ludlow, if there be a curate, or with respect to the Rector of Ludlow, if he is a rector, or with respect to the heir of the Foxe family, when the Corporation of Ludlow by the instrument in 1769, took upon themselves to carry into execution all the charitable uses and purposes upon which this charitable foundation was made, and made themselves trustees for those purposes, that the Corporation being such trustees, had no right whatever to take upon themselves to turn diocesan, rector, curate, heir at law, or any thing else, and destroy the charity; and it is pretty obvious, I think, and no very strained construction of the matter to say, that those who took the conveyance in 1769, upon the trust to carry into execution the charity-purposes mentioned in that very instrument, that they put an end to it in the year 1773, giving an indemnity to Mr. Foxe, who conveys to them, actually contemplating when under a breach of trust, they became trustees, also to carry that breach of trust further by intending to do the act, and doing the act they did in 1773. That [91] raises the very difficulty whether looking at the whole that is stated in this petition, this is or is not to be considered a case within Sir Samuel Romilly's Act.

The Court is bound to take care, (and I do not think that in this case I took sufficient care,) that the petitioners have a clear interest in the subject, and that they prove themselves to have that interest in the subject which they state upon their petition. I mention this circumstance the rather because Sir Thomas Plumer in his judgment proceeds upon this as a parochial chapel: I mean, in giving the reasons of his judgment as they are reported. He does not state it to be a parochial chapel in his order; but let it be recollected that the petitioners do state it to be a parochial chapel: that they so treat it; and if they treat it as a parochial chapel, I apprehend they will be bound to show it is a parochial chapel, if they are seeking for the maintenance of their rights as such parishioners. Now if they fail in proving themselves to be such parishioners, it does not therefore follow that the Corporation of Ludlow was not guilty of a breach of trust: because, whether this was a parochial chapel or not a parochial chapel, provided the complaint were recent and brought by persons competent to bring it, and in a form in which it was competent to make the complaint, I should say it was a breach of trust by the Corporation of Ludlow, whatever was the nature of the chapel. For they who took the conveyance as trustees to maintain the chapel, had no right to exercise any notion of their own, and destroy the possibility of executing that trust. But when the petitioners come to state that it is a parochial chapel—which is what they state in effect—when they say that their [92] interest is founded on their character as parishioners, I apprehend the Court is bound to try that question, because it is the issue that they offer; that we as parishioners have a right in this, and therefore if the order stops short of such an inquiry as that which the case would require, and the Court ought to have directed, I apprehend that would be an objection to the order itself.

But there is another question, which it is quite impossible to deal with in this short mode of proceeding under this Act: and that is, whether, supposing them to have the right, it is competent to them (I think this is a question that should be decided upon an information, and not upon petition); whether it is competent to them as parishioners to see this destruction taking place in the year 1773, and to make no complaint in any form to any Court until the year 1815; that is to say, whether they shall for forty-two years together acquiesce in this, and then at the end of forty-two years come into Court to have that done (for you are to look at the prayer of the petition) which, under the circumstances that have taken place during their acquiescence for forty-two years, cannot be done. Sir Thomas Plumer's order about inquiring into the value of those materials, and so on, might be right upon an information recently brought. It might be very right as to the particular objects; but could it be possible, without going a great deal further, to maintain, that even upon an information, without other parties, you could have entered upon the soil of the ground where this chapel stood, recollecting how that is now occupied, merely upon bringing before the Court a case in which you might establish the right you sought to maintain; but which you [93] could never maintain effectually without having destroyed other rights which this petition could not destroy, because we have agreed that a right granted to a third person cannot be destroyed by petition.

In the first place, it is open to the most serious consideration, whether after such a length of time, regard being had to the authorities, you can or cannot give the relief that is asked even by information. And in the next place, if there is to be an information, under all the circumstances that now attach upon this property, an information for that purpose, which is the prayer of this petition, to rebuild or restore this chapel to the state in which it was in 1769, that is the walls of it and so on; I say you cannot get the length that is necessary to do justice between all persons interested in this case, without various other parties, and without other proceedings, which proceedings with reference to other parties, I am not aware could be mixed up in this petition; after you have got this proceeding upon petition, you must begin the other proceedings by information, to set aside the lease, and obtain those directions consequential upon the destruction of the lease, to carry this charitable institution and all its purposes into effect.

The result upon the whole of my opinion is, that in making this order, Sir Thomas Plumer has made an order upon a petition which ought only to have been made upon an information; and I think it but justice to him to repeat, that I have fallen into that error myself. Let it however be recollected, in justice to Sir Thomas Plumer and myself, that a great deal of what has now been stated in objection to those proceedings, is stated upon a further consideration of the proceedings, upon matter, in many respects, [94] additional to all that the judges in both the Courts below heard upon the subject. The public is much indebted to Mr. Hart for bringing this matter before this House, in order that the true intent and meaning of the Act of Parliament may be better understood, and that we may avoid in future those errors which the Court has fallen into, not in this case only, but I am afraid in many other cases.

There is not the least pretence for dismissing those orders with costs; both the parties have been very much to blame in the business; the Corporation never ought to have taken this trust, and the manner in which they have dealt with it, does not entitle them to costs. It is right that the order in the Court below should be reversed, without costs on either side.

After these opinions had been delivered, the Attorney General and Mr. Hart suggested that certain costs paid by them under an order, which by the judgment now about to be pronounced, was ascertained to be erroneous, should be refunded.

Lord Redesdale: It is the fault of the Corporation of Ludlow to have suffered this case to go on without making earlier application to this House; if they have suffered any thing in consequence of not so applying, it is the result of their own negligence. When Sir Thomas Plumer, as Vice Chancellor, pronounced that order, if the Appellants were dissatisfied with it, they might immediately have appealed to the Chancellor, without having incurred any other costs than the costs of the petition. They did not think fit to do so, but they suffered the case to go on a considerable time, and then they appealed to the Chancellor, and the Chancellor affirmed the order; and I must now take it, because I have no [95] doubt that the fact was so, that it was not drawn according to the intention of the Chancellor and the direction he gave. It was their duty to have applied to discharge the order drawn up contrary to the Chancellor's intention; they have not done that; and the consequence is, as it seems to me, that the difficulty they have got into, has been owing entirely to their negligence; whether they can or ought in any manner to have those costs is another thing, but I think it is a subject upon which this House cannot act.

The Lord Chancellor: There is another reason which makes it very difficult for this House to deal with it; upon the 18th of June 1818 there is an order not appealed against, which not only directed the Appellants to pay the costs of the application then made, but goes on to order also that they should likewise pay £160 6s. 8d., the former costs.

Mr. Hart: That is not appealed from to this House, because there is upon that subject an appeal from the Rolls to the Lord Chancellor not yet decided.

Lord Chancellor: Then upon that appeal the question whether you should be ordered to pay those costs or not, may be discussed below.

Judgment reversed.

ENGLAND.

(IN APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY.)

ZACHARY MACAULAY,—Appellant; EDWARD SHACKELL, THOMAS
ARROWSMITH, and WILLIAM SHACKELL,—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. vi. 979, S. C. (Shackell v. Macaulay), 3 L. J. (O. S.), Ch. 27-42; 2 Sim. and S. 79. Considered on point as to discovery in Wilmot v. Maccabe, 1831, 4 Sim. 263, at p. 265; but see Hill v. Campbell, 1875, L. R. 10 C. P. 222 at p. 247. Commented on in Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, 1868, L. R. 6 Eq. 551 at p. 561.]

Where a libel had been published, and the person libelled elected to seek his remedy by action for damages, and to the declaration in such action, the Defendant pleaded as a justification the truth of the facts constituting the libel, and filed against the Plaintiff in the action a bill, stating that the transactions in question took place in a distant colony, and that the witnesses to the facts were not in England, and praying a Commission to examine those witnesses, and a discovery from the Defendant, and an injunction to stay proceedings in the action until the return of the Commission: Held upon a demurrer to the bill in the Court below and upon appeal that the Plaintiff in equity was intitled to the Commission and the injunction. But as to the discovery, the Plaintiff having, in his bill, charged and interrogated upon facts impeaching the character of the Defendant in Equity, and facts which might subject him to criminal proceedings, whether such Defendant is bound to answer any interrogatory which indirectly tends to establish the charge, or any interrogatory affecting him with moral turpitude or degradation of character. Quære.

Such a bill is not sustainable where it appears that the evidence is not material to prove the case at law. The bill ought therefore to shew what are the pleas at law. But if it refers to them so as to make them part of the bill, it is sufficient.

To support such a bill it is not necessary to allege that the witnesses were residing in England at the time of the publication of the libel, or have since left it.

On the 1st of July, 1824, the Respondents filed a bill in the High Court of Chancery, stating that there had been for some years back, and was in the month of October, 1823, printed and published a certain weekly newspaper, entitled "John Bull;" and that, towards the latter [97] end of the year 1823, a Controversy arose and took place relative to the State and Condition of the West India Islands and the Slave Population there; and that Edward Shackell, as the printer and publisher of the said newspaper, engaged in such controversy, and published in the said newspaper, divers articles of intelligence, arguments, and observations, in and about such controversy; and that Zachary Macaulay had been for many years actively engaged in divers societies, professing to have for their object the abolition of the slave trade, the improvement of the condition of the negro population of the West Indies, and the civilization of the west coast of Africa; that the said Zachary Macaulay took an active part in the aforesaid controversy, on the side opposite to that advocated in the said newspaper; and that on the 26th of October, 1823, in the course of such controversy, the complainant, Edward Shackell, printed and published a number of the said newspaper, in which is a passage in the words and figures following; that is to say, "Of all the papers printed in the metropolis, we believe we may take to ourselves the exclusive credit of having prognosticated the evils which have arisen to our occidental possessions from the laudable efforts of the saints. We alone have stood forward to vindicate the West Indian planter against calumny and aspersion— we alone have made the struggle in defence of his character and property— we have called with a loud voice— we have sounded the alarm. This, let it be observed, we have done alone, and in opposition to the powers that be. It cannot but be gratifying to us, therefore, to find that Government have resolved to send ships and troops immediately to the West [98] Indies, to protect the lives and property which have been put into jeopardy by the agitation of the emancipation question in Parliament. In another part of to-day's paper we have commenced an exposure of the character of Mr. Wilberforce, which we purpose to continue. It is impossible that we should suffer a person, whose name is known all over the world, to use the influence his notoriety gives him for such purposes as those to which he has been pleased to apply them; and it is only by ripping off the mask, which he has so successfully worn for many years, that we can do our duty to our country. Those who have traced the proceedings of the African Societies through a series of years—those to whom the names of Macaulay, Stephen, and Wilberforce are familiar, will do well to recall all the facts which have come to their knowledge, arrange them, sift them, and analyze them; and we think, after this calm examination, their minds will be better prepared for what we, perhaps, may have occasion to publish, than they can possibly be at this moment. Far are we from wishing to ask any question of Mr. Zachary Macaulay, the once needy overseer, now elevated into an opulent merchant, touching the sum of £129,961 11s. 11d. paid to him on account of Sierra Leone; nor do we mean to inquire how much philanthropy was blended in the exertions used to capture negroes, for which upwards of £275,000 has been paid by Government. We certainly have no desire to recur to the paltry sum of fifty guineas, which Mr. Macaulay actually took for sending home upwards of ten tons of white rice as a premium, which, we believe, he himself proposed that Government should offer. We do [99] not mean to call public notice to the fact, that in the same page of the accounts of the Sierra Leone Company, in which the sum of £14 5s. 6d. is charged for clothing African boys at school, there is an item of £107 12s. for a piece of plate to Mr. Macaulay,—to that Mr. Macaulay who served himself in all he did for the Sierra Leone Company, or the African Institution, who had obtained nearly a monopoly of the trade, constant freights for his ships, the prize agency of almost every man of war since the abolition, the agency for the governor, garrison, seizures, and a control over every thing in the colony; who, when the colony was given up to the Government, appointed himself King's Agent, which, however, the late Duke of Portland did not sanction; we care not for all this: this, if it be not sanctity and purity, is human nature, and we find no fault with Mr. Zachary Macaulay for feathering his own nest; but we must have off the mask—we must strip him of his cloak—we will have the world to see a very active, bustling, worldly, enterprising man, making his way in the world, and getting rich from a mean origin and a humble station. But we will have no cant—these Gents have gone on quite long enough—they have played their game to the extent of risking our colonies once or twice before; those colonies are now in actual danger—it is no time for half-measures—the moment to strike the blow is at hand, and the saints and their motives must be exposed. In all we have said of Mr. Macaulay, we have said nothing that could injure any man who did not set himself up as a spotless moralist, an unworldly philanthropist; perhaps Mr. Macaulay may remember to have read a petition from the [100] Nova Scotia Settlers to the Directors of the Sierra Leone Company; there is in it a paragraph, in which they complain that Mr. Clarkson had promised, amongst other things, they should be supplied with every necessary of life from the Company's stores, at the moderate advance of 10 per cent. on the prime cost and charges: that while Mr. Clarkson remained in the colony they paid no more, but since that they were charged upwards of 100 per cent. At the time alluded to Mr. Zachary Macaulay had the monopoly of trade; perhaps Mr. Macaulay may remember the time when the African Institution obtained the direction of the Crown estates in Barbice, in order to try experiments for the amelioration of the condition of slaves: the consignments fell into the hands of Messrs. Babington and Macaulay; perhaps Mr. Macaulay will recollect, that the agent for the ships of war claimed and received from the Navy Board large sums as bounty upon captured negroes, payable by government when the prizes were finally condemned: perhaps he will remember that the sentences of the Colonial Vice-Admiralty Court were reversed by the High Court of Admiralty in England—that this agent then informed the commissioners that he was ready to refund £5000 upon application, which was made, and the money paid; but it was at the same time discovered, that the agent still held in his hands £46,000 more bounty money, which he had received while the cases were under appeal; and as he could not legally hold the sum, he was compelled to refund that money also: the commissioners demanded the interest for the time he had kept the principal—the agent refused to pay it—the affair [101] was put into the hands of their solicitor—this agent was Mr. Zachary Macaulay: Mr. Macaulay may, perhaps, remember, that when Mr. Stephen wrote those letters which bear the signature 'Truth,' he mentioned the fact, that the Berbice commissioners so rigidly adhered to the principle of economy, that they borrowed the house of a friend as a place of meeting: this very Mr. Stephen subsequently signs a report, being one of the commissioners, in which it is declared that the commissioners found it necessary to appoint a secretary at £300 per annum, which included, however, the expense of an office: to this secretary then, in an unprecedented manner, the commissioners gave £300 per annum, while every other consignee of West India property carries on all the correspondence, and pays his clerks and office rent and other expenses out of his commission—this secretary was Mr. Macaulay: perhaps Mr. Macaulay will recollect the circumstance of removing the field women from town to Sandvoort, and tearing them from their husbands and families, which excited discontent, and induced the necessity of punishment: perhaps Mr. Macaulay may recollect that the object in thus breaking every tie which the abolitionists profess to maintain, and in doing that upon which the whole anger of the African Institution had in all other cases been fulminated, was considered favourable to the property of the commissioners, and the consequent augmentation of the consignments to England—the consignees were Messrs. Macaulay and Babington."

The bill then stated, that although such number of the said newspaper was published on the 26th of October, 1823, yet the said Zachary Macaulay took no [102] notice thereof until the latter end of the month of January, 1824, when the said Zachary Macaulay having discovered, as the fact was, that the several witnesses, by whose testimony the Plaintiffs could establish and prove the several allegations contained in the said passages, were abroad, and not likely to be in England, he, the said Zachary Macaulay, did, in or as of Hilary Term, 1824, commence an action at law against the Plaintiffs in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench at Westminster, and declared in such action, in or as of the said Hilary Term, 1824, and in the first count of the declaration filed in such action, the said Zachary Macaulay complained of the whole of the said passage so printed and published as aforesaid, on the 26th of October, 1823, as being, and charged the same to be, a false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel, of and concerning him, the said Zachary Macaulay; and in such count the said Zachary Macaulay set forth the whole of such passage; and in the second, third, and fourth counts of the said declaration, the said Zachary Macaulay set forth particular parts of the said passage, and laid his damages in such action at £10,000.

The bill then further stated, that by leave of the Court of King's Bench, the Plaintiffs, on the 29th May, 1824, pleaded divers pleas to the said action in justification of the several allegations contained in the said passage so printed and published on the 26th October, 1823, as aforesaid, and therein alleged, as the facts are, that the several allegations contained in the said passage were true.

The bill then charged, that Zachary Macaulay intended to press on the trial of the action, without allowing the Plaintiffs to prove the truth of the allegations contained in the said passage; and refused to con-[103]-sent to a commission or commissions issuing in the said action for the examination of such witnesses who are abroad, or to admit the truth of the allegations.

The bill then proceeded to charge that Zachary Macaulay had been engaged in the service of a Mr. M'Leod, a planter in Jamaica, and had in such service superintended the plantation of the said Mr. M'Leod, and was then in needy circumstances, and had, in manner aforesaid, been a needy overseer of a plantation in the West Indies, and had become, and when the said passage was published was, an opulent merchant; and that the sum of £129,951 11s. 11d. has been paid to the said Zachary Macaulay on account of the colony at Sierra Leone, and that upwards of £275,000 was paid by the government of this country for the capture of negroes who had been unlawfully made slaves, and in which payment the said Zachary Macaulay had an interest; and that the said Zachary Macaulay, on or about the 1st January, 1807, proposed to the said government, that a premium of five guineas per ton should thereafter be paid by the said government to such persons as should import, from the west coast of Africa to England, white rice, the produce of the said west coast of Africa, and that such proposal was needed to and adopted by the said government, and that in or about the month of January, 1808, the said Zachary Macaulay took and received of and from the said government the sum of fifty guineas, as bounty or premium for importing 10 tons of such rice; and that in certain accounts of disbursements rendered to the proprietors of the said African Institution, on or about the 31st day of December, 1813, being the accounts mentioned and referred to in the said passage, under the name and title of the accounts of [104] the Sierra Leone Company, there was an item of £14 5s. 6d. charged for clothing certain African boys at school, and in the same page of the said accounts there is an item of £107 12s. as having been paid out of the funds of the said African Institution for a piece of plate given, and which was given by the said African Institution to the said Zachary Macaulay for his supposed services, who did then and in such manner serve himself in all he did for the said Sierra Leone Company, or for the said African Institution; and that the said Zachary Macaulay did obtain a monopoly of the trade of the said Colony of Sierra Leone, constant freight for divers ships of him the said Zachary Macaulay, the prize agency of almost every man of war belonging to the navy of this country, sent to or being at the said colony since the abolition of the Slave Trade, the agency for the seizures of or by the governor and garrison of the said colony, and a control over every thing in the said colony; and that when the said colony was given up to the government of this country, in the month of January, 1808, the said Zachary Macaulay did cause or procure himself to be appointed King's agent in the said colony, but which appointment the most noble William Henry Cavendish, late Duke of Portland, then being the first lord commissioner of his late Majesty's treasury, did not sanction; and that, before the publication of the said passage, the said Zachary Macaulay had been and was a very bustling worldly enterprising man, making his way in the world, and getting rich, in the manner in the said pleas mentioned, from a mean origin and humble station; and that, in or about the month of January, 1793, a petition was presented by certain settlers from Nova Scotia, at Sierra Leone aforesaid, [105] to the said Directors of the said Sierra Leone Company, and that in the said petition there is contained a paragraph, wherein the said petitioners complain, that one Thomas Clarkson had promised that they, the said petitioners, should be supplied with every necessary of life from the stores of the said Sierra Leone Company, at the moderate advance of ten per cent. on the prime cost and charges thereof respectively; and that whilst the said Thomas Clarkson remained in the said colony of Sierra Leone, they, the said petitioners, paid no more for the said necessities of life respectively; but that, since that time, they, the said petitioners, had been and were charged for the said necessities of life upwards of one hundred per cent. advance upon such prime cost and charges respectively; and in fact, the said Thomas Clarkson did promise that the said petitioners or settlers should be supplied with necessities from the stores of the said Company, at such advance of ten per cent. as aforesaid; and that whilst the said Thomas Clarkson remained in the said colony, the said settlers or petitioners paid no more for the said necessities respectively; and that after that time, and during the years 1791 and 1792, the said settlers or petitioners were charged for the said necessities upwards of one hundred per cent. advance as aforesaid; and that during the time the said settlers or petitioners were so charged upwards of one hundred per cent. advance as aforesaid, the said Zachary Macaulay had the monopoly of the trade of the said colony of Sierra Leone; and that in or about the month of January, 1811, a certain Society, called the African Institution, obtained the direction of certain Crown estates in Barbice aforesaid, in order to try experiments for the ameliora- [106]-tion of the condition of Slaves, as in the said passage mentioned; and that the consignments of sugar and other produce, made from the said estates, fell into the hands of Messrs. Babington and Macaulay, a house of trade wherein the said Zachary Macaulay was a partner, which consignments were a source of great profit and emolument to the said house of trade; and that during the years 1809, 1810, and 1811, the said Zachary Macaulay was the agent of certain ships of war which had captured Negroes, unlawfully made Slaves, and, as such agent, claimed and received from the board of commissioners of his Majesty's Navy divers large sums of money, as a bounty upon the capture of such Negroes, payable by the said government when the respective prizes or captures were finally condemned by legal authority, and that divers sentences of the Vice-Admiralty Court of the said colony, in the said passage mentioned, upon which the said bounty was received by the said Zachary

Macaulay, were, upon appeal, reversed by the said High Court of Admiralty in England, as in the said passage mentioned; the said Zachary Macaulay, as such agent, afterwards, on or about the 1st day of January, 1812, informed the said last mentioned commissioners, that he, the said Zachary Macaulay, was then ready to refund the sum of £5000, as and being the sum due from him as such agent, upon application for the same; and that upon application being made, the said last mentioned sum of money was paid by the said Zachary Macaulay; and that it was afterwards discovered, as the fact is, that at the time when the said Zachary Macaulay so professed to have only the said sum of £5000 to refund, and when he paid the said sum of £5000, he [107] held in his hands the sum of £46,000 more bounty money, which he, as such agent, had received while the said cases were under appeal, and which last mentioned sum, because he could not lawfully retain the same, he was afterwards compelled to refund; and that such commissioners also claimed and demanded of and from the said Zachary Macaulay interest upon and for the said last mentioned sum of money, for the time during which he had so kept the same, which the said Zachary Macaulay refused to pay, and thereupon the said commissioners instructed their solicitor to proceed against the said Zachary Macaulay for the recovery thereof; and that James Stephen, the person called Mr. Stephen, in the said passage, in the month of January, 1816, wrote certain letters, respectively bearing the signature of "Truth;" and that in the said letters the said James Stephen mentioned, that the said Berbice commissioners so rigidly adhered to the principle of economy, that they borrowed the house of a friend as a place at which to hold their meetings as such commissioners, and that afterwards, and whilst the said James Stephen was one of such last mentioned commissioners, a report was made and signed by the said commissioners, whereby it was declared that the said commissioners had found it necessary to appoint a secretary, at £300 per annum to be paid to such secretary, but which salary included the expense of such secretary's office, and that the said Zachary Macaulay was appointed such secretary with such salary, as in the said report mentioned; and that such salary was an unnecessary and improper allowance to the said Zachary Macaulay in that behalf, and that all other consignees of West India property, at the same time, carried [108] on their correspondence, and paid their clerks and office rent, and other expenses, out of their commission; and that the said Zachary Macaulay, while he was such secretary, was one of the consignees of the produce of the said estates in Berbice; and that in the month of December, 1812, certain women, in the said passage mentioned, and called the field women, being the wives of certain slaves employed in the town of New Amsterdam, in Berbice, were removed from that town to certain estates at Sandvoort, in Berbice, and were thereby separated from their respective husbands and families, which excited discontent in their minds, and induced the necessity of inflicting punishment upon some of them; and that such removal of the said women was at that time considered as being advantageous to the property under the care of the said commissioners, and calculated to produce an augmentation of the consignments of sugar and other produce made by or on account of such commissioners, from Berbice to this country; and that this property, and these consignments, thus augmented and thus imported into this country, were afterwards, and during the years 1813 and 1814, consigned to the house of trade of Babington and Macaulay, and were to the said house of trade a source of great profit and emolument; and that by means of the several transactions thereinbefore charged, and in the said passage stated, the said Zachary Macaulay procured for himself great pecuniary profits and emoluments, and greatly promoted his worldly interest and advantage; that at and during all the several times of the transactions aforesaid, he the said Zachary Macaulay proposed and held himself out to the world to be a person of highly religious [109] and moral character and conduct, strenuously engaged in promoting, by all the means in his power, the cause of humanity and philanthropy, and as an unworldly philanthropist.

The bill then farther charged that the Plaintiffs could not defend themselves against the said action at law, without proving the several matters charged in the bill and contained in the pleas: that some correspondence, or written communication, had taken place between the Defendant and the Plaintiffs, and also between the Defendant and some other persons or person relating to the matters aforesaid, or some of them, from which the truth thereof would appear; and which correspondence the Defendant refused to discover, although now or lately in his power, custody, or possession, as well as divers books, etc. relating to the matters aforesaid, or some of them, from which the truth thereof would appear.

The bill then further charged, that divers of the witnesses by whom alone the Plaintiffs could prove the several matters aforesaid, were abroad in the west coast of Africa and in the West Indies, and in other parts beyond the seas: and that the Plaintiffs were unable to proceed to trial in the said action, without having one or more commissions for the examination of such witnesses.

The bill then contained interrogatories adapted to all the facts before stated and charged: called upon the Defendant to produce all letters, etc. and prayed for a commission or commissions for the examination of witnesses residing on the west coast of Africa, and in the West Indies: and that the Plaintiff might have the benefit of the testimony of such witnesses respectively on the trial of the said action; and that [110] in the mean while the Defendant might be restrained, etc.

To this bill the Defendant put in a demurrer, shewing for cause, that the complainants have not, in and by their said bill, shewn any right or title to the discovery, or to the commission and injunction thereby sought; and for further cause of demurrer, that the discovery and commission, thereby sought, appear, on the face of the bill, to be sought in aid of the said complainants' defence to an action therein mentioned to have been brought against them by this Defendant for a defamatory libel, by the said bill admitted to have been published by the said complainant Edward Shackell, against the Defendant, the publication of which libel, as appears on the face of the said bill, was an indictable offence; and for further cause of demurrer, that the discovery and commission sought by the said bill appear, on the face of the said bill, to be sought for the purpose of enabling the said complainants to prove, on the trial of the said action, the alleged truth of certain pleas therein mentioned to have been pleaded by the said complainants to the said action, but which pleas are not in the said bill set forth with sufficient distinctness and particularity to enable the Court to ascertain whether the discovery and commission sought by the said bill are material to the defence of the said action; and for further cause of demurrer, as to so much of the said bill as seeks any discovery touching the matters contained in the libel, or statement therein set forth, and whereupon the said action is founded, the Defendant shewed, that such matters appear on the face of the bill to be of a scandalous and defamatory nature against the Defendant, and imputing to him moral [111] turpitude; and as to the residue of the said bill the Defendant shewed, that it doth not appear on the face of the said bill that the witnesses, whom the said complainants seek to examine under the commission thereby prayed, or any or either of them, were or was resident in this country at the time of the publication of the libel or statement in the said bill mentioned, or have or hath, at any time since such publication, left this country, or gone into parts beyond the seas.

On the 19th of July, 1824, the demurrer came on to be argued before the Lord Chancellor, who ordered that it should be over-ruled.

Upon the over-ruling of the demurrer, an order was made, bearing date the 20th day of July, 1824, on the motion of the Respondent, that an injunction should be awarded for stay of the Appellant's proceedings at law, until the Appellant should fully answer the bill, and the Court should make order to the contrary; but the Appellant was in the mean time at liberty to call for a plea and proceed to trial therein, and for want of a plea to enter up judgment; but execution was thereby stayed.

On the same 20th of July, 1824, an order was made that the injunction should extend to stay trial.

On the 22d of December, 1824, upon the motion of the Respondents, and upon hearing read an affidavit of the Respondents, and an affidavit of the Appellant, it was ordered that the Respondents should be at liberty to sue out one or more commission or commissions for the examination of witnesses at Sierra Leone, and such of the West India islands as the Respondents might be [112] advised, returnable without delay, with the usual directions in that behalf: and it was ordered, that the injunction should extend to stay trial of the said action until the return of the said commission or commissions.

The Appellant, by his affidavit, in opposition to the motion, specifically, and in detail, denied the truth of the charges and insinuations contained in the alleged libel, and of the allegations in the bill founded upon it; and further said, that there were persons resident in this country, by whose testimony the truth of the matters in issue might be ascertained; and he verily believed, that although there were not nor was any witnesses or witness residing in the West Indies, or at Sierra Leone, whose testimony, if true, would enable the Respondents to defend the action, or enable them to prove the pleas therein pleaded; yet the Appellant believed that in consequence of the prejudices, irritation, and hostility, prevailing against him in the West Indies on the account therein mentioned, he could not safely put his character upon trial on evidence to be produced in the West Indies by commission; and the rather because the Appellant did not believe that he could, in the West Indies, obtain commissioners or agents to execute, or attend the execution, of such commission, who would be willing to encounter the danger and obloquy to which a faithful execution of their duty would expose them; and because the Appellant was advised, that it was doubtful whether a witness, giving false evidence under such commission, could be indicted for perjury there; and because if such indictment would lie, and an indictment for perjury were preferred in the West Indies [113] against a witness giving such false evidence, the prejudices, and hostility, and irritation against the Appellant, prevailing in the West Indies on the account therein mentioned, were so strong, that there would be no prospect of such indictment being found, or, should the same be found, of its being fairly tried.

The appeal was presented against the orders over-ruling the demurrer, and directing the commission, on the ground that the publication of the libel being an indictable offence, the Respondents were not entitled to the assistance of a court of equity, their case being founded upon and arising out of the commission by them of such indictable offence; and that there was no precedent of a bill for a discovery and commission in aid of pleas to an action for libel, averring the truth of the matters contained in the libel; and the establishing of such a precedent would put an end to actions for libel—the only effectual mode of vindicating character.

For the Appellants: Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Pepys.

For the Respondents: The Attorney General Mr. Sugden, and (Mr. Wakefield.)

In the course of the argument the following observations were made.*

Mr. Shadwell in argument having referred to the cases upon bills complaining of piracy of literary productions in which the courts of equity had refused injunction and account upon the ground that the works alleged to be pirated were libellous or crimi-[114]-nal, and such as could not be made the subject of an action as matters of property,† put the case of an action for a libel against the publisher of Harriette Wilson's Memoirs, and asked whether the peers libelled in that work might be compelled to answer all the interrogatories which might be put to them in a bill of discovery?

The Lord Chancellor: In the case you put, Mr. Stockdale might have pleaded that the whole matter was true. If he could have pleaded that the whole matter was true, are there any cases which show that he shall not have the benefit of the usual proceedings to prove that?

On that part of the demurrer which raised the question, whether the pleas at law were set forth in the bill in equity with sufficient distinctness and particularity—Mr. Shadwell having referred to a case of Templer v. Lonsdale,‡ in which the Lord Chancellor refused a commission.

The Lord Chancellor observed: What the Plaintiff in equity says here is this: "That the several allegations contained in the said passage (i.e. of the libel) are true, ‡ Sittings after Hil. Term, 1827. The reporter has been informed by Mr. Russel, who was counsel in the case, that the bill was originally for a discovery and commission, but the Lord Chancellor, doubting whether the evidence proposed to be obtained would be a defence at law, and whether it was not a case for relief in equity, refused the commission, but gave leave to amend the bill, by turning it into a bill for relief.

as by the said pleas, reference being thereunto had, will appear." Now in the [115] very case you refer to, that would enable the Chancellor to call for the pleadings; and the Chancellor did call for them.—I believe it is a little new, but I go along with you. I think when the Court of Chancery is applied to for a commission, it ought to see that the commission can be of use to prove something to establish the Plaintiff's case, or to establish the Defendant's case.

The Lord Chancellor: This demurrer must admit the truth of that which is alleged in the bill. Then there is an express allegation in the bill that the allegations contained in the passage which is called a libellous passage are true.

The Lord Chancellor: If you prevail upon the House to reverse the order respecting the demurrer, all the rest falls to the ground, but in all the cases I have found an answer is put in. The question then will be, supposing the House support the order made upon the demurrer, as to which I say nothing: supposing you cannot affect that order, are you at all regular in filing an affidavit instead of putting in an answer? I put that to you as a point of practice.

To this it was answered, that the application (for the commission) being made on affidavit, it was regular to file an affidavit in answer; and that the Lord Chancellor in a former stage of the proceeding permitted the affidavit to be read without objection.

Mr. Shadwell having cited the practice in the King's Bench of putting off trials, and changing the venue on proof that a fair trial cannot be had on account of existing prejudices; the Lord Chancellor said: the cases which you mention perhaps are not quite similar to a case in which it is contended that [116] if there are witnesses in one part of the world, and those the only witnesses who can prove the fact, because they may be prejudiced they are never to be examined in a cause.

The Lord Chancellor: The question is, whether a court of equity should entertain a case of this sort, regard being had to the fact that it relates to an action brought that cannot be supported if a justification is made out, viz. the truth of the alleged libel.

Mr. Pepys having argued that the cases in the House of Lords * were distinguishable; that no precedent of such a bill was to be found, and citing the case of Montague v. Dudman (2 Ves. 397), in which Lord Hardwicke said, that no such bill of discovery as in that case having ever been filed, he would go by the rule of Littleton, and would not make a precedent.

The Lord Chancellor observed: There are I think three (two of them were consolidated) cases in the House of Lords; in one (Nicol v. Ferelst) of them it is quite clear, (is it not?) that the person who brought his action at law might have indicted the defendants; but instead of indicting the defendants, he brought an action for damages; and there this House allowed a bill of this kind to be filed, to have a commission abroad for the purpose of assisting a defence to be made to that action for damages.

The difficulty I have is to distinguish this thing called libel from a case of crime; and you are not quite sure that it can be called a libel till found to be so. No doubt in one of these cases they might have [117] been indicted for conspiracy. I set off against the great authority of Lord Hardwicke, the considerable authority of this House.

The Lord Chancellor: Lord Mansfield (I am speaking from memory) laid down a doctrine, that a party should not proceed both civilly and criminally: he should have his choice of an action or an indictment, but not both.† Then if a party chooses to give up an indictment, and brings an action, has he a right to say that the public are concerned? On applying for an information you must make an affidavit that the facts alleged are not true.

The case having been put of a libel on a merchant, alleging his insolvency, an † See Rex v. Sparrow, 2 T. R. 198, where upon application for leave to file a criminal information for a libel, the applicant was put to his election, and Ashurst J. said, it was of course, if the information was granted to stay proceedings in an action for the same cause.

action for damages, a plea in justification of the truth of the allegation, and a bill of discovery against the merchant, calling upon him to disclose all the accounts of his trade. The Lord Chancellor observed :

You must consider hard cases on both sides, because if a merchant had admitted insolvency fifty times over wholly as between himself and another party, yet if he chose to indict the man for stating it, the truth could not be given in evidence at all, and the verdict would be as much against conscience in one case as in the other. There is a notion afloat that a man should be at liberty to prove the truth of a libel. A defendant in cases that may be put may be in a very hard situation upon an indictment that he cannot prove the truth though he might be able to do it by fifty witnesses.

[118] The law puts it in this way: if you make your complaint on the general ground of mischief to the public, you must do it in the shape of indictment, and there is no defence if the fact is proved: but if you say you will give the public no protection but bring a civil action, then the question is, whether the law does not consider it is a question between A and B, and not between the public and an offender.

The law is (whether wise or not) that if a man proves the truth of the libel in an action, you have no right to complain of it: then the question really comes round to this, whether the defendant in an action shall be confined to such modes of proof as a court of law enables him to have or not; and that brings another which is a difficult question, whether a court of law which has the power to grant or not to grant a commission, would, in the fair exercise of judicial discretion, be justified in refusing such a commission if the proceeding were by action.

It having been said in argument, that it was the rule of the courts of common law not to permit a party to be delayed in his action by an application for a commission, unless he was in possession of facts and evidence to make out the truth of the libel at the time when it was published.

The Lord Chancellor observed, One of the first questions is, how that rule was introduced putting off the action till the commission returned: and the next question is, whether it is a sound rule, for I may have the greatest possible belief that I can prove the truth of the libel when I wrote the libel, but cannot do it at the time of the action. Suppose it related to a conversation passing between Mr. Pepys, the Attorney General, and myself, that [119] you two shall have been made judges in India, does the Court of King's Bench, because you do not happen to be here but in India (when the libel is published) though here when the thing complained of occurred, will the Court say you shall proceed though I have fifty witnesses who could prove the fact, if I could have them examined: and it is to be recollected that upon interlocutory orders in a court of law, there is no appeal to this House: but in granting commissions in a court of equity, thank God, there is an appeal to this House.

The Lord Chancellor: The law takes an odd turn in those things. The original jurisdiction of granting commissions was under the great seal, because no commission at one time could be granted in common law courts. Then having adopted them there on their own authority, they pretend to tell us when we shall or shall not direct them.

It is a great thing for the subject that he may come here to appeal against an injudicious exercise of the jurisdiction of a court of equity, but in respect of commissions issuing from a court of common law the subject has no remedy at all.

What antiquity has that rule (of granting commissions in a Court of law)? It is quite modern, is it not? I am sure it was not the rule some little time ago. Is there not a case of this sort that may arise in the Court of King's Bench? If an action is brought, the party who is the defendant says, I had two or three witnesses here at the time when I did that of which you complain, who have since in the course of their business gone to India, and I wish to have a commission to examine them. I put my-[120]self upon the ground that you, the Court of King's Bench, require me to take; I make an affidavit that they were here when I published this: what would the Court of King's Bench say to that? It appears that they would grant a commission to aid a defence against a libel when the plaintiff was proceeding for damages. If in such a case the Court of King's Bench would grant a commission.

that would reduce the case to this, whether the Court of Chancery is to act upon its own rules or upon theirs.

It having been said in the argument that the interrogatories of the bill calling upon the Defendant to state his origin and the history of his life, and all the means by which he had advanced his worldly interests, and to set out all profits made by him in trade, and a schedule of all correspondence and all the facts relating to the matters stated and charged in the bill, with an account of his profits in trade, etc., could not be answered, and were calculated only for delay and to stifle the action, not to aid the defence to it,

The Lord Chancellor said: Was there any argument on the particular passages in the Court below, or only a general argument? It is a very material part of the case: Mr. Sugden will recollect in a late case (Templer v. Lonsdale, ante p. 114) that it was thought not inconsistent to look into the declaration (and pleas) in order to see how far the Court of Chancery ought or ought not to grant a commission. If it appeared upon the pleas pleaded at law that the case which is sought to be made out in equity would not constitute a defence at law I would not let a commission go.

[121] Mr. Pepys having cited the case of Moodalay v. Morton, as containing, in the argument of Mr. Madocks, as reported (1 B. C. C. 469), a statement of the case of Nicol v. Verelst differing from the report in Brown's Parliamentary Cases,

The Lord Chancellor said: In that case a commission was granted, and the demurrer was overruled.

Upon the argument that the answer to some of the interrogatories might furnish matter of and expose the party to indictment the Lord Chancellor observed:

In this case of Macaulay v. Shackell (2 Sim. and Stu. 79) the report of the case before the Vice Chancellor concludes in these words, "The report of Kensington v. White is too loose to afford a principle: and underwriting causes are not to be reasoned upon as furnishing general rules;" what I understand his Honor to mean, is with respect to the practice in underwriting causes, which is adding many together by the rules of consolidation: but unless they are going on in the Court of Exchequer in a way different from what they did when I had the honour of practising there, it is the practice to file such bills, and the parties are obliged to answer the underwriters as to those frauds which are charged.

Unless you find the policy of insurance has been found to be affected by gross frauds, there have not been many cases in which the underwriters have defended themselves by bringing bills of discovery.

When I attended the Court of Exchequer, underwriters frequently brought the assured into the Court, to be relieved against their liability in respect [122] of the assured's actions against them, by pleading frauds, which frauds would have been indictable.

It being suggested by the counsel that the observation of the Vice Chancellor in Kensington v. White, applied only to the question of multifariousness, which was the point in the case before him,

The Lord Chancellor said: Take it for granted that it does: but it brings back to my mind a class of indictment cases in which this jurisdiction was exercised.

The Lord Chancellor (at the conclusion of the Argument): It is not my intention to advise your Lordships to proceed to judgment at present. I always wish to be extremely cautious in forming an opinion on an appeal from a judgment of my own, and I requested of the Noble Lord (Redesdale), who is now come to the House, conceiving it might be possible, as the fact has happened, that there might be demands made upon his time which would not allow him to attend here.—I requested him to take the papers with him, to read them, and form his opinion upon them. I believe he would confirm me if I were to state that, upon his review of what is to be found upon the papers, he does not think there is any ground for this Appeal: but I shall feel it my duty to state to him, with as much impartiality as I am able, all that has been represented by Counsel from the bar, before I proceed to give my own judgment upon the subject.

I think the question lies in a very narrow compass. There has been a great deal said about the mode which Mr. Macaulay has adopted with respect to making this a question of character, and I am never in the habit of looking upon that as an im-[123]-proper motive. Every man whose heart is in the right place, would desire that parties should be reasonably indulged in endeavouring to set their character right, but in truth, as a court of justice, we have nothing to do with that. The single question is, whether Mr. Macaulay, having thought proper to bring an action for damages for that which, considered with reference to what is alleged, and which may or may not hereafter be proved, may be stated prima facie to be or not to be a libel, whether, according to the law of this country, the Defendants, from whom these damages are asked, can in that case of alleged libel, bring a bill in a court of equity, for the purpose of proving the truth of that which is stated in the papers to be a libel, it being true that if he justifies his act by alleging and proving the truth of what he has said, he has a valid defence to that action; that is purely the question before us. Upon that question, after I have had an opportunity of doing the parties the justice of stating to the Noble and Learned Lord, as fully as I can, the arguments used on both sides, I shall proceed to give my humble advice to the House on the matter of the Appeal.

The Lord Chancellor: This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Chancery, pronounced by myself, and I therefore certainly felt a great anxiety that it should be submitted to the consideration of a Noble and Learned Lord, whose knowledge in the practice of the Court of Chancery, I think I may venture to say, is not excelled by that of any other person in his Majesty's dominions, and who has been at the head of the Court of Chancery in Ireland. It appears to me to be extremely desirable that his [124] opinion should be obtained upon the subject. I have asked him, therefore, as he was not present at the hearing, to peruse the cases which have been laid upon the table, and I have taken upon myself the duty, which I hope I have faithfully executed, of stating to him the several arguments which have been pressed in objection to the order of the Court below, as well as every other which has occurred to myself. If ever I had any doubt upon this case, after consideration that doubt has been removed. I believe I may venture to say, that the Noble Lord to whom I have alluded has no doubt whatever upon this case, after having read the papers upon this subject, and heard all which could be stated to him in opposition to that judgment.

The case is no more than this, Mr. Macaulay considers himself injured by the publication of an alleged libel. When a libel is published, the person who is the object of that libel has different modes of pursuing the person who has thought proper so to libel him; he may apply to a grand jury, and if they find a bill of indictment, inasmuch as that is a proceeding which has its principle in the allegation, that there is a breach of the public peace, and that is, therefore, a proceeding rather on account of the public injury than the private right, the law does not allow the truth of that libel to be given in evidence in that proceeding. There is another mode of proceeding, a sort of criminal proceeding, and that is by applying to the Court of King's Bench for an information. That Court is in the habit of saying, (and with great propriety, if I may humbly state an opinion upon that.) If you will have this extraordinary remedy by information, you must deny the truth of the libel; if you do not think proper to do that, you [125] may proceed by indictment; but we will not give you this extraordinary remedy. In this case Mr. Macaulay (to do him justice, it should be observed,) states, in the affidavit he has filed, that his counsel advised him, for reasons that are represented, not to apply to the Court of King's Bench for an information. It is not my design to offer any opinion to your Lordships with respect to that advice, it is sufficient to say that that proceeding was not adopted; the proceeding by indictment was not adopted; and the reason given for proceeding by action is undoubtedly a reason that does great credit to the person who does proceed in that mode, namely, that his intention is to vindicate his character and not to vindicate the public in respect of the alleged tendency to a breach of the peace; but it is perfectly settled law that if a person brings an action for damages occasioned by a libel, the party proceeded against may justify the alleged libel by stating in his plea that what he has so said and what is so alleged to be libellous, is perfectly true: the law having established this doctrine, that for the publication of truth a man has no right to complain, (though the libel may tend to a breach of the peace,) and seek to receive damages if that which is alleged to be a libel is true.

There has been a great deal of observation upon the doctrine applying to the law of libel, that if the party is indicted, he shall not be at liberty to show the truth of the libel. The reason of that, as we collect it from our books, is that it is a breach of the public peace, that is the thing complained of, and whether the libel be true or false it may equally tend to a breach of the peace, therefore the mere truth of the libel shall not excuse the libel: but if the person [126] who may proceed on behalf of the public thinks fit to proceed on behalf of himself for damages, the law has always said, as far as I can trace it, that the defendant may plead the truth of the fact in answer to that action for damages.

In this case, such an action having been brought, the Respondents filed a bill in the Court of Chancery for a discovery and for a commission to examine witnesses abroad. To this bill a demurrer was put in, and a demurrer may (to use a familiar expression) cover a great deal too much; the demurrer was therefore overruled: and I cannot conceive that it is possible in any view of this case to say that that demurrer could be allowed so far as it seeks to defend a party against a commission, unless the case is of such a particular nature that a court of equity ought not to interfere at all; the demurrer certainly appears to have covered a great deal too much.

Now the way in which this has been put at the bar is this: It is said that you shall not file a bill of this sort in a case where the matter alleged in the action at law amounts to an indictable offence. In the first place, I take that to be against precedent; in the next place, I doubt whether it is consistent with reason: because if a party chooses to consider the matter not as an indictable offence, and for his own benefit to receive a recompense in damages, it appears to me a little difficult to contend that he can with propriety say, though I am not pursuing this on the ground of its being an indictable offence, yet I do object to you, the defendant, that the matter I am now proceeding upon is an indictable offence, and therefore you shall not have the common defences which the subjects of this country have in general cases in actions for damages.

[127] It is said, moreover, that a libeller has no right to come into a court of equity. Now in the first place, one answer to that is, that you cannot consider it as more (whatever may be your individual opinion) than an alleged libel. In the next place, if the party thinks proper to go into a court of law for a recompense in matter of damages, that makes it a civil action, and making it a civil action, the question arises whether the Defendant has not as good a right to pursue his defence to it as a civil proceeding as the Plaintiff has to pursue it as a civil proceeding.

Cases have been alluded to in which a court of equity has said, we will take no cognizance of the matter: in a case of copyright, for instance, it was argued at the bar that if a man published an obscene book, such a one as was mentioned at the bar about Mrs. Harriette Wilson, or if a man thinks proper to publish a book reflecting on Christianity: if such a man comes into a court of equity for the purpose of maintaining his copyright, and having an injunction against the violation of it, the Court will say, No; you do not come here with clean hands, and we will not assist you in the way in which you apply that we should assist you. But these cases are founded in property. The reason why the Court will not interfere in those cases is, that it has no criminal jurisdiction. A court of equity has no criminal jurisdiction, but it lends its assistance to a man who has, in the view of the law, a right of property, and who makes out that an action at law will not be a sufficient remedy and protection against intruding upon his publication. But in the case which has been put, the answer of a court of equity immediately on a bill being filed is this:—Inasmuch as your suit here is [128] founded on property, and that the law will not acknowledge you can have any property in such a book as this, we cannot assist you because the law has determined that you have not that property, which is the only thing we could protect. Now to take the instance of that book, the Life of Harriette Wilson, which has been talked of at the bar, I recollect, I think, to have read in the newspapers, that an action was tried, I believe, in the Court of Common Pleas, brought by a man for his labour in printing and publishing that book. The court of law, according to the representation made in the document to which I allude, said, You shall not recover in that action: the labour you have expended in producing a book which ought never to have seen the light is not labour in respect of which you can have any right. And here let me suppose that an action of libel had been brought on that very book, and I am now putting the case which was put at the bar, I apprehend that it would have been impossible consistently with precedent and what we know has been considered law to say, that if that action had been brought and a civil right was to be tried, a court of equity would not assist the Defendant in that action in trying, according to what was alleged upon the plea of justification, the fact, whether that justification was truly or not truly pleaded?

In reference to the facts of this case (the supposed facts, for let it not be understood that I am presuming to say that one word of the bill is founded in fact,) the alleged facts are supposed to have arisen out of what passed, I think, at Sierra Leone, and other places abroad, I believe, in the West Indies. To be sure prejudice must have reached a most monstrous height, if the affidavit in this case is [129] correct, that neither at Sierra Leone nor in any part of the West Indies, is it possible to have either the witnesses or the grand jury, or any thing else that is concerned in the administration of justice, so impartial, as to have a commission fairly executed there, or indeed any other proceedings in the courts of law fairly executed between these parties. I think I must be permitted to say, that on an allegation of that kind, it would be quite impossible for any court of justice in this country to proceed at all.

I cannot see what difference there is between one indictable offence and another indictable offence. I have here those cases which have been alluded to at the bar. I mean the case of Davie v. Forrester, and two others, in which it appears to have been clearly the opinion of the courts below, and the opinion of your Lordships' House, that although the matters of allegation amounted to indictable offences, yet if the parties thought proper to bring actions, the Defendants in respect of facts which happened abroad, would be entitled to have commissions to examine witnesses, and the fact that the circumstances alleged applied to indictable offences which unquestionably they did, was not a fact which this House thought ought to repel the right to the common defences in civil actions, as those defences were either to be made in a court of law or a court of equity.

It is very true that the House proceeded differently in those cases which are related in the books I now have in my hand, but then they did not proceed differently in respect of the general principle on which they decided the cases, but they proceeded differently on the different circumstances of each: in both cases, as it appeared to me, acknowledging [130] the general right of the subject to conduct his defence in the way I have stated, in case the party thought fit to proceed by way of civil remedy, I will read to your Lordships the reasons assigned in one of those cases, by way of explaining the view which was taken of this question. It may not be improper to preface the reading of them, by stating that it seems to have been some time ago the notion that a court of common law could not award these commissions abroad; and indeed now the law upon that subject stands in a very singular state, because if a plaintiff brings an action against a defendant, in the Court of King's Bench, and if that defendant wants a discovery, he must, of course, go to a court of equity. If he wants a commission to examine witnesses, he must likewise go to a court of equity, unless the plaintiffs will consent that he shall have such a commission, and if the plaintiff will not consent, the mode which that court has thought proper to adopt, is to say, your cause shall not be tried, till you do consent; that is the mode in which they make a volunteer of a man.

What the state of the law was, at that time, in a court of equity, as laid down in this book (the printed cases in D. P.), I think may be pretty well ascertained from the case of Davie v. Forrester, as it was stated by Lord Thurlow, then Attorney General, and by Mr. Madocks, whom some of us remember as a pleader very well versed in equity. The order was for a commission abroad, and so on, and the reasons in support of it are these: "The order appealed from, proceeds upon a fundamental maxim in the administration of justice, namely, that both sides are to be heard, and the parties are to be heard by their evidence and wit[131]nesses to matters of fact. The end of the order in question, which was for a commission, is to give the Respondents an opportunity of bringing over their evidence from a foreign country, to maintain the truth of the justification which they have pleaded; the courts of law pay an attention to audi alteram partem, as far as the powers of a court of law can go, and therefore will put off trials, upon an affidavit made by the Defendant, showing that he has material witnesses abroad, who are expected home in a reasonable time it not being the fault but the misfortune of the party, that his witnesses are not within the reach of the process of the Court, whereby their attendance on the trial may be compelled. This reasoning goes only to the putting off the trial where there are witnesses abroad who are expected to be here in a reasonable time, and not when the witnesses were not expected to be here, and their testimony was to be sought by sending a commission to them instead of waiting for their coming home here to be examined; but where witnesses reside abroad, and cannot or will not personally attend in England, the power of the courts of law is at an end, as they have no means of examining witnesses abroad; but the Court of Chancery having an authority to issue commissions, under the great seal, for various purposes, and amongst others for examining witnesses in causes in that Court, the suitors Defendants at law have availed themselves of the power of the Court of Chancery to come in and supply the failure of justice, by preferring their bills there, containing a state of their case, and of the proceedings at law, with the Defendants' misfortune that their witnesses being resident [132] abroad, and not compellable to appear at the trial, they cannot have the benefit of their testimony: and therefore praying that the Court will relieve them against this accident, and grant them a commission for the examination of their witnesses, to the end that their depositions may be read at law: and as it would be nugatory to try the cause without evidence, praying also that the Plaintiff at law may be restrained, by injunction, from proceeding in the meantime, till the return of the commission. Both the Court of Chancery and of Exchequer, as courts of equity, have always entertained these bills as belonging to one of their great sources of jurisdiction, the relief against such accidents as are beyond the power of courts of law to aid." (Now if the courts of law assume to themselves a power to interfere, I believe I may venture to say, that that is no ground for destroying the more ancient jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery: there are many instances in which the courts of law maintain actions on equitable principles.) "But as such applications occasion a delay to the Plaintiff at law, therefore courts of equity have regulated the practice of issuing injunctions, in such cases, with great care and caution. The injunction issues if the Plaintiff at law delays appearing to or answering the bill beyond the periods allowed by the Court;" (and I will just observe in passing, that it is one thing to put in an answer to such a bill, and quite a different thing to file an affidavit, because there is no man who does not know that to answer a great many questions put to him, is not quite so easy an operation as to make an affidavit, stating what he is pleased to state, without having any questions asked of him;) "because it is unjust that [133] he should take advantage of his own contumacy or delay to distress the Defendant."

Then he proceeds to state, "policies of insurance have afforded numberless occasions for the exercise of this jurisdiction in courts of equity, where the underwriter being sued upon a policy made upon a ship in foreign parts, has discovered a fraud in the policy by misrepresentation of the true state of the ship at the time, but cannot show the fraud in proof, because his witnesses are in foreign parts, and many other foreign transactions have afforded like occasions, so that the use of such bills has been long established, and the increase of commerce has augmented their use."

Now I believe no lawyer of any experience in the Courts of Westminster Hall, particularly of proceedings in the Exchequer with reference to matters of this kind, can hesitate for one moment to say that, in many cases, there have been indictable offences stated as the grounds of defence against policies of insurance, frauds which might have been the subject of indictment. What the Courts have said is this: If you do not choose to indict for those frauds, you make it a civil action to all intents and purposes: and if that be true as to one species of indictable offence, it does not appear to me on what ground it is not true as to another species of indictable offence. Cases must arise from time to time which are new cases in specie, but which are not new cases with respect to the general principle by which they must be decided. With reference to these cases in the Exchequer, a very learned Counsel stated at your Lordships' bar, that they were so familiar that they have a sort of repository or pigeon-hole, I think he called it, out of which a sort of [134] form or precedent was drawn, and the bill might be all false from the beginning to the end: but still the Court proceeded upon it. Whether that way of filing a bill should or should not be approved or disapproved is one question; but the fact that the courts of equity, which have not been informed how those bills have been framed, always act upon those bills, only tends to make the precedent the stronger, to show that courts of equity will act where there are allegations of that kind made, which those courts must suppose to have been properly made until the contrary is shown. Upon the whole, therefore, it does appear to me, that it is impossible to distinguish this case from other cases of indictable offences where this species of remedy has been given in courts of equity.

I do not enter here into the consideration whether there have not been too many questions asked upon this bill; * whether there have not been questions asked upon this bill that may not perhaps be quite pertinent to the business in hand; nor do I now enter at all into the consideration whether the commission granted should or should not be more or less limited either as to the subjects into which those are to inquire who are authorized by that commission to make inquiry, or whether there should or should not be a limitation in point of time within which the commission is to be returned; [135] because all those matters I apprehend may be adjusted by application to the Court below; and the Courts below are in the constant habit of regulating those things as justice may require. But to say that the remedy which is given in other cases shall be withheld entirely in this case is a proposition to which I certainly could not feel myself authorized to assent in giving judgment in the Court below. On the best consideration I have been able to give this case, I can see no reason for thinking that that judgment was wrong in its principle; and I have the satisfaction to know that the Noble and Learned Lord to whom I allude, has certainly not been able to introduce into his mind so much of doubt as I have introduced occasionally, in considering this case, into my mind; but which certainly has been removed from that mind by the consideration and attention I have given to the subject. I shall therefore propose to your Lordships, on the usual questions being put, that this judgment be reversed, to say not content; which, if adopted by the House, has the effect of affirming the decree below.

I should be sorry to part with this case without saying, that I desire that it may be understood, that nothing which falls from me is to be considered as stating any opinion of mine with respect to the truth of one word that is contained in this publication. The simple question before us is this: A, having brought an action, and B, having justified by pleading that what he has stated in his publication is true, the simple question is—Is B, entitled to the ordinary means of proving the truth of his pleas of justification? The case, I think, may be simply so put. I am now speaking at the close, perhaps, of a very [136] long judicial life; and certainly at a period very much advanced in my professional life. And I take upon myself to say, that I do not know anything more incumbent upon Counsel and upon Judges, than to take care to confine their observations to the cases before them, both in pleading and in judgment, in such a manner as to affect the character and honor of parties as little as possible, and as the circumstances of the case will admit. I will take the liberty to add, that that must be done on the part of the Judge without favor; and it is a singular thing, that the person who has now the honor to address your Lordships, and whose anonymous correspondence may be called Legion, has received a letter of admonition from some such correspondent; which letter of admonition informs him, that all the men of eminence at the bar think that this decision is wrong, and that it is produced by the affection which the Lord Chancellor is supposed to have had for some Mr. Shackell, or some such gentleman. I wish my anonymous correspondent would be so good as to give me his name, and I think I could satisfy him that I have never disgraced myself by any partiality towards any suitor whatever. Why I should do it in this particular case is to me a mystery. It may be otherwise to him. Had he given me an opportunity of answering his letter in another way, I should have done so; but I can only answer it in this way by assuring him, that if he had made any such assertion I should have been entitled to have proved that it was a libel; but if I had complained of that as a libel in a civil action, I should certainly have said that he was very well entitled to file a bill of discovery, and to have had a commission to examine his witnesses abroad; for [137] I do not believe he would have found one in the country in which I have the honor to administer justice, knowing what had been my practice, who would have confirmed by his testimony a slander so base as that is.

* Upon the hearing in the Court below, the Lord Chancellor, in giving judgment, alluded to a passage in Mr. Philipps' Law of Evidence (p. 289), in which is discussed the rule of the courts of common law, as to putting a question to a witness, tending to degrade his character: the Lord Chancellor said, "he disapproved of the practice of leaving the witness to refuse to answer such question, and directing or permitting the jury to draw from his silence, an inference unfavourable to his character."

The only question remaining is, whether in this case your Lordships should give costs. Now it is a case that in its particular kind is new, and on that ground I do not recommend to your Lordships to give costs.

(COURT OF KING'S BENCH.)

JOHN POULETT, Administrator, etc.,—Plaintiff in Error; GEORGE WIGHTMAN,—Defendant in Error.

The Defendant in an action having died intestate after interlocutory judgment, and a writ of inquest of damages executed; but before it was returned, the Plaintiff declared in scire facias against the administrator, who pleaded plene administravit, and set forth in his pleas divers specialties due and owing from the intestate, and charging the estate. The Plaintiff having replied, admitting the truth of the pleas, and praying judgment and execution of the goods of the intestate quando acciderint, entered up final judgment, "to have execution against the Defendant as administrator according to the force, form and effect of the said recovery;" no recovery having been before stated in any part of the proceedings on the record, and no final judgment having been given in the original action, and no provision being made by the judgment for the payment of the specialty debts.—Held that the judgment was erroneous, and it was reversed with costs.

George Wightman, in Michaelmas term, 1811, commenced an action of trespass on the case upon promises against the Honourable Vere Poulett, since deceased, by original writ of Capias ad Respondendum, returnable in the King's Bench, to recover damages against him for the non-performance of the several promises and undertakings whereof George Wightman in the declaration in that suit complained, and such proceedings were thereupon afterwards had in Hilary term then next, that it was considered by the Court that George Wightman ought to recover his damage on occasion of the non-performance of the said several promises and undertakings, and thereupon afterwards in that same Hilary term [139] a writ of inquiry of damages, directed to the Sheriff of Middlesex, was issued out of the Court returnable, etc., commanding the Sheriff by the oath of twelve, etc., to inquire what damages George Wightman had sustained, as well by means of the premises as for his costs, etc. After interlocutory judgment had been so given and the writ of inquiry of damages awarded, and also after the execution thereof by the Sheriff but before the return of the writ, namely, on or about the 15th day of March, 1812, the defendant in the action died intestate, whereupon administration of the goods, etc., was granted to the Plaintiff in error. And thereupon George Wightman sued out a writ of scire facias, reciting to the effect hereinbefore set forth; and that although the damages of George Wightman had been assessed to a certain amount, to wit £1800 besides his costs and charges, yet that final judgment still remained to be given, wherefore it was commanded to the Sheriff that, etc., he should make known to the administrator, etc. To this writ the Sheriff returned nulla bona and non est inventus. Whereupon an alias scire facias issued, and the Defendant having appeared, the Plaintiff declared upon the scire facias in the usual form. To this declaration the Defendant pleaded plene administravit, reciting certain bonds and other debts by specialty to which the estate of his intestate as he pleaded was liable. The Plaintiff by his replication admitted the several matters pleaded to be true, and prayed judgment; and that execution might be adjudged to him, of the damages aforesaid, to be levied of the goods and chattels, which were of the said Vere at the time of his death, and which should thereafter come to the hands of the Plaintiff in error as administrator, to be administered according to the [140] force, form and effect of the said recovery. And afterwards entered up final judgment in the following words:

"Therefore it is considered that the said George have his execution against the said John, as administrator as aforesaid, according to the force form and effect of the said recovery, and the said John in mercy, etc."

Upon this judgment or award of execution, the Plaintiff in error brought a writ of error, returnable in Parliament, to reverse the judgment or award of execution, on the writs of scire facias, and assigned errors as follows:

First, That it is in and by the said award of execution set forth and alleged, that it is considered by the said Court, that the said George have his execution against the said John as administrator as aforesaid, according to the force, form and effect of the said recovery, when in fact no recovery is previously stated in any part of the said proceedings, or the record thereof, to warrant the said award of execution.

Second, That although the said George prays the said award of execution, yet it doth not appear that any final judgment hath been at any time given in the original action.

Third, That by the record aforesaid, it appears that execution was awarded to the said George against the said John Poulett, as administrator as aforesaid, of the damages in the said writ of sci. fa., mentioned according to the form and effect of a certain supposed recovery therein also mentioned, although no such execution ought to have been awarded, neither is there any thing in the said proceedings, or the said record thereof, to warrant such [141] award of execution to the said George against the said John Poulett, as administrator as aforesaid.

Fourth, That by the record aforesaid, it appears that judgment was given that the said George Wightman should have his execution against the said John Poulett, as administrator as aforesaid, instead of such execution being awarded of the goods and chattels which were of the said Vere, at the time of his death, and which should thereafter come to the hands of the said John, as administrator as aforesaid.

Fifth, That it doth not appear in or by the said award of execution against the said John, as administrator as aforesaid, whether the said damages, whereof execution is so awarded as aforesaid, were to be levied of the goods and chattels which were of the said Vere, at the time of his death, and which should thereafter come to the hands of the said John, as administrator as aforesaid, to be administered after payment and satisfaction of the said specialty debts in the said pleas to the said writs of sci. fa. mentioned and set forth, or whether such damages were to be levied before payment and satisfaction of those specialty debts.

Sixth, That by the record aforesaid, it appears that execution was awarded to the said George of the damages in the said writs of sci. fa. mentioned, and which should thereafter come to the hands of the said John Poulett, as administrator as aforesaid, to be administered, no regard being had, in the said award of execution, to the debts by specialty, in the pleas to the said writs of sci. fa. mentioned, and to the previous discharge thereof.

[142] For the Plaintiff in error: The Solicitor General (Sir N. C. Tindal).

The proceedings, as detailed and set forth in the writs of sci. fa., and the judgment and award of execution thereon, do not warrant such judgment or award of execution; on the contrary, such judgment or award of execution is illegal, and must manifestly work injustice to the Plaintiff in error: inasmuch as the legal effect and consequence thereof, is to fix him with payment of the amount of the damages mentioned in the award of execution, out of the assets which have, since such award of execution, come to the hands of the Plaintiff in error, as administrator, even though such assets may turn out to be insufficient to satisfy the specialty debts mentioned in the plea of the Plaintiff in error.

By the judgment and award of execution, the damages therein mentioned have precedence of the specialty debts enumerated and set forth in the plea of the Plaintiff in error, whereas the cause of action in the suit below being only a simple contract debt, the same did not constitute or create a charge on the estate of the intestate, legally entitled to priority over those specialty debts.

The judgment and award of execution of the damages ought not to have been framed in general terms, as against the future assets of the intestate, which after the giving of such judgment or award of execution should come to the hands of the Plaintiff in error, to be administered; but on the contrary such judgment and award of execution ought to have been confined to such assets as might come to the hands of the said Plaintiff in error, as administrator, after payment and satisfaction of the [143] specialty debts in the plea enumerated and set forth.

No Counsel appeared for the Defendant in error; and at the conclusion of the argument for the Plaintiff in error, the Judgment was Reversed, with £35 costs.*

(KING'S BENCH AND EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.)

BRICE WILLIAM FLETCHER,—Appellant: LEWIS RICHARD LORD SONDES,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. v. 1236. S. C. 3 Bing. 501; 5 B. and Ald. 835. Cited, on point as to binding authority of House of Lords' decisions (1 Bl. N. S. 249.), in London Street Tramways Co. v. London County Council (1898), A. C. 375. at p. 376.]

A bond, reciting that the patron of a rectory had, by an instrument of the same date, presented an incumbent, and that he had agreed to resign upon request of the patron, or the owners of the advowson for the time being, for the purpose of enabling him or them to present one of the two younger brothers of the patron, when capable of holding.

Held, (reversing the judgment of the Courts of King's Bench and Exchequer Chamber) that such a bond is simoniacal and void, on the ground that such an agreement is a benefit to the patron, and contrary to the statute 31 Eliz. c. 6. and (semble) the common law.

Held also, that from the recitals of such a bond, it must be intended that such presentation was made in consideration of the agreement to resign, and that it is not necessary to allege that fact in pleading.

This was an action brought by the Defendant in error, in the Court of King's Bench, against the Plaintiff in error, on his bond, dated on the 16th of November, in the penal sum of £12,000. The declaration was in the common form, not setting out the conditions of the bond. The Plaintiff in error suffered judgment by default, according to the statute 8th and 9th William and Mary, c. 11; whereupon the Defendant in error set out the conditions of the bond, alleging a breach of the condition, and praying a writ of inquiry to ascertain the truth of such suggestion, and assess the damages sustained [145] by the Defendant in error. The condition stated upon the record recited that "Lord Sondes was the patron of the rectory of Kettering, which had become vacant by the death of the late incumbent: and that Lord Sondes, by writing under his hand and seal, bearing equal date with the bond, had

* It is contrary to the practice of the House to give costs on the reversal of a Judgment: but the Lord Chancellor gave them in this case, because the Court below had not the power to reverse the judgment, and the Plaintiff in error had no means of relieving himself but by writ of error to the House of Lords.

For this information as to the grounds of giving costs, I am indebted to Mr. Courtenay, the clerk of Parliament.

presented Brice William Fletcher to supply the vacancy, and to be rector of the said rectory, in order that he might be instituted and inducted thereto by the proper ordinary; and further reciting that Brice William Fletcher had agreed to resign the rectory into the hands of the proper ordinary, upon such request or notice as thereafter mentioned, so as that the rectory might thereby again become vacant; to the intent, and for the purpose that the Lord Sodes, his heirs or assigns, or other the person or persons who should for the time being be the owner or owners of the advowson of the said rectory, might be enabled to present thereto anew either the Honourable Henry Watson, one of the younger brothers of Lord Sodes, or the Honourable Richard Watson, his youngest brother, when such of them to be so presented, should be capable of taking an ecclesiastical benefice.* The condition was, that if Brice William Fletcher should, upon the request of Lord Sodes, his heirs or assigns, or other, etc., or upon notice in writing to be left for him, by Lord Sodes, his heirs or assigns, or other, etc., at the rectory or parsonage house of the said rectory, and within one month after such request made or notice left, absolutely and effectually resign and deliver up the said rectory and parish church of Kettering, with the appurtenances, into the hands of the proper ordinary or guardian of the spiritualities, for the time being, whereby or so as that the said rectory and parish [146] church of Kettering should become and be absolutely vacant, and Lord Sodes, his heirs or assigns, or the person, etc., might be thereby enabled to present anew to the said rectory and parish church of Kettering, either the said Henry Watson or Richard Watson, when capable, etc., etc., then the obligation to be void, otherwise to be and remain in full force. The breach assigned was that Henry Watson, one of the younger brothers of the Defendant in error, on the 11th of October, 1820, became capable of taking an ecclesiastical benefice; that the Defendant in error was desirous that the Plaintiff in error should resign the living, that he might present the said Henry Watson, and requested him so to do, but that he had refused to make such resignation, to damage of the Defendant in error of £12,000.

Upon this suggestion, a writ of inquiry was executed before the Chief Justice, and a special jury assessed the damages at £10,000, for which judgment was entered up. Upon this judgment, the Plaintiff in error brought a writ of error in the Exchequer Chamber, where judgment was affirmed, without argument; whereupon a writ of error was brought in the House of Lords.

The case was argued with great learning and ability, by Mr. Shadwell and Spankie, Serjeant, for the Plaintiff in error, Bosanquet, Serjeant, and Pepys for the Defendant in error.*

After the argument the House directed the following question to be submitted to the judges:—"Whether sufficient matter appears upon the record to show that either by statute or common law, the bond upon which the action of the De-[147]-fendant in error was brought in this case, and stated upon the record to bear equal date with the writing of presentation therein mentioned, is void or illegal."

Upon this question the judges † not being agreed, gave their opinions seriatim:

Mr. Justice Gaselee (after stating the facts) proceeded as follows: The ground of objection which has been taken to this bond is that it is simoniacal, and not only contrary to the statute of 31 Eliz. c. 6., but, also, to the common law and public policy. But another question has been raised at the bar, whether, admitting this objection to be good, it can be taken advantage of in the present state of the record, or whether there should not have been a plea averring that the bond was given in consideration of the presentation? It will not be necessary to consume much time in the consideration of this question, because it appears to me to be impossible to read the condition of the bond without coming to the conclusion, that the bond was given in consideration of the presentation, and if so, it is unnecessary to introduce any specific averment of that fact.

I shall, therefore, confine my observations to the principal question, whether special resignation bonds, for the purpose of presenting particular persons when capable of taking the benefice, are legal, and whether the persons mentioned in this condition are such in whose behalf such a stipulation may be made? Of course I confine myself to special resignation bonds, because, since the case of Ffytche and the Bishop of London, which was decided in this House in the year 1783, I am precluded from con-[148]-tending that a general resignation bond can, under any circumstances, be supported. Before the determination of that case by this House, there had been many cases in which it had been decided by the courts below that general resignation bonds were upon the face of them good, and were not to be avoided except by plea showing them to have been originally made upon some corrupt contract not appearing upon the bond itself, or that an ill use was endeavoured to be made of them, by attempting to put them in force for improper purposes; in which latter case the remedy was an application to a court of equity for an injunction to restrain their being put in suit. It is true that in some of the cases before Ffytche and the Bishop of London, doubts had been thrown out as to the validity of general bonds of resignation, but in most, if not all the cases, special bonds for legitimate purposes, among which the presenting the patron himself, his son, or, (as one of the cases has it.) his friend, were held to be good. And it is surely quite evident that there is a manifest distinction between general and special bonds of resignation, in as much as, if the patron wishes to sell the advowson, it is much more valuable by means of a general bond of resignation, the purchaser can at any time compel a vacancy. This cannot be in the case of a special bond like the present, but on the contrary, as in general the party intended to be presented is under age when the bond is given, the consequence of his being presented would be the putting in a younger life, which would generally render the advowson less valuable as an object of sale.

* The points argued and the authorities cited are noticed in the opinions of the Judges.

† Bayley, Holroyd, and Littledale, Judges, gave no opinion.

The first case with which I shall trouble your Lordships is Johnes v. Lawrence (Cro. Jac. 248. See also p. 274), which is thus re-[149]-ported by Croke, J., twenty-one years only after passing the 31st of Elizabeth: "Debt upon an obligation of 1000 marks conditioned: whereas the obligee had procured from Queen Elizabeth letters of presentation to the church of Strettham, and was to present Lawrence, intending when his son John should be capable to procure another presentation of him to the said church, if the said obligor, within three months after his request, upon his presentation, admission, institution, and induction to the said church, should resign his benefice absolutely: that then the obligation shall be void. The Defendant pleads that he was not requested; and issue joined thereupon and found for the Plaintiff, and moved in arrest of judgment: First that it appears by the condition of the bond to be a simoniacal contract, and against law, and therefore the obligation void, sed non allocatur, for there doth not any simony appear upon the condition. And such a condition is good enough, and lawful, wherefore it was adjudged for the Plaintiff. Afterwards a writ of error was brought upon this judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, and the principal error insisted upon was, that this condition is against law, for it appears upon the condition entered, that it was for simony, which makes the obligation void; but all the judges of the Common Bench and Barons of the Exchequer held, that the obligation and condition are good enough; for a man may bind himself to resign, and it is not unlawful, but may be upon good and valuable reasons, without any colour of simony: As to be obliged to resign if he take another benefice, or if he be non-resident for the space of so many months, or, as this case is, to resign upon request, if the patron will present his son thereto when he should be of age capable to [150] take it. But if it had been averred that it was per colorem simonii; viz. If he did not suffer the patron to enjoy a lease of the glebe or tithes, or if he did not pay such a sum of money, that had been simony, and it is possible might have made the obligation void. But as this case is, there doth not appear any cause to adjudge it to be void for simony; wherefore the judgment was affirmed."

The doctrine in the case of Johnes v. Lawrence, was adopted and acted upon in the subsequent case of Babington v. Wood (Cro. Car. 180, Hatt. 220, S. C.): "Debt upon an obligation conditioned: whereas the Plaintiff intended to present the Defendant to such a benefice, that if the Defendant, at any time after his admission, institution and induction, at the Plaintiff's request resigned the said benefice into the hands of the Bishop of London, that then, etc. The Defendant upon over of the condition, demurred generally. And this was argued by Grimston for the Plaintiff, and by Calthrop for the Defendant, who showed that the cause of demurrer was, for that the condition of the bond being to resign upon request of the patron, it is simony and against law; so the bond void. But all the Court conceived that if the Defendant had averred, that the obligation was made to bind him to pay such a sum, or to make a lease or other act which appears in itself to be simony, then upon such a plea, peradventure it might have appeared to the Court to be simony, and might have been a question whether such a bond for simony should be void: but as it is pleaded by way of demurrer upon the oyer of the condition, it doth not appear that there is any simony: for such a bond to cause him to resign may be good, and upon good reason and discretion required by the [151] patron, viz.—If he be non-resident, or takes a second benefice by a qualification, or the like; and a precedent was shown in octavo Jacobi, betwixt Johnes and Lawrence, where such a bond was made to resign a benefice upon request, when the son of Johnes came to be twenty-four years of age, to the intent that he might be presented unto it: and it was adjudged good in the King's Bench, and affirmed on a writ of error in the Exchequer Chamber, and of this opinion was all the Court: whereupon judgment was given for the Plaintiff. Hatton, who reports the same case, says, that upon error brought in the Exchequer Chamber the judgment was affirmed (Jones, 220. S. C.) accordingly, and that it was affirmed in error upon viewing the precedent of Johnes v. Lawrence."

In that case it does not appear that the condition of the bond was to resign in favour of any particular person, but generally; but it is obvious that the case turns mainly upon Johnes v. Lawrence, which it treats therefore as an express authority.

In an anonymous case, reported in 3 Mod. 54, in which a general bond of resignation was held good, although Mr. Justice Powel states his opinion, "that when first the judges held these bonds good, if they had foreseen the mischief of them, they would have been of another opinion." Yet he considers that the patron having a son of his own, who may be capable of a benefice, it is an honest intent: and Justice Blincow says, "Here is a particular circumstance why it should not be thought simony; because it is a sum much above the value of the benefice; if indeed it had been for a sum of less value, it might be intended perhaps that the parson would rather pay it than resign;" and he it remembered, [152] Justice Twisden said, "he had known such a bond held good twelve times; so it would be hard to oppose it now, there appearing no simony in the condition, and the Defendant not averring any."

What proportion the penalty in this bond of £12,000, bears to the value of the living does not appear; but it must be taken for granted the bond was bond fide given for the purpose mentioned in the condition. If it were really colourable, and the real intention was that there should be no resignation, but that the patron should receive the penalty, it should have been pleaded, and that might have altered the case.

The case of Williard v. Stapylton (Equity Cases abridged) is thus reported: "The guardian of an infant presented to a living, and took a bond from the incumbent to resign within two months after request of the patron or his heirs, it being designed that he should have the living himself when capable. The patron afterwards died an infant at the University, leaving two sisters his heirs, who pressed the incumbent to resign, and for not doing it, put the bond in suit, and recovered judgment; and this bill was brought to be relieved against the bond and judgment. And it was proved in the cause that they had treated with the incumbent to sell him the perpetual advowson, and had said that if he would not give £700 for it, they would make him resign. The Lord Keeper said, the proof in this case lies on the Defendants' part, and unless they make out some good reason for removing him, he should certainly decree against the bond. Bonds for resignation have been held good in law. The statute of 31 Elizabeth against simony, made the penalty upon the lay patron; and he did not remember [153] any case of resignation bonds before that statute, and they have been allowed since only to preserve the living for the patron himself, or for a child, or to restrain the incumbent from non-residence or a vicious course of life; and if any other advantage be made thereof, it will avoid the bond: and where it is general for resignation, yet some special reason must be shown to require a resignation, or he would not suffer it to be put in suit. If it should not be so, simony will be committed without proof or punishment. A particular agreement must be proved to resign for the benefit of a friend who would be presented, and without such agreement the bond ought not to be sued, but for misbehaviour of the parson, and here are proofs in this case of endeavours to get money out of the Plaintiff: and he decreed a perpetual injunction against the bond, and satisfaction to be acknowledged upon the judgment, and the Plaintiff to give a new bond, of £200 penalty, to resign, but that not to be sued without leave of the Court."

It is difficult to say why there should be a new bond, the party intended to be presented being dead. And in Aubler, 268, the Lord Chancellor is stated to have said, that the Lord Keeper went too far: but I cite the case to show that there was then no idea that a bond to resign, for a son or even a friend of the patron to be presented, was illegal: the only ground of applying to the Court of Chancery being the "ill use that had been made of it."

So in Peele v. Capel (1 Strange, 534). Capel, on presenting Peele to a living, took a bond from him to resign when the patron's nephew came of age, for whom the living was designed. When the nephew was of [154] age, instead of requiring a resignation, it was agreed between them all that Peele should continue to hold the living, paying £30 per annum to the nephew. Peele makes the payment for seven years, but refusing to pay any more, the patron put the bond in suit, and then Peele comes into the Court for an injunction, and to have back his £30 per annum. On the hearing the Chancellor granted the injunction, not (as he said) upon account of any defect in the bond itself, which he held good, but on account of the ill use that had been made upon it. And as to the money, it being paid upon a simoniacal contract, he left the Plaintiff to go to law for it.

These are all the cases respecting special resignation bonds which I have met with before the decision of Ffytche v. the Bishop of London. I proceed now to those which have arisen during the succeeding period of forty-three years. The first is Bagshaw v. Batley (4 Term Reports, 78), which was an action on a bond given by the Defendant on his appointment to the curacy of the free chapel of Wornhill, in the county of Derby, which, after reciting that the Defendant had agreed to be constantly and duly resident at the curacy house there: and in default of such residence, to resign and deliver up the curacy within one month after request or notice in writing, left at the curacy house, so that the patron might present anew, was conditioned for such resignation, in default of such constant and due residence, so that the patron, the obligee, might present anew, discharged of all charges and incumbrances done and suffered by the obligor, and for the not committing wastes or dilapidations upon the houses or [155] lands belonging to the curacy. To this the defendant pleaded several pleas: 1st. That he had resided at the curacy, and had not committed or suffered wastes or dilapidations. 2dly. That after his appointment to the curacy, he had a general license from the obligee to reside elsewhere. Replication: 1st. That the Defendant voluntarily absented himself from the 7th day of April, 1790, to the 8th of April in the year following, and that the Plaintiff had given him notice to resign, which he had refused to do. 2dly. That after the time when the supposed license was granted, viz. on 7th April, 1790, the Plaintiff countermanded and revoked the license, and that the Defendant absented himself, etc. as in the former replication. To both these replications there was a general demurrer. Sutton, in support of the demurrer, contended, first, that the bond was illegal and void: and secondly, that the license was general, and could not be revoked. First, the bond is illegal, because it placed the incumbent under the undue control of the patron, after the presentation, and after the relation between them had ceased, and a new relation had sprung up between the incumbent and the ordinary, to whom only he owed obedience. The right of presentation in the patron is a public trust, and not a mere private interest. The duties of the incumbent are prescribed by the municipal law, and the canons and ordinances of the church, and therefore it was not competent to the patron to impose any private condition of his own creating beyond those which the civil and ecclesiastical law have deemed it necessary to require. With respect to the residence required by the bond, that is carried much further than the law requires it, for the [156] statute of Henry VIII. only imposes certain penalties, much inferior to that imposed by this bond for non-residence: and besides, there may be various defences to an action on that statute, as amongst others residence upon another living by dispensation, whereas there can be no excuse under this unless the license of the patron be such. And further, in this case the living itself is to become vacant: again too in this case the penalty is to become due to the patron, in case of dilapidations, in which he has no sort of interest, that being but the sole concern of his successor. The effect, therefore, of this bond, is to raise to the patron a special interest in the exercise of a public trust, which by law he was not invested with.—Chambre, contra, was stopped by the Court.—Lord Kenyon said, I cannot bring myself to entertain a doubt upon this case. It has been argued that the patron's right of presentation is a mere trust; it is so to some purposes, but not to all. It is a trust coupled with an interest, for it is a subject of a conveyance for a valuable consideration, which is not the case with a naked trust. As soon as the Defendant was presented to the living, he was bound to take upon himself all the duties of an incumbent; to reside upon the living, to take upon himself the cure of souls, and to keep the house in proper repair: now this bond was only entered into for the purpose of securing a performance of all these duties, which by law, and without the bond, he was bound to discharge. I avoid saying any thing respecting the case of the Bishop of London v. Efyche: when that question comes again before the House of Lords, they will, I have no doubt, review the former decision, if it should become necessary. It is sufficient for me, in decid[157]-ing the present case, to say, that it cannot be governed by that, for here the Plaintiff does not call for the resignation of the incumbent, but merely for a performance of those duties which in morality, religion, and law, he ought to do. I am therefore clearly of opinion, that a bond for the performance of these duties is not illegal.—Justice Boller said, I cannot find any immorality or illegality in this bond. It is the duty of the incumbent to reside on his living, and to be regular in the discharge of his duties. Now this requires nothing more: it only requires him to do what the law would have compelled him to do without it. Justice Grose was of the same opinion. Ashurst was absent.

Although in this case the bond was not for resignation to the patron, or to any relation, on his becoming capable and desirous of taking it, yet it amounts to a decision of the Court, that the giving of a special bond of resignation is not in all cases illegal.

The next case was precisely in point with the present. It is Partridge v. Whiston (4 Term Reports, 359). The condition of the bond, after stating the presentation of the Defendant to the rectory of Cranwick and the vicarage of Methwold, in Norfolk, recites an agreement to be personally resident in one or other of these parishes, or in Northwold, which is contiguous to both, without absence for eighty days in any one year: to serve the cure of these two parishes himself, if his health would permit; and not to serve the cure of any other parish while he held those: that as the two livings together were a comfortable provision for one clergyman, though neither of them separately was such, the Defendant had agreed [158] never to resign one without the other: that the Plaintiff had a son about fourteen years of age, who probably would take orders, and might be desirous of taking these livings; and therefore the Defendant had agreed, in that event, to resign both the livings, upon three months' notice to be given by the Plaintiff, in order that the Plaintiff's son might be presented thereto: the bond was conditioned to perform this agreement, and to keep in good repair the rectory house and chancel of Cranwick, and the vicarage house of Methwold. The Court, understanding that it was intended to carry this case up to the House of Lords, gave judgment for the Plaintiff, without hearing any argument. They said, as this case was not precisely similar to that of the Bishop of London v. Efyche, they were bound by the established series of precedents to give judgment for the Plaintiff. I do not find that the case was ever carried further.

The next case is not one for a resignation bond with respect to an ecclesiastical benefice, but I cite it for the purpose of showing the opinion of Lord Kenyon on the point now in question. It is the case of Leyh v. Lewis (1 East, 391), where the patron of a school had taken a general resignation bond on the appointment of the master. Lord Kenyon said, in the instance of ecclesiastical livings, every rector has a freehold in his rectory; yet it was never doubted but that resignation bonds for certain purposes, and up to a certain extent, at least, were binding, though they put an end to the freehold. Justice Lawrence doubted whether the appointment could be made otherwise than for life: but he says it is true that a bond may be taken to enforce the observance of [159] those duties which by law are required to be performed by the appointee of an office, but then it should be so expressed in the condition.

In 3 Bosanquet and Puller, 231, this case is reported in the Exchequer Chamber, and judgment affirmed without argument, it not sufficiently appearing on the record that the office of schoolmaster was such as ought to be deemed a freehold office.

In Newman v. Newman (4 Maule and Selwyn, 66), upon a bond to pay certain sums of money on the conveyance of an estate, having an advowson appurtenant, to the obligor; and in case a living should become vacant during the life of the son of the obligee, and he should be qualified, to present him; and if he should be under age, and it should be necessary to present another, to procure such other to resign when the son should be of age; it became unnecessary to decide whether the latter part of the condition was good.—Justice Le Blanc says, the reason for making an exception in favour of a condition for presenting a son might be because it was not for a money consideration.—Justice Dampier says, if a bond to resign in favour of a particular person were necessarily void, the objection would have been good in Johnes v. Lawrence; but a stipulation to resign in favour of a specified person, does not seem to be open to the same objection as if it were to resign generally, because the latter makes the incumbent but a mere tenant at will to the patron. I know that since the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, it has been considered that bonds to resign in favour of specified persons are not illegal.

In Lord Kirkcubright v. Lady Kirkcubright (8 Ves. 51), a [160] bond was given to pay £100 a year until the obligee should be instituted and placed in possession of a living in the Church of England, then to pay him so much as with the value of the living shall amount to £150. There was also an agreement by Lord Kirkcubright to enter into orders and take the living, and if he did not the bond was to be of no avail. The obligor having died intestate, the obligee filed a bill praying an account, and that the arrears of his annuity might be paid him. “The Lord Chancellor expressed great doubt as to the validity of the bond: observing, that it was void on many accounts: it is,” he says, “a corrupt agreement for taking holy orders such as the Court ought to decree to be delivered up. The policy of the ecclesiastical constitution of the country requires, that a man should take orders without any reference whatever to considerations of that nature. There is no objection to the bond itself except as connected with this agreement at the same time for a pecuniary consideration to take holy orders. Another objection to the bond is, that the father is put under these circumstances, that he is to solicit the benefit of patronage for this pecuniary consideration moving from himself; the policy of the law supposing the patron to look for persons the best that can be recommended to him, which excludes pecuniary considerations. The cause stood over in order that this point might be considered. It was ultimately decided that the obligee had not performed the conditions, inasmuch as he had only taken deacons’ orders, and had not answered whether he meant to enter into priests’ orders. That case contains no decision upon the validity of special resignation bonds, though the Lord Chancellor, speaking of resignation bonds in general, states himself to have [161] no doubt that they were generally against the policy of the law, and says, that the question of their legality would never have perplexed him if there had not been so many authorities.”

Another case has been referred to in the argument (Dashwood v. Peyton, in 18 Ves. 27), where a bond of resignation had been given in favour of a particular individual and not to accept a bishopric. The application was for an injunction, principally on the ground that the bond as to the resignation which had been given in consequence of supposed directions in a will, had been so given by mistake, it having been afterwards discovered that it was intended by the testator that the party should be presented without any such obligation. The Lord Chancellor said, it was very difficult, upon the pleadings in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, to reconcile the distinction between general and particular bonds of resignation with the principle on which the House of Lords made that decision; but, he adds, “it would not however become me, having regard to what is the present state of the law on this subject, to interpose in a court of equity on the ground that this is a particular bond of resignation, although I agree that this Court, if it has a concurrent jurisdiction, is not bound to wait for the decision of a court of law, yet reasonable caution requires a court of equity not hastily to pronounce bad a bond understood to be good at law, and it would at least be proper to leave that question to be reconsidered at law. The injunction was refused.

The last case to be found on the subject is ex parte Rainier, Rowlatt v. Rowlatt (1 Jacob and Walker, 230). The father, on the marriage of his son, gave a bond to trustees, inter [162] alia, for performance of a covenant in the settlement, whereby he covenanted, that until the son should become the actual incumbent of the rectory of North Benfleet, or should be in the enjoyment of some other benefice or ecclesiastical preferment which he might hold during his life, of the yearly value of £600 at the least, or until his death, he would pay him an annuity of £200. The father became a bankrupt: the petition was presented by the son and his trustees to prove in respect of the bond. It appeared that the son had been presented to a living of £600 a year, but had given a bond to resign in favour of two sons of the patron, when either of them should be qualified and willing to be presented to it, and instituted and inducted. The eldest son took orders, and the living was in consequence resigned within two years after the presentation. It was contended, that the son having been presented the condition was satisfied: on the other hand, it was said, that having been presented on a condition to resign and a bond given to that effect, it was a benefice that could not have been retained for life. The Lord Chancellor said, still he might have held it for life, he might if he chose have kept the living and forfeited the bond: you may, however, if you like, take a case into the Court of King's Bench. The reporter says, the matter stood over for the Plaintiff to consider whether they would take a case, which they afterwards accepted, but it is understood that they have since declined to persevere in it.

I apprehend that case could only have been directed upon the ground that the Court of King's Bench might have held the bond legal: for if it was simoniacal, the party could not have held the living, even if he had paid the penalty. For the presentation [163] would have been absolutely void, and consequently not a satisfaction of the condition.

I have now gone through all the cases I can find respecting special resignation bonds, extending over a period of 200 years: in none of which has such a bond been held bad: in many it has been expressly determined to be good, and admitted to be so in most of those in which validity of general bonds of resignation has been disputed or denied. In one or two of the latest cases, indeed in the Court of Chancery, it has been stated to be very difficult upon the pleading in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, to reconcile the distinction between general and particular bonds of resignation with the principle on which the House of Lords made that decision. The main principle upon which the decision proceeded, appears to me to have been the enabling the patron to have made a greater profit on the sale of the advowson, and the converting the tenure of the incumbent into a tenancy at will. This I have already stated not to be applicable to the case of a bond to resign in favour of a particular person. The only objection applicable to a special in common with the general resignation bond appears to be the reducing the tenure from an absolute freehold for life to one for a less period, but however that might be available if the objection had been made for the first time, the practice as to special bonds appears to have been too long acted upon and acquiesced in now to call it in question.

Under these circumstances, therefore, can a court of law now adjudge that they are bad: particularly when it is considered that the consequence of holding them to be so must be to submit to two severe penalties those who have been acting upon a practice [164] of upwards of two centuries, and which has never yet been declared illegal, and in many instances expressly determined to be legal? Those penalties, if the bond be considered as illegal, under the statute of Elizabeth, extending to the forfeiture of the presentation and two years' value of the benefice.

The provisions of the statute apply "to any person, etc. who shall present or collate for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, whatsoever, directly or indirectly, or for or by reason of any promise or agreement, grant, bond, covenant or other assurance of or for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, whatsoever." It is not contended that this case comes within any of the words of the statute except the word BENEFIT, and it is said that a resignation bond in favour of a son is a benefit to the father, inasmuch as it relieves him from making any other provision for him, which he would otherwise be bound to do. To this I answer, that this is not the species of benefit which the statute contemplated. A general resignation bond may be so, as I before stated, as it enhances the value of the living if sold during the incumbency, and amounts to a sale with the means of procuring an immediate vacancy. But if this be so considered, it would be equally a benefit when the father presents the son on a fair vacancy, or even where he presents himself; in either case it may be said he makes the presentation a means of providing for an expenditure he must necessarily incur; and therefore, circuitously, at least, a source of profit to himself. The statute has never yet been intended to operate to that extent; and the observation made at the bar, that upon looking at the 8th section the word benefit must be taken to mean a pecuniary benefit, and that the two [165] clauses ought to have a similar construction, appears to me to be entitled to considerable weight.

It might perhaps be urged, that in this case it does not appear that the patron was bound to provide for his younger brother, and therefore it can be in no sense a benefit to the patron, which it is but fair to consider the meaning intended by the statute to be applied to the word benefit, coupled as it is with the words sum of money, reward, gift, or profit. But it seems to me to be sufficient to say the act has never been held to extend to bonds of this description; that, on the contrary, they have been uniformly held good in Westminster Hall, and that it would be contrary to the principle universally acted upon with respect to penal law, viz. that they are to be strictly construed, now to extend it to them.

But it is asked, admitting a resignation bond in favour of a son to be good, to what degree of relationship and to what number of persons is it to extend? To this I answer, that it must, like many other cases, depend upon what shall be considered reasonable. With respect to the present case, such a bond, in favour of a more remote degree of relationship than a brother has been held good; for in the case of Peele v. Chapel, before cited, the bond was in favour of a nephew; and in Rowlatt v. Rowlatt, where the bond was in favour of two sons, when either of them should be qualified, no objection was taken on that ground; but, on the contrary, a presentation, accompanied by such a bond, was considered as a satisfaction of the condition to pay an annuity until the party should be in the enjoyment of a benefice which he might hold for his life. It is also to be observed that the statute of Elizabeth is not confined to bonds and securities, but extends to [166] any promise, agreement, grant, bond, covenant, or any other assurance. If therefore the bond in this case is illegal, and avoids the presentation, the same rule applies to every verbal promise or honorary engagement, expressed or perhaps only implied, surely then it is necessary to pause before a decision is adopted, which may, in its consequences, involve in the guilt of simony and the penalties of the statutes, parties, than whom none would be more abhorrent from such an offence, into whose contemplation it could never for a moment have entered that they were actually illegally, in making or accepting resignations, under circumstances sanctioned by the practice of centuries and the current of legal decisions, and who, from their peculiar station in society, would have been the last to put themselves in the smallest hazard of having it imputed to them for an instant, that they had concurred in or lent their sanction to any act, of the legality or propriety of which a doubt could be entertained.

Another objection taken to these bonds, is the oath upon institution, but this seems to me to be begging the question. The oath is, "I do swear that I have made no simoniacal payment, contract, or promise." Now, before the giving of such a bond can be considered a breach of the oath, it must be determined that such a bond is a simoniacal contract. Bishop Gibson (Codex p. 802) contends that this oath, whether interpreted by the plain tenor of it, or according to the language of former oaths, in the notions of the catholic church, concerning simony, is against all promises whatsoever; and he states that in the year 1391, in Archbishop Courteney's decree against chappe churches, the oath is—"Quodque obligati [167] non sunt, nec eorum amici pro se, juratoria aut pecuniaria cautione, de ipsis beneficiis resignandis vel permutandis." But I should conclude, by the omission of this part of the oath in the canons of 1603, it was intended that it should no longer be included, or at least that it was considered as not being included; for in the Irish canons, which were made thirty-one years afterwards, it was provided that if any clerk or other, with his consent, should seal any bond, or sell to any person or persons, with condition of resignation of his benefice, he shall be holden guilty of simony, and proceeded against according to the severity of the ancient canons in that behalf.

As another ground of objection to these bonds, it is asked what power is there after the resignation made, to compel the patron to present the person in whose favour it is made, or to compel such person to accept it, or having been instituted, to prevent his resigning the benefice to a vendee immediately afterwards? And it is said that neither the Bishop nor the Chancellor can compel such presentation to be made. To this I answer, that the resignation is to be made to the Bishop. Upon its being tendered, he has a right to inquire into the reason of it, and upon finding it is the consequence of a resignation bond, or any other engagement to resign, he may say he will not accept the resignation, unless the patron comes at the same time prepared to make the presentation: where the party who presented is under age, at the time when the engagement is entered into, and as soon as he comes of age procures himself to be admitted into priest's orders, it is a pretty strong proof of his readiness to accept the living. With respect to the second part of the offer to resign the living immediately, or within a very [168] short time after institution, is a pretty strong proof of the resignation being obtained from an interested motive, and would probably induce the Bishop not to accept it. But the legality or illegality of the bond cannot depend on what course the Bishop would pursue, and the probability is that he would not refuse to act according to what the courts of law had decided upon the question. If any real inconvenience should be found, it would be in the power of the legislature to enact that the resignation shall be conditional only, and be void if the persons in whose favour it is made be not presented within a certain period. It certainly has been determined that the party does all he can to comply with the condition, by tendering his resignation; yet if the Bishop refuses to accept it, the bond is forfeited. But upon this I would observe, that if where the incumbent has done all he can to perform the obligation, the bond is still put in suit, it can only be for an unlawful purpose: in that case I apprehend a court of equity would grant an injunction.

To the observation that it may be difficult or impossible to ascertain the fact; the answer is, that if there is any suspicion respecting it, a bill in equity may be filed for a discovery, and if the discovery does not render the party liable to penalties, it will be ordered. This was done in the case of the Bishop of London v. Fytche (1 Brown's Reports in Chancery, 96), and it is remarkable, that the noble and learned lord, who so ably, and so successfully, combatted the legality of resignation bonds, while he was in the profession, adopted the doctrine of Westminster Hall, and had, in that very case, over-ruled a demurrer which had been pleaded, on the ground that a discovery might expose the parties [169] to penalties, and which must have been allowed, had his lordship then been of opinion that the transaction was illegal.

I have cautiously abstained from entering into the question, how far bonds of this description are or are not consistent with public policy; and I have done so, because however proper, if the case were new and doubtful, it might be to take this question into consideration, yet if the case is not new, but such bonds have been held good for centuries, as it appears to me they have been, it is now too late to consider that question in a court of law, and if it is considered right to put a stop to them on the ground of public policy, the legislature are the proper persons to do so. Were the case new, I am not prepared to say it might not be proper to prevent the giving of these bonds; but if so, it seems to me that it would be the proper course to put an end to them altogether, and not to make a distinction in favour of those which it has been said are good because they only enforce the performance of those duties which are required by law to be performed. If the law requires the performance of a duty, why not trust the enforcing such performance to those authorities to which the law of the country has entrusted it, and who have the power of determining how far any regulations for the rigid performance may or may not be relaxed or dispensed with? Why is it necessary to call in the assistance of the patron, and give him the power of enforcing it by a more severe punishment than the law would inflict, and the inflicting of which would confer an advantage on the patron, which the ordinary process of the law would not give him.

With respect to one of the cases in which a bond [170] of resignation has been allowed, namely, that of non-residence, I am not sure that the case stated upon that subject, does proceed from so pure a motive as has been attributed to it. Take for instance, the case of Whiston v. Partridge, before cited. The condition is, that the party shall reside, without absence of eighty days in any one year. When it is considered that at the period when this bond was entered into, absence of eighty days in the course of any one year put an end to any lease which might have been made of the tithes, or any part of the benefice, one is compelled to conjecture that there was some other reason for the insertion of that provision, than the good of the church, or the punctual performance by the incumbent of the duties of his situation.

I forbear, however, to say more upon this topic, because, as it appears to me, the practice of giving these bonds has too long prevailed, and has been too often recognized as legal, to permit it to be altered by any other than legislative authority. For these reasons, and upon the most attentive and full consideration I have been able to give to the authorities, I feel myself bound to state my humble opinion:—That sufficient matter does not appear upon the record to show that either by the statute or common law, the bond upon which the action of the Defendant in error was brought in the court below stated upon the record to bear equal date with the writing of presentation therein mentioned, is void and illegal.

Mr. Baron Hulloek: After much reflection and research upon the subject, I have arrived at a different conclusion from that which is the result of the deliberation of my learned brother. But I con-[171]-cur in the opinion which has been stated, and which I have reason to believe is the opinion also of all the learned Judges now present; that this record discloses sufficient matter to show, that the bond in question was given in consideration of, and as the price of the presentation of the Plaintiff in error to the rectory of Kettering. For a considerable time I felt much difficulty on this part of the case; because, although no plain unlettered man can peruse the condition of this bond without, as it seems to me, at once perceiving that such was the fact; yet still it appeared to me to be doubtful whether that conclusion was more than an inference which, however well warranted in ordinary cases of construction, was yet insufficient, in the absence of distinct and positive averment, to warrant a court of law in acting upon it, in a case where the question is, whether the parties to the contract have acted in contravention or violation of the enactment of a penal statute. In all cases in which the charge involves in it a breach or violation of a penal statute, it is essentially necessary that the act charged should be brought by express and positive allegations within the language and letter of the statute. I apprehend that if the Defendant below had, in this case, been advised to have pleaded specially, instead of suffering judgment to go against him by default, his plea would have shown by precise and positive allegations, that this bond was given in consideration of and for and as the price of the presentation, and that the presentation was made or conferred in consideration of and in return for the bond. A plea so framed would, if established in point of fact, have brought the case directly and unequivocally within the language of [172] the statute (31 Eliz. cap. 6. sec. 1. 5). Further reflection, however, and opportunities of conversing upon the subject, have satisfied me, that it is clear, from the language of the condition itself, that this bond was given in consideration of and for the presentation, and that the presentation was made in consideration of the bond: in short, that this instrument was the result of barter and contract between the obligor and the obligee, for and in respect of this living.

The condition of the bond commences with a recital, that the obligee is the patron of the rectory of Kettering, which rectory was then vacant by the death of the late incumbent thereof.—That the obligee, by writing under his hand and seal, bearing equal date with the bond, had presented the obligor to supply the said vacancy, and to be rector, in order that he might be instituted and inducted thereto; and that the obligee had agreed to resign the said rectory, upon such request or notice as thereafter mentioned, so as that the said rectory might thereby again become vacant, for the sole purpose, that the owner of the advowson of the said rectory might be enabled to present thereto one of two brothers of the obligee, therein specifically named, when the party to be presented should be capable of taking an ecclesiastical benefice.

Now can any person, after reading these passages, from the condition of the bond, have a doubt of the nature and character of this contract? Assuming, then, that it is sufficiently evident, by the matter appearing on this record, that the bond in question constituted the consideration for this presentation, is it an instrument avoided by the statute (31 Eliz.)? By the [173] fifth section of that statute, "If any person shall or do, for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, directly or indirectly, or for or by reason of any promise, agreement, grant, bond, covenant, or other assurance of or for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, whatsoever, directly or indirectly, present or collate any person to any benefice, with cure of souls; or give, or bestow, the same for or in respect of any such corrupt cause or consideration; that then every such presentation, and every admission, institution and induction thereupon, shall be utterly void and of no effect in law." And the Act then proceeds to subject the parties to certain forfeitures and incapacities.

By the word "corrupt," as used here, and as applied to this subject, it is quite clear, that every presentation, which is not gratuitous, is corrupt. By the former part of the clause, presentations, for money, etc., "are prohibited"; and by the latter part of this section, presentations, made for such corrupt cause, are avoided; clearly considering such cause, that is, a bond, etc., made for the presentation, to be a corrupt cause. And the statute was intended, (as appears by the preamble to the fifth section, which is printed incorrectly, at the end of the fourth,) for the avoiding of simony and corruption in presentations to benefices, etc.

It may be observed, that the statute does not in express words avoid the bond itself, but merely the presentation made in consequence of or under it. But still, upon general principles of law, I conceive it to be quite clear, that the bond made for the purpose of furthering an object prohibited by a statute is void, and can never be made the foundation of an action: and this doctrine is laid down in the clearest [174] manner, by Lord Holt, in Bartlett v. Finner (Carth. 252). In that case, that learned judge expresses himself thus: "Every contract, made for or about any matter or thing, which is prohibited and made unlawful by any statute, is a void contract; though the statute itself doth not mention that it shall be so, but only inflicts a penalty on the offender; because a penalty implies a prohibition, though there are no prohibitory words in the statute: as, for instance, in the case of simony, the statute only inflicts a penalty by way of forfeiture, but doth not mention any avoiding of the simoniacal contract; yet it hath always been held, that such contracts, being against law, are void."

The inquiry then, will be, whether a bond of this description be a benefit, either directly or indirectly, to the patron; because, if it be, it will fall immediately within the words and operation of the statute; and any presentation made for such a bond will be void.

It is denied that this security is either a profit or a benefit in the true spirit and intendment of this clause of the statute.

If the judgment of the Court below is sustained, the obligee would be entitled to take out execution upon his judgment for the sum of £12,000, with his costs of suit. A right to enforce the payment of such a sum of money looks like a profit, like a benefit, it appears difficult to raise a serious doubt upon the question. The opportunity afforded by this species of bond of providing for a son, or a brother, or relation, must surely be considered a benefit to a patron. If it be a benefit, how has it been acquired? why by means of a corrupt bargain for the presentation.

But consider this contract in another point of view. It is not compulsory on the obligor to resign, [175] he has an option either to do so or to pay the penalty, and, as has been well observed by Eyre, B. (Cunningham, 52) in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, "Is the chance that the obligor (who may) will so doct worth nothing to the obligee? The obligor may resign or pay the money, and the obligee cannot, at all events, compel him to resign. If that be so, what would be easier than the making of this species of contract the means of selling an advowson during an actual vacancy? The value of the living is calculated — a bond is given for the amount, conditioned to be void if the incumbent resigns on request, when a certain specified individual has become capable of taking the living. That event happens almost immediately by the nomination of a person who, if he lived, would, within a very few months, become capable of holding an ecclesiastical benefice. The incumbent is called on to resign: he refuses, but prevents a suit on the bond by paying to the obligee the amount of the penalty. Would not such a proceeding, if this bond be legal, operate a benefit to the patron for and in respect of his presentation; but whether the money or the resignation of the living is obtained, the obligee acquires to himself a benefit in every sense of that word for his presentation.

It has been however argued, as it was said in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, that the word "benefit" in the 6th section of the 31 Eliz. c. 6. cannot be construed according to its ordinary meaning, inasmuch as such a construction would have the effect of rendering the 8th section of the statute nugatory. The true answer to that sort of reasoning is given by Mr. Baron Eyre in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche. It appears to me that the word "benefit" [176] in the 8th section of the act must receive the same meaning as it possesses in the 6th clause of the act. The word "benefit" in the 8th section means something ultra, something in addition to the value of the thing exchanged. In exchanges neither living can be considered as better or worse in legal indentment, because they are, in the estimation of those that make them, perfectly equal, however other persons may differ upon the subject. Mr. Baron Eyre puts the case thus: "A living in the air of Berkshire may be reckoned an equivalent for the difference in value of an incumbency in the Hundreds of Essex." That is a fair argument. Each man throws into the scale circumstances which establish a perfect equilibrium in cases of exchange between parties. In a case where there is not a single shilling passing, if there is any other extrinsic benefit whatsoever to the smallest amount, it is made a part in the consideration of such exchange, and there is no question that upon this Act of Parliament such exchange will be void. Since the decision in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, we are bound to say that a general bond of resignation is bad in point of law. That decision must have proceeded either on the ground that such a bond was a benefit to the patron, and therefore prohibited by the statute, or that such a bond was void on grounds of public policy. It was contrary to the policy of the law to permit the incumbent of a living to be placed under such a control as must necessarily result from such an instrument. In Legh v. Lewis (1 East 398), Mr. Justice Le Blanc says, that the decision in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche against the validity of general bonds turned ultimately on the ground of their [177] being simoniacal and against the statute. If the decision alluded to proceeded on that ground, then I would humbly ask, on what principle or ground of reason can the effect of the bond now in judgment be distinguished from the effect of a general resignation bond? The benefit or value of the two bonds may differ in amount or degree: a special bond may not be so beneficial or so valuable as a general resignation bond, but that is a mere difference in the degree, not a difference in the nature, or essence, or character of the instrument. I am unable to comprehend any other way in which a difference can be predicated between these two descriptions of bonds. No ingenuity, no subtlety that can be employed on the subject, can succeed in establishing any other distinction between general and special bonds of resignation; and if the facts disclosed upon this record are adverted to, the absolute identity of these bonds in principle and operation will be most palpable. One of the nominees in the bond is now competent to hold an ecclesiastical benefice. But the patron cannot be compelled by any mode or way which any lawyer can point out, to make the request or give the notice mentioned in the bond. That being the case at the commencement of the suit below, the obligor stood precisely in the same situation as an obligor in a general bond would be in the moment after he had executed that description of bond.

If, then, general bonds of resignation were decided to be bad, as being contrary to the statute of Elizabeth on the ground of their operating as a benefit to the patron; it seems to me more than difficult to contend with success, that a special bond, operating in the same way, can be supported as an efficient instrument. If both species of bonds operate as [178] benefits to the patron, though not to the same extent in point of value, they still must operate equally in violation and contravention, of the provisions of the statute.

But it has been argued, that, admitting the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche to be law, yet, inasmuch as it was decided, as it has been strenuously alleged in direct contravention of a long train of decisions in the Court below: that case ought not to be carried beyond the strict letter of the decision, and that, therefore, your Lordships will restrict its operation to general bonds of resignation merely.

In confirmation of this view of the subject, it is said these special bonds of resignation have been holden valid and unimpeachable at several times, and by several judges, and in several decisions in the Courts below, since, and notwithstanding the determination in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche. It cannot be dissembled, that, since the decision so often referred to, resignation bonds with special conditions have been treated on several occasions as legal instruments in the Courts below. It may be, therefore, material to advert to the modern cases in which this question has been agitated, and it will be found, and it is a most singular fact, that in no case since the determination in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, has the construction of the statute of Elizabeth ever been the question before the Court.

The first case of which I am aware in which the Bishop of London v. Ffytche is mentioned is, Bayshaw v. Batley, Clerk (1 T. R. 78); that was a bond given by the incumbent to the patron on presentation to [179] reside on the living, or to resign it if he did not return to it after notice, and also not to commit waste, etc. in the parsonage-house, and it was held good. In giving judgment, Lord Kenyon said, "This bond was only entered into for the purpose of securing a performance of all those duties, which by law, and without the bond, he was bound to discharge." He then proceeded thus: "I avoid saying any thing about the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche; when that question comes again before the House of Lords, they will, I have no doubt, review the former decision, if it should become necessary. It is sufficient for me to say, that this case cannot be governed by that." Mr. Justice Buller said, "I cannot find any immorality or illegality in this bond. It is the duty of the incumbent to reside on this living, and to be regular in the discharge of his duty. Now this bond requires nothing more. It only requires him to do what the law would have compelled him to do without it."

The next case is Partridge v. Whiston, Clerk (4 T. R. 359); that was an action of debt upon a bond, conditioned;—to reside; to resign for the patron's son to be presented; and to keep the premises on the living in repair. In that case the Defendant pleaded two pleas to the bond; and the question now before your Lordships might, as it would seem, have been raised on the first special plea, which set out the condition upon oyer; and this in effect averred, that the presentation was given in consideration of the Defendant's entering into the bond to resign the living upon the Plaintiff's son taking priest's orders. To this plea there was a demurrer and [180] joinder. But the Court, understanding that it was intended to carry the case up to this House, gave judgment for Plaintiff without argument. They said, as this was not precisely similar to the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, they were bound, by the established series of precedents, to give judgment for the Plaintiff. In this case, therefore, the construction of the statute of Elizabeth is never once thought of.

The next case to which I call the attention of your Lordships, though not in order of time, is that of Newman v. Newman (4 Maule v. Selwyn, 66). That was debt on bond, conditioned;—to pay money to the obligee upon the conveyance of an estate to the obligor, and to present the obligee's son to the next avoidance of a church, the advowson of which belonged to the estate, if he were then of age to take it, or if not to procure the person who should be presented to resign, upon notice of the son's being qualified to take it, and to present him. These facts appeared on oyer of the bond, and were alleged to be simoniacal; there were a demurrer and joinder; and the Court decided that, as the bond was conditioned for the performance of several things, some of which were good, the bond was valid, although one of them might be void at the common law; after argument Lord Ellenborough said, "What the effect of a bond of resignation in favour of a son might be, was not, I believe, touched upon in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, though, perhaps, it might be argued that there is no reason for any distinction, because a parent would be more open to prejudice and improper bias in favour of a son than of any other person." Mr. Justice Le Blanc said, "The [181] reason for making an exception in favour of a condition for presenting a son might be, because it was not for a money consideration."

Mr. Justice Dampier said, "A stipulation to resign in favour of a specified person, does not seem to be open to the same objection as if it were to resign generally, because the latter makes the incumbent a mere tenant at will to the patron. I know that since the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, it has been considered that bonds of resignation in favour of certain specified persons are not illegal." In this case, the judgment is given on that part of the condition of the bond which was holden good, and no judgment was given on the part of the record applicable to this question, and the opinion of Lord Ellenborough seems rather against the validity of special bonds of resignation as not distinguishable from general bonds. Mr. Justice Le Blanc's opinion proceeds entirely on the ground of a special bond of resignation not being for a money consideration, and therefore not bad. But the statute law is not confined to money considerations. Mr. Justice Dampier seems to consider special bonds good: but his reasoning is equally applicable to both descriptions of bonds; and if his reasoning be correct, this bond is bad, because clearly here the obligor is at this moment tenant at will, etc.

In Legh v. Lewis (1 East, 391), this species of bond was touched upon, though not the point in judgment. That was the case of a bond given by a schoolmaster, of an ancient public school, who had, as it was said, a freehold in his office, to resign at the request of his patron: the Court held the bond [182] good. The question arose upon a demurrer to a plea which after over stated all the facts on the record. In giving his judgment Lord Kenyon says, "I never can admit that at common law, a general resignation bond of an office is illegal, although a party may have a freehold in the office. In the instance of ecclesiastical livings that is universally the case; every rector has a freehold in his rectory, yet it was never doubted, but that resignation bonds, for certain purposes, and up to a certain extent, at least were binding, though they put an end to the freehold." Mr. Justice Lawrence expressed great doubts on this question. Mr. Justice Le Blanc agreed with Lord Kenyon, that the bond in that case was good: he thought it fell within the principle of the former determinations, that general bonds of resignation were good at law. I shall, however, have occasion to advert again to this decision.

I am not aware of any other case upon this subject. From this review of the modern cases, it is quite impossible to say that any question concerning the validity of special bonds of resignation has ever come neatly before any of the Courts below, with the exception of Partridge v. Whiston, in which a formal judgment was given in support of such a bond without argument, for the purpose of a writ of error. What became of that case I do not know.

It has been seen then that no well grounded argument in support of a special bond of resignation can be drawn from modern cases: and it will be found, I believe, that the more ancient ones are equally destitute of general reasoning on the subject. If any one will take the trouble of toiling through the old cases in this matter, he will not, I [183] believe, find any decision in which the validity of either species of bond has been discussed or argued on general reasoning, either on the statute or common law.

For these reasons, therefore, it appears to me that I ought to answer the question proposed to the judges in the affirmative: that sufficient matter appears upon the record to show that by the statute law the bond in question is void and illegal. But assuming that the decision in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche proceeded on the ground that the bond in that case was void, as being contrary to public policy, although it might not be a benefit within, or contrary to, the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth, I am disposed to maintain, that the bond in this case operates equally against public policy, and is therefore on that ground equally void and illegal.

Bonds of this description have no existence at the common law, because it was not until a period long subsequent to legal memory that the right of patronage, in the manner in which it now generally obtains, had its origin: but still these bonds, if they operate to the prejudice or detriment of the public interests, are contrary to the common law, inasmuch as every bond or contract which operates against the public convenience, or to the public prejudice, is, upon the principles of the common law, void and of no effect. This doctrine is familiar to every one, and is recognised and illustrated in the case of Collins v. Blintern (2 Wils. 348).

If no authorities could be found on the subject; if the question were res integra, few persons, I think, would contend that this species of instrument given in consideration of and for the presenta-[184]-tion to an ecclesiastical living, is capable of being supported on sound principles of law.

Before the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, numerous cases occur in the books upon the subject; but no one of them, as far as my researches enable me to speak, contains any reasoning or argument in support of these bonds. The authority of these cases seems to depend mainly upon tradition; certainly more upon positive authority than good reasoning. In the latter cases, the judges, whilst they seem to admit that if the question were new, the validity of these instruments could not be supported, decide upon authority merely, and refuse to hear any argument upon this subject.

In 12 Mod. 504, 13 W. 3. Mr. Justice Powell expressed an opinion against resignation bonds, if the authorities had not bound him. He says, that when first the judges held these bonds good, if they had foreseen the mischief of them, they would have been of a contrary opinion. The same opinion is expressed on this subject by Mr. Justice Buller, in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, when that case came before the Court below (see 1 East, 487 n. (a)); and afterwards, when that case was before your Lordships, the same learned judge says, that he had taken no small pains to find out upon what principle all the cases had gone, but without much effect; for after all the labour he had bestowed upon the subject, it seemed to him they were destitute of all sense, reason, and principle. And in Legh v. Lewis (1 East, 396), Mr. Justice Lawrence says, speaking of general resignation bonds, it must be admitted, that if it were a new question at this day, it would be very difficult to say upon principle, that such bonds could be legal, and [185] an opinion in accordance with those to which I have just adverted, has been oftener than once expressed by the highest living authority. On several occasions the noble and learned Lord to whom I allude, has expressed himself unfavourable to those bonds upon principle. He has declared, that the only perplexity he has experienced on the question has arisen from the authorities. No one who has taken the trouble of wading through the cases which are to be found in the books upon the subject of bonds of resignation will, I think, be disposed to question the accuracy of the conclusion at which Mr. Justice Buller states himself to have arrived from a perusal of those cases. That learned judge declared, that the cases appeared to him to be destitute of all reason, sense, and principle. Your Lordships are, however, vehemently called upon to found your decision upon the present occasion on the authority of such cases.

With respect, however, to general bonds of resignation, the more ancient cases no longer exist as authorities upon the subject, and upon what view of the subject can either the ancient or modern cases be considered as authorities in support of special bonds of resignation? I would ask, upon what principle can a special bond of resignation be sustained, I mean with reference to public policy?

It may be worth while to advert for a moment to the nature and extent of the estate and interest which a rector has in point of law in his rectory after institution and induction. Few lawyers will be disposed to deny that by institution and induction a rector becomes seised of a freehold estate for his life in the parsonage house, the glebe, and the tithes of his rectory. The authorities are numerous [186] and uniform on the point (Wils. 347; Gibs. 661; Cro. Jac. 367; Noy, 104), and distinctly stated by Lord Kenyon, in Legh v. Lewis, and by Lord Thurlow, in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche. In pleading, which is the best evidence of the law, a rector states that he is rector, etc. and as such rector that he was, and thence hitherto hath been and still is, seised in his demesne as of freehold, in right of his said rectory of, and in the tenements, etc. and being so seised, etc. If a rector, by virtue of institution and induction, acquires an estate for life, from whom does he derive it? Not from the patron, but from the ordinary. The patron has purely the right of nomination or presentment. That is the whole of the jus patronatus. The office is not in any sense conferred by the patron; it proceeds entirely from the act of the bishop. Then, upon what principle can it be justified at common law, that the patron shall be permitted to exact a security in derogation of this freehold estate, the effect of which will be the converting a life estate into an estate at will.

In the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, Lord Thurlow asks whether a bond of resignation, given by a judge or a master in Chancery, would be good. He says a master in Chancery is an officer appointed for life. Suppose the Chancellor has the appointment, and suppose such master gives a bond to resign when called upon, would that bond be good at common law? No, because it is not only contrary to the constitution of his office, but because the public have an interest in the independence of that officer, as being appointed for life, and a public law officer. His place is independent, it [187] being quam diu se bene gesserit. If he is an officer for life, how can any private man whatsoever, because it is his province to appoint him, take upon him to render that officer's situation what the law says it shall not be? He apprehended it would be extremely difficult to justify those bonds. This reasoning is applicable à fortiori to bonds like those now under consideration; and the difficulty of supporting a bond of resignation, which, in effect, reduced a freehold office to a mere estate at will, is adverted to by Mr. Justice Lawrence, in Legh v. Lewis (1 East, 396). I have already had occasion to observe, that that was the case of a bond of resignation by a schoolmaster. There Mr. Justice Lawrence, after observing that it did not precisely appear on the pleadings, whether the office was a freehold office, says, that he had considerable doubts on the question, how far the person, who has the power of such appointment, could exercise it in a different manner from what the founder intended.

It may be added, that when the case of Legh v. Lewis (3 Bos. and Pul. 231) came on for argument afterwards, on a writ of Error in the Exchequer Chamber, the Court were clearly of opinion, that it did not sufficiently appear on the record, that the office of schoolmaster was such an office as ought for the sake of the public to be deemed a freehold office; and that therefore it was impossible to raise the important question which it was the intention of the parties to litigate, upon which question they declined giving any opinion. Hence it may be collected, that in a clear case of a freehold, (like the present case,) the invalidity of such a bond was considered, by the Court, a question of great difficulty and importance; and the [188] difficulty of establishing a bond to resign a freehold office, at the instance of the person making the appointment, is suggested in Layton v. Paine (Wilkes, 571). That case, it is true, arose on the statute of 5th and 6th Edw. 6. c. 15, against the sale of offices; but still the language of the Lord Chief Justice is extremely applicable to this subject. He says, "I think this is a void condition (a condition to resign the office of Registrar of the Archdeaconry of Wells); for the donor to oblige the officer to surrender whenever he requires it, is to reserve to himself an absolute power over his officer, which he ought not to do; besides, if this were allowed, there would be a plain method chalked out to evade the statute; for any one, by this means, might sell an office for its full value; and such indisputably would be the consequence of supporting the present bond."

In Newman v. Newman (1 Maule and Selw. 71), in speaking of a special bond of resignation, Mr. Justice Dampier observes, that such a bond does not seem to be open to the same objection as if it were to resign generally, because the latter makes the incumbent but a mere tenant at will to the patron. Now if that reasoning be sound, it applies directly to the facts disclosed on the record. It is averred, that one of the nominees in the bond has become capable of taking an ecclesiastical benefice, of consequence the time has arrived at which the obligee may call for a resignation, according to the condition of the bond; but the obligee is not, therefore, obliged to take that step; he may do so, or he may let it alone. If that be so at the time of the commencement of the action in the court below, the obligor was a mere tenant at will to the patron. If he be allowed to retain [189] the living, he would do so by the permission of the patron, and he would hold it on the tenure of the patron's mere will and pleasure. Can any one, then, seriously contend that the condition of this bond, which places the incumbent in such complete thralldom, under so absolute a dominion and restraint, can be supported upon any known or recognized principle of law? The inevitable consequences of such a state of things are too palpable and gross to be dwelt upon for a moment. Such a bond must necessarily operate to the prejudice, if not the total subversion, of the true and essential interests of religion.

Suppose the clerk should resign in conformity to the condition of a bond of this sort, what obligation is there upon the obligee to present the individual specified in the condition? None. He may give the living to a stranger; and if the patron should present a stranger to the living, would the obligor have any remedy, either at law or in equity, against the obligee, for the non-presentation of the nominee in the bond? I should be curious to learn the precise species of remedy or redress, to which an obligor would, under such circumstances, be entitled. Again, there is no obligation upon the nominee to accept the living if it should be offered to him.

How can a clerk, after entering into a bond of this description, honestly take the oath which is administered to him previous to institution? (Gibbs, 802, 810). How can he sign his resignation in the form usually adopted (Ib. 1518), if the ordinary permit him to resign, (which by the way he is not bound to do)? The words of resignation, according to Gibson (Ib. 851. 1518), are [190] "ex certâ scientiâ pure spontè simpliciter et absolute resigno."

If the acceptance of the ordinary be necessary to give effect to the resignation, the undertaking of a clerk to resign a benefice is an undertaking which he has no power of himself to perform, because it depends on the ordinary, whether he will accept the resignation or not.

Another objection arises, on the ground of general policy, to this species of instrument: the patron becomes thereby precluded from choosing the most proper individual for supplying the living. If he act in the presentation according to the condition of the bond, his choice is fixed long before the fitness of the object can be ascertained. At the execution of the bond the nominee may be at college, or perhaps at school, or perhaps in his cradle.

Numberless other objections might be pointed out to this species of bond; but having already occupied too much time, I will conclude by stating it to be my opinion that this bond is void and illegal.

The old cases, as to general bonds of resignation, were overturned by the final decision in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche; and as there is not, as far as I am able to comprehend the subject, any rational distinction between the two descriptions of bonds in their operation and consequences, I conceive that special bonds of resignation are equally destitute of principle and authority. I therefore am bound to say that, in my judgment, sufficient matter appears upon the record to show that, by the common law, this bond is void and illegal.

Garrow, B.: I not only entirely concur in the conclusion to which my learned Brother who has last addressed your Lordships has arrived, but also [191] in all the reasons which he has submitted to your Lordships for the opinion which he has formed. The case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche has settled that general resignation bonds are illegal and void; and it appears to me that bonds of the nature of that which is stated upon this record, differ only from general bonds of resignation in degree. It appears to me to be essential to the best interests of the community, to its religion and morals, and to the character of that useful and honourable class of men, the parochial clergy, that from the moment of induction to their livings, they should be during their incumbency, perfectly free and independent. To place them, in any respect or degree, under the control of any person whatsoever, except their ecclesiastical head, to whom they are accountable for their conduct, would be very much to diminish their usefulness, and to introduce mischiefs only in some degree less than would be occasioned by their absolute dependence upon their patron under general bonds of resignation. To me it appears that if there was any distinction as to the person from whose influence a rector of a parish ought more than any other to be free and independent, it would be that of a patron to whom he owed his presentation.

For these reasons, and for those which have been stated by my learned brother who preceded me, I feel myself bound to answer the question propounded by your Lordships to the Judges in the affirmative, and to state my opinion that sufficient appears upon the present record to render the bond therein stated illegal and void.

Burrough, J. delivered his opinion that the bond was valid.

[192] Park, J.: It is necessary to clear the way by considering one branch of the question first, namely, whether the matter complained of sufficiently appears upon the record to show that the bond was given in consideration of the presentation. Upon this point I believe we are all agreed, however we may differ on others. If this statement of the condition of the bond on the face of the record show it to be illegal it is not necessary to show it again by express averment, but it is sufficient without any allegation in pleading. I agree that you cannot avoid this bond under the statute, however it may be at the common law, unless it was given in consideration of the presentation. For the statute, I humbly conceive, does not in terms make the bond void, but it renders the presentation void. The bond is only avoided as a consequence of the other. It was therefore necessary to see whether the bond was a consideration for the presentation; and I think in reading these pleadings, it was impossible that the judges should be otherwise than unanimous.

In the first place, it is stated that on the very same day by writing under his hand and seal, bearing equal date with the above-written obligation, Lord Sodes had presented; so that manifestly, these were concurrent acts, probably both signing and sealing at the same table in the same instant of time. But it does not stop there, for the consideration of the bond states that the said Brice William Fletcher has agreed to resign; speaking, therefore, in the past time, and prior to the execution of the bond, which only bore equal date with the presentation, and therefore it cannot be doubted that the one was given in consideration of the other: indeed it seems [193] impossible, and common sense revolts at the supposition that such a bond should be given, which is not in consideration of a presentation; for would any man carrying his reason with him, who has actually gotten a living in his possession, give a bond to resign it? I therefore pass from any further observation on this point.

This brings me to the great question in the case, whether this bond is void or illegal by the statute or by common law. In considering this case, I presume I am to understand myself as bound by the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, and to treat that case as the foundation of my argument; if so, I then have no difficulty in stating my humble opinion to your Lordships to be, that the judgment below in this case cannot be supported.

That was the case of a general resignation bond in favour of one of two individuals. Now I should be glad to ask, where in principle is the difference between the one and the other? They vary in degree, but not in kind. If a bond to resign in favour of one of two individuals be good, where is the line to be drawn? Why may it not be in favour of one of three, of one of four, of one of five, of one of six, or till it becomes as general as if no name at all were mentioned, but stood simply and generally, as in Ffytche's case, to resign upon request? If good in favour of two sons or two brothers, as here, there can be no limitation whether the nominees are to be sons, brothers, cousins, friends, or mere acquaintances. In short, unless I greatly deceive myself,—and I have taken great pains to understand the case,—if evils of great magnitude were likely to flow from general bonds of resignation, I think it requires no great degree of penetration to discover [194] that all the mischiefs which were apprehended in the one case, if well grounded, will unavoidably result from the other. But it is said, though the case of Ffytche must now be taken to be law, yet that proceeded against the strong opinions of Westminster-hall, and that decision overturned a great many former decisions, and ought not to be carried further but by legislative enactments. I agree in much of this; I am old enough in Westminster-hall to remember that the decision of that case created a great sensation in the profession. Probably, upon a cool and dispassionate consideration of that case, it may not stand so devoid of authority, of sound principles of policy, for the interests of the church and of religion, as was supposed at that time; nor must it be taken for granted that the policy of allowing general bonds of resignation had never been doubted by very great judges in our courts of common law. For, besides some of those authorities which are to be found in Mr. Cunningham's collection of cases in simony, and in many of which the case had not been argued, and had not been decided upon, I have lately found, that Lord Chief Justice Willes certainly thought them bad; and he was no mean authority, for in Mr. Durnford's valuable edition of that learned Chief Justice's Reports, pages 574 and 575, where he is giving judgment on the validity of a bond given by the Register of an Archdeacon, to surrender whenever the person appointing chose, his Lordship says: "This case was compared to the case of simoniacal bonds; and to be sure the comparison is a very just one, for it has been holden that a bond given by a parson to his patron to resign generally is bad." His Lordship, it is true, excepts this case, [195] "and not to a particular person;" but I have only troubled your Lordships with this quotation, to show that the doctrine established in Ffytche's case was not so new as was supposed; and the case of a resignation to a particular individual was the only one excepted by Lord Chief Justice Willes. However this may be, I am not called on to re-argue Ffytche's case; it is established law; and I do not agree with the conclusion sought to be drawn from it by the bar, that that case is gone to its utmost verge, and ought not to be carried further but by statute. If the House were now called on to establish a new and uncertain principle, which had never been known or acted upon before; in that case legislation alone ought to administer the remedy required for the existing evil. But where, as I have presumed to say before, the principle is precisely the same, that all the mischiefs flowing from the one inevitably flow from the other; where they vary in degree, but not in kind, I think the case no more requires legislative interference than one half of the cases every day occurring in Westminster-hall, where the old principle is applied to new combinations of circumstances, in order to circumvent the inclinations of those who ingeniously are endeavouring, by slight alteration, to defeat or evade the decisions of the Courts.

Is this, then, a case within the statute of Elizabeth? The bond is admitted to be the condition of the presentation: the words of the statute are, "that if any person or persons, for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit or benefit, directly or indirectly, or for or by reason of any promise, agreement, grant, bond, covenant or assurance, present or collate, etc. such presentation shall be utterly [196] void, frustrate, and of none effect in law:" And consequently a bond, the condition of which is illegal, cannot be enforced. But it is said this is not a profit or benefit within the statute. If it be not, I cannot well tell what is or ever will be. This very case shows, if Lord Sodes succeed, he will have an actual pecuniary profit or benefit by the presentation, and may be considered as having sold it for £12,000. I am much at a loss to apprehend any case of a bond of resignation, general or special, which is not a profit or benefit even in the case most highly to be favoured by a Court, and perhaps the least guilty of all, a bond to resign in favour of a son: is not that a benefit? Suppose the son twenty-one, and the father allows him £400 per annum till he is of the canonical age of twenty-four, and that the living he intends for him falls vacant, and he fills it up for three years, taking a bond in £12,000 then to resign in favour of his son. If the incumbent resign, the patron puts his son into a living, perhaps, of eight hundred a year, derives the benefit from saving his own allowance of £400; or if the incumbent will not resign, finding the living cheaply purchased for £12,000, and pays the penalty, the patron gets all that money to settle on the son, and thus in effect he sold a void presentation. Depend upon it, my Lords, that if these special bonds, as they are called, be allowed, you will have every device put on foot by artful, designing and acute men in the lower departments of the law, to evade and elude the wholesome provision of this statute, and render it a dead letter on the statute book. Indeed I verily believe that special bonds of resignation, though known, never came into very general use till after. [197] and was a contrivance to elude the decision in Ffytche's case. It is too much to be feared that, if encouraged, these special bonds will be given as if intended for cases of resignation: but will be a mere device between a needy patron and a monied incumbent to pay a sum of money in two or three years as the apparent penalty for not resigning, when it never was intended he should, but only in this form he should secure a future, when the law clearly would not permit a present payment. In short, to my understanding, to say that where a bond is given under a large pecuniary penalty, by which the clerk is engaged to resign the benefice to the patron on a given event, is not a benefit to the patron, as well as where the resignation is to be on request, is a proposition revolting to common sense and to the apprehension of mankind. It must be a benefit: why then is it not a benefit within the statute? for there are no words of limitation on the generality of the term.

Your Lordships will observe, I have not troubled you with the long string of cases to be found in Cuninghame's Law of Simony, which have been all brought forward and commented upon by the learned counsel at your Lordships' bar. And I have purposely abstained from doing so, because I considered myself as standing upon the last decision in Ffytche v. The Bishop of London, which had closed all discussion upon general resignation bonds. I have thought it my duty to state to your Lordships my humble opinion and the reasons for that opinion, that most of the evils and inconveniences arising from general resignation bonds apply in kind, though perhaps not in species, to the description of bonds mentioned in this case, and being clearly of [198] opinion that this case falls within the statute of Elizabeth. I ought perhaps, here to relieve your Lordships from further hearing me, and I shall not trouble the House much longer; but I own it does seem to me that such bonds are against the general policy of the law of England. It is amongst the first things we learn in the law (1st Blackstone's Commentaries, 385), that a parson has, during his life, the freehold in himself, and of which he can only be deprived in five ways: by death; by cession in accepting another incompatible benefice; by consecration to a bishopric, unless by the favour of the Crown he is allowed to hold his benefice in commendam: by resignation, if the ordinary will accept: and by deprivation for crime (Littleton, 528; Co. Litt. 120 a, 341 b, and 300 a and b). The Bishop cannot institute him for a less term, and yet the effect of resignation bonds, general or special, is to convert that office which by presentation, institution and induction, becomes an office for life, and in which the rector has the freehold into a term for years, of longer or shorter duration, at the pleasure of the owner of the advowson, according to the object he has in view. Therefore, any "Contract, Bond," etc. by which the incumbent undertakes to resign, being inconsistent with his actual situation as recognised by the law, and with that life estate, which, as Rector, he has in the living, must be contrary to law.

When your Lordships come to consider the Oath of Simony, as it is called, which every rector must take when instituted to a benefice, as prescribed by the Canons of 1603 (Canon 40), is it fitting that a patron on one hand, should have power to entrap the [199] conscience of a poor needy Clergyman, perhaps under the pressure of great poverty, or the cries of a starving family; or that such a miserable man be thus tempted to violate his duty to God, as his immediate servant, by taking God's holy name in vain, and to call upon him to witness a falsehood? can a man who deliberately swears "That he has made no simoniacal payment, contract, or promise, directly or indirectly, by himself or any other, to his knowledge, or with his consent, ^{or} for, or concerning the procuring, or obtaining, of this ecclesiastical dignity, place, preferment, office, or living, etc., so help him God through Jesus Christ," be fit to serve in the sacred offices of the Church of that God and Saviour whom he has dared thus solemnly to adjure and witness that he has not entered into any contract, when the ink is not dry, nor the wax cold, which have been used in the concoction of this unlawful instrument? Your Lordships will find from this observation, that I am in no respect advocating the conduct of the Plaintiff in error, either in the first instance, in giving such a bond, or in the last, in refusing to obey its conditions of it. His poverty may have seduced him into the first offence, but his conduct in the last must call down the reprobation of every honest man who has the cause of pure religion and sound morals at heart. The noble Defendant in error may not have known the nature of the oath which his presentee was to take, and I wish and hope that may be his excuse. But these bonds are, in my judgment, my Lords, fraught with still greater evils with respect to society: the moment a man is instituted and inducted to a Rectory, the law assumes, considers, and wishes him to be independent, and free from all control, except that of his ordi-[200]-nary, in the exercise of his high and spiritual authority: but these bonds must necessarily often have the effect of placing him under the control of the patron, in situations very improper and extremely unbecoming the clerical character. I wish not to enlarge on these points, because I think too highly of the clergy to suppose that many would yield to any very unreasonable requests: but my objections apply to the temptation of doing so being often great, where urgent calls may aid that temptation.

But it is said that Bishops may be trusted not to accept of resignations under improper circumstances. I am willing to admit this: but will persons who make no scruple of entering into such engagements, and who scruple not to call the God of Heaven to witness a falsehood, make any difficulty of keeping back from the Bishop every fact which would endanger his institution or his mandate for induction? And can a Bishop, without some information on which he can act, deal so uncharitably with his brethren, as to think it necessary to put such sifting questions to every Clergyman who comes to him for institution, as imply a belief, or even a suspicion, that he has sworn, or is coming to take a false oath? Or could he, without the same breach of Christian charity, suspect that every Clergyman who resigns a living into his hands, declaring thus, ex certâ scientiâ purè spontè simpliciter et absolutè resigno, has, notwithstanding, entered into a simoniacal bond to do so, when, at the same time, it is undoubtedly true, that he who would take such an Oath of Simony contrary to the truth, would feel no difficulty in asserting that his resignation was purè et simpliciter?

The case of Bossley v. Bayshaw (4 Term Reports, 78) has been [201] pressed upon your Lordships, which was the case of a bond to reside on the living, or to resign. The court upheld that bond, because it supported the cause of religion, by insisting on what is so essential to the good of the cause, namely, the residence of the incumbent. My Lords, I am not called upon to say, whether such a bond thus abstracting from the authority and giving to the obligee of the bond the power of the Bishop would, in my opinion, be good; but it is different from this case: I believe it was quoted for the opinion of Lord Kenyon on Ffytche's case, but I consider that case not now open to discussion; and, after all, what is the dictum of Lord Kenyon in that case? (He was Counsel in that cause, and his mind might naturally be disposed to have considered it in a particular way.) But his Lordship only says, "when that question comes again before the House of Lords, they will, I have no doubt, review the former decision, if it should become necessary." This does not infer that there will be any difficulty in the case if it come before you.

There is another case of Partridge v. Whiston (4 Term Reports, 559), which was a special bond of resignation in favour of a son; but the Court heard no argument, and gave no opinion, except that it was not the same as that of Ffytche, and understanding that it was to go to the House of Lords, gave judgment for the Plaintiff. With respect to those Cases in Equity, in the time of Lord Chancellor Eldon, in which his Lordship has been supposed to hold the validity of special bonds of resignation, I take it his Lordship meant no more than this, that there being a general notion that such bonds were good, he would [202] not, as a single Judge, take upon him to decide upon their validity or invalidity, but he would put the question in such a shape as to obtain the judgment of this House upon it, and accordingly, his Lordship sent one of the cases to the Court of King's Bench, but I believe it was compromised. This I assume to be the extent of Lord Chancellor Eldon's intention in the Court of Chancery; and he, who is now present, best knows whether I have drawn the right conclusion from what he expressed. I understand the Lord Chancellor assents to my statement, and a case now has arrived for the opinion of this House.

I beg pardon for having trespassed so long on the attention of the House, but I conclude with stating my clear opinion, that sufficient matter appears upon this record to show, that by the statute law (and, for the reasons above given, I am strongly inclined to think, that by the common law also) the bond on which the action of debt was brought, and which bears equal date with the writing of presentation, is illegal and void.

Burrough, J.* I agree with Mr. Justice Gaselee, in thinking that the bond is valid. The case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche turned upon the actual admission in the pleadings of the simoniacal contract. Being so admitted, the decision in that case could not possibly have been otherwise.

Mr. Baron Graham. My Lords, this is a bond for the performance of an agreement, and a breach assigned, under the 8th and 9th of William and Mary, cap. 11, sec. 8, which says, "that in all actions for non-performance of any covenants or agreements, in any indenture, deed, or writing con-[203]-tained, the Plaintiff shall assign as many breaches as he shall think fit, and the jury shall assess," etc. The Defendant in error has proceeded under this Act. Here the breach assigned is a breach of the condition of the bond; the condition therefore is the expression of the agreement of the parties. Your Lordships, therefore, must look to the form of the agreement as expressed in the condition of the bond, and must put a construction upon it. Looking at the simple expression of the transaction, and the occasion of it, I think that it appears by the plain and natural construction, that the presentation was acquired solely upon the terms of giving this bond; that is, that the bond was the consideration or the price paid for the presentation; why else are both these instruments of the same date? probably executed on the same day, the presentation being first executed, in the order and course of the transaction, as before the parson presented gives a bond to resign, he must have something to resign. It seems to me impossible to consider the presentation as a separate act, independent and unconnected with the bond. Suppose that, after Lord Sondes had executed the presentation, Mr. Fletcher had refused to execute the bond, would not Lord Sondes have refused to give validity to the presentation, and he had a power to revoke it? (2 Bolls Abr. 319). "If a man present his clerk to the Bishop, he may present another before the Bishop has received his clerk;" a fortiori, Lord Sondes might have cancelled his seal before he sent the clerk to the necessary service of presentation to the Bishop. The language is, "whereas Lord Sondes has presented, [204] and whereas Fletcher has agreed to resign." What is that but to say, that Lord Sondes has presented, because Fletcher has agreed? The inducement of Lord Sondes to present, is the agreement of Fletcher to resign: in other words, the consideration of the presentation was the agreement to resign: for without it, by the terms of the agreement, the presentation would not have been made, nor vice versa. If this be the clear sense of the agreement, the question is, whether this bond is within the 31st of Eliz. cap. 4; that is, whether it is, directly or indirectly, a benefit within the true meaning of that statute.

* This opinion should have preceded that of Mr. J. Park. It is misplaced by accident.

Whether a benefit or not is best discovered by the use that is made of the bond: this view places the Defendant in error in a singular position. Arguments at your Lordships' bar were urged, to show that such a bond is not a benefit to the patron, within the true and approved meaning of that statute; but the use which he has made of the bond, and the record which is now before your Lordships, prove, that it is a benefit to the extent of £10,000. If it be said that this was not a benefit contemplated at the time, but was unexpected and remote, and the effect of the breach of good faith: I answer it was the object of the bond to secure, when required, a presentation, or to secure a compensation in case of such presentation being prevented. The bond secures a power to create a vacancy, or an equivalent for withholding that power: the equivalent is therefore the exact measure of the value of that power, and that, in this instance, is ascertained to be £10,000.

It is said, with a weight of authority which I respect, that these bonds, by contemporaneous decisions, long followed, have never been considered as [205] benefits within the statute: but that weight is much lessened by the discussions which took place in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche. That case has authorised us to look to this without the prejudices of past opinions, however high in estimation, or even past decisions: and I may be allowed to say, that not one of those decisions underwent that full discussion as to the effect of those bonds, which it received in the case to which I allude, or received that illustration which has been thrown upon the subject by the arguments at the bar, and the state of the record in this case.

It is said that this is not corrupt: though there may be no moral turpitude in taking an equivalent for a thing given, yet it may be called a corrupt contract. In this case, a right of presentation is given, which the law forbids: it is a gift which the law does not allow, and is therefore corrupt. But, my Lords, I humbly think, that bonds of resignation, general, or in favour of a son or other person, are void, on the fundamental principles of the common law. A parson has a freehold at law. Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 341) says, "In whom the fee simple of the glebe is, is a question in our books; some hold that it is in the patron, but that cannot be, for two reasons, etc.; some that the fee simple is in the patron and ordinary, but this cannot be, for the causes aforesaid, and therefore of necessity the fee simple is in abeyance, as Littleton saith. Upon consideration of all our books, I observed this diversity, that a parson or vicar, for the benefit of the church and of his successor, is, in some cases, esteemed in law, to have a fee simple qualified; but to do any thing to the prejudice of his successor, in many cases, the [206] law adjudgeth him to have, in effect, but an estate for life. Causae ecclesiae publicis causis aequiparantur, and summa ratio est quae pro religione facit, and ecclesia fungitur vice minoris meliorem facere potest conditionem suam deteriozem nequaquam." I will not say more on this head: your Lordships are aware of the able manner in which that was urged as the ground of the opinion of a noble Lord, in the case so frequently alluded to: I therefore humbly offer my opinion, that the question ought to be answered in the affirmative.

The Lord Chief Baron (May 2, 1826). The question is, Whether sufficient matter appears upon the record, to show that the bond on which the action is brought, is void or illegal, either by the common law or statute? I am one of those who are of opinion that enough appears upon the record to show that the bond is void and illegal. It is not my purpose to enter at great length into this argument; I should be in danger of occupying the important time of your Lordships, by a mere repetition of what has been already very clearly and strongly urged. I shall confine myself to a brief exposition of the course of reasoning which has led me to the conclusion I have stated.

I am of opinion that the condition of the bond, which condition is narrated upon this record, sufficiently shows the nature of this transaction: it shows that the transaction was a stipulation for the bond, on one side, and the presentation on the other. The bond would not have been given without the presentation, nor the presentation without the bond: the whole is one contract, of which these are the corresponding parts: this is, I think, manifest, upon the face of the instrument itself: the instrument is [207] upon the record, and we are therefore able to reach the merits of the question. Next I am of opinion, that the decision in this House, in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, would, if I were otherwise disinclined to it, compel me to answer to your Lordships' question, that this bond is void and illegal by statute: this conclusion follows necessarily from that decision: it is, as it seems to me, a strict consequence of it. I cannot distinguish, upon any tangible principle, between a general and a special resignation bond. All objections, of all descriptions, which exist fatal to the one, affect the other; somewhat softened and alleviated, it is true, by the patron's supposed object; softened, not eradicated: they exist still, exactly of the same nature and character.

These are the general grounds of my opinion: I proceed to explain them somewhat more in detail, yet still I trust briefly. Upon the first point, that is, whether the contract, which taints this instrument, is sufficiently apparent upon the record, I feel it to be the less requisite to detain your Lordships, because the Judges appear to be nearly agreed upon it; I shall only say, that legal sense is very remote from the common sense of mankind, if the mutual contract is not manifest upon the face of the document. By the condition of the bond recited in the record, it appears that the presentation and the bond bear equal date: it is there stated that the patron had made the presentation, and the clerk had agreed to resign upon request: would it not, in the common affairs of the world, be an insult to the understanding equally of the lettered and the unlettered, to tell them that these cotemporary acts and obligations, recited in the same instrument, bearing [208] date on the same day, having, from their nature, reference and relation to each other, were not the corresponding parts of one contract, but distinct and independent acts?

I would remind your Lordships of the words of Lord Mansfield, in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, upon this point, if it had not been done yesterday, by my brother, Mr. Justice Park. It is sufficient if the contract appears upon the bond: if it had not appeared, it might have been necessary to plead it; but in all the discussions at which I have been present upon this case, no reason has been stated, nor valid authority cited, to prove that that must be supported by averment, which is manifest without it.

I shall now proceed to explain why I think the order made by your Lordships' House, in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, decides the present question. In the first place, I do not presume to examine that order further than is necessary to ascertain what it is that must be inferred from it, what are the principles on which it is founded, and what rule of decision it lays down for future Judges: to that extent I must examine it, because without such examination, I cannot apply it; but I ought to go further: it is not for me to inquire whether that resolution departed from the course of decision which had before prevailed in Westminster-hall, nor whether it is supported by those great principles of civil and ecclesiastical policy interwoven with the constitution of the state, as essential to its prosperity. These were topics properly brought into action when that case was under consideration: here, in my humble judgment, they are at least unnecessary. That cause is decided, and I am bound by it: there [209] I must look for the law upon this subject. To what source are we to look for what is called the declaration of the unwritten law of the land, if not to the decisions of the supreme judicature; and upon what principle are you to expect that your decisions shall bind your posterity, in the times that are to come, if you yourselves are not bound by what your predecessors have done in the times that are past? I take therefore the rules that necessarily flow from that decision, to be fixed and settled.

It follows from that decision, that a general bond of resignation is void and illegal: I say general. The issue, in that case, it is true, was not upon the validity of the bond, but it involved that question: the issue was upon the presentation; if the presentation was illegal, because of its connexion with the bond, the bond must have been illegal, because of its connexion with the presentation. If a contract be void, either as prohibited by positive enactment, or as contravening the policy of the law, the engagements on both sides must be equally invalid: if the whole contract is void, every part must be so. I refer to the case cited by my brother Hullock, yet I will take the liberty of adding one dictum, on account of the great names from whence it comes: the Earl of Mansfield and Bishop Stillingfleet. Lord Mansfield, in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, is reported to have expressed himself as follows: "The next objection stated was, that the bond was good, but the presentation void: that is very extraordinary, and Bishop Stillingfleet treats it as a most absurd proposition,—that it was a good agreement in respect of the bond, and bad in respect of the presentation: and that that which was corrupt in itself, could be good in a bond and bad in a pre-[210]sentation." The opinion expressed in these words, appears to me to be so clear, that I feel entire confidence that no scepticism can doubt it, and no subtlety confuse it. I assume, therefore, that a decision against the validity of the presentation, in the great cause so often alluded to, was in effect, a decision against the bond of resignation, which had been there given, or, in other words, against a general bond of resignation. The case which is my guide, having settled that a general bond of resignation is invalid, it remains for me to consider whether, upon the same principles, I am to adopt the same conclusion, as to a special bond, with the provisions contained in that now in question.

The two points which appear to me to have conducted the House to the reversal of the judgment below in that cause, are, first, that the bond was a benefit to the patron within the statute of Elizabeth: and secondly, that it was in effect an abridgement of that estate for life in the benefice which the law deemed essential to the independence of the incumbent, to the due administration of the duties of his sacred office, and which was therefore conferred upon him by the admission, institution and induction, and which for the same reasons it would not permit to be abridged by any contrivance whatever: what it was agreed should not be done directly, it would not permit to be done indirectly. That these were the chief points in debate in that cause, so far as related to its substance and its merits, I collect partly from the questions put by the House to the Judges, and partly from the opinions reported to have been delivered by such of the Members of this House as concurred in the order of reversal ultimately pronounced. The question is, whether [211] either or both of these objections may not be equally stated against this bond? It appears to me that both may. I think that if a general bond be a benefit to the patron, this is so also. A general bond is an obligation to resign upon request made. It is general because there is no previous condition necessary to enforce the resignation other than the request. This bond is also an obligation to resign upon request. That is the contract: but there is annexed to it a condition that the request shall not be made until a person named be capable of accepting a benefice. Is that condition wholly destructive of the benefit? The benefit may be less in degree, because many circumstances must concur instead of one; but that does not alter the nature and character of the stipulation. It was argued in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, that these bonds, if they were legal, afforded an easy mode of selling the presentation after the vacancy. The argument was this: Let the clerk give the resignation bond: when the request is made, let him refuse: let the action be brought, and let the patron recover: there is a sale of the presentation authorized by the law: is not this quite as open to the same contrivance? The obligation is precisely on the same terms, with this addition only, that some person named, you cannot confine it to a son or relation, it may be any body, shall be capable of accepting the benefice. How easy to insert a convenient name. The person named becomes capable: the request is made as was intended: it is refused: the action is brought: the money paid: and the living is legally sold. Is it not obvious, my Lords, that if the argument I have referred to had any weight against general bonds, it ought also to weigh against a special bond? I have stated that in this [212] bond the stipulation is the same as in a general bond. The contract of the clerk is to resign upon request. The nominee is introduced only to explain why the patron has exacted the bond, and to affirm that his object in requiring the resignation, will be to present the nominee. But when he has obtained the resignation, who can undertake that he will present the nominee, or that the nominee will accept? The capacity to accept is the whole condition. Nothing more is required to authorise the request, and with the request to entitle the Plaintiff to recover.

It appears to me obvious that these circumstances do not alter the nature and character of the benefit derived from the bond, but only diminish the amount of the value, by converting that which in the general bond is a certain advantage into a contingent advantage. A man may dispute how far, in what degree, the contingency diminishes the benefit: but no man can say that it destroys it. No such bond as this can be given without putting it upon the cards, (if I may be allowed such an expression on such a subject,) that the patron may derive great benefit from it. In this case, for instance: sustain this bond; affirm this judgment; you decide that this bond is no benefit to the patron: and you prove it by transferring by force of the bond a large sum of money into his pocket. It were easy for me, my Lords, to multiply hypothetical cases in which the patron might derive advantage from such an obligation on the part of the clerk: I shall not, however, pursue it, having, as I humbly conceive, said enough to explain the course of reasoning which induces me to think, that if a general bond of resignation be a benefit to the patron within this statute, this also must be a benefit to him: not perhaps so highly [213] valuable, but still a benefit, and exactly of the same character and description. The other great objection urged against general resignation bonds is, if possible, more manifestly applicable to special bonds than that which I have just mentioned. It is, that they affect the degree of interest which the wisdom and policy of the law gives to a clerk in his benefice: that is, an estate for life.

In the argument of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, it is thus put: The whole estate and interest of the clerk is derived from the bishop: no part of it from the patron. He has a bare power of nomination. The law gives him no authority to diminish or vary the estate or interest conferred; to do so indirectly, is in truth a fraud upon the law, adverse to its spirit, and destructive of its views; so it was argued by those Lords whose opinions prevailed in that cause. Does not this bond also quite as evidently vary and diminish the estate conferred by institution and induction? Can any distinction be suggested in this respect between general and special bonds? I venture confidently to answer, none. The incumbent's estate is liable to be determined on the person becoming capable of accepting a benefice, and upon request, so that that is a limitation upon an estate for life. When the first condition has happened, as in this case, the bond becomes void, and the estate of the incumbent hangs upon the request: If that circumstance, therefore, is fatal to general bonds, it must be equally so to the bond referred to in the question put to the judges.

The feeling to which the opinions I have stated are adverse, arises from the effect which these opinions have in diminishing the value of advowsons, and in somewhat embarrassing patrons in the object [214] of providing, by means of church preferment, for their friends or relations. Upon this I shall say only, it certainly has that effect: but in my humble judgment, that circumstance ought not to affect my opinion on the question put by your Lordships. It would be more material in a question of what the law ought to be, than in a question of what it is. Even then there are weighty considerations on the other side, but here the topic is misplaced. The answer which I give to the question put is, that I think the case decided by your Lordships rules this question, and that I must answer that this bond is illegal and void.

The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas: I will not detain the House by any technical observations on the point, whether the supposed objection to the bond be raised by the pleadings in this cause, because if it had been expressly stated on the record that the Plaintiff in error was presented to the living of Kettering on the condition of his giving a bond to resign, to the intent and for the sole and only purpose (in the language of the bond) that the Defendant in error might be enabled to present one of his younger brothers, when such brother should be capable of being inducted into such living, in my opinion, the bond would not have been void either by the statute or the common law. But for the judgment of this House in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, I will venture to say, that there never was a lawyer, from the time when tithes were first granted to the church to the present, who would not without hesitation have given the same answer. It is now, however, thought by some of my learned brothers, that resignation bonds in favour of particular persons, although sanctioned by judges, bishops, and chancellors, are void; [215] that the condition of resigning benefices is repugnant to the estate which incumbents have in them, and therefore bonds containing such a condition are void by the common law: that such bonds are benefits to the patron, and subject the givers and takers of them to all the penalties of the statute for the prevention of simony; that they cause the ministers of the gospel to take false oaths, and are therefore not to be endured in a Christian community. Although I most sensibly feel the weight of the authority to which my humble opinion is opposed; yet, supported by two of my learned brothers, I am vain enough to think we shall satisfy your Lordships, that such bonds are liable to none of these objections. The judgment in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, has not decided, nor did the House intend in that case to decide, this question. But it has been insisted in argument, that the principle, which that case establishes, governs this. My first duty will be to show, that that case establishes no principle, which by fair legal reasoning can be applied to the present: I have not, therefore, to express the hope, which Lord Kenyon expressed, that your Lordships will review that decision: I have only to request that the principle on which that judgment rests may not be extended further than those who pronounced it ever intended it should be, and that it may not be applied to cases which cannot be productive of the evils which it was their object to remedy. Thus much I might ask, although disposed to admit what has always appeared to me repugnant to reason and authority, namely, that a supreme court of justice cannot undo what it has erroneously done. Although the courts below will not impugn your Lordships' judgments in cases ad idem, yet they do not hold [216] that they are bound by them beyond the point actually decided. The courts below truly say, we cannot know that the House of Lords would carry this determination farther than they have carried it. In the case of Partridge v. Whiston (4 Term Reports, 360), the Court of King's Bench said, "that a bond to resign in favour of the son of the patron did not raise a point precisely like that in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, and they were bound by the established series of precedents to give judgment for the Plaintiff." This decision, although pronounced on a point appearing on the record, and therefore liable to be disputed in this House, was never disturbed.

In the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, the point decided was, that a presentation was void which was made in consideration of a bond given by the presentee to the patron, by which the former bound himself to the latter, absolutely to resign the living on request made to him by the patron to make such resignation. The question in this case turns upon a bond given by the presentee to the patron to perform an agreement made between them, that the former would resign the living to the latter, to the intent and for the sole and only purpose that the latter might present one of his brothers when such brother shall be capable of taking an ecclesiastical benefice. The question in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, regarded one particular description of bonds. In the present case it regards bonds of a very different kind.

If you reason from generals to particulars, the course is easy and safe: but if you rise from particulars to generals, or draw inferences from one particular to another, you must be careful that the [217] particulars, in every material respect, resemble each other, or your reasoning will be illogical, and the analogy will fail. This is strictly true in every science, and the Bishop of Landaff, who was eminently learned in many sciences, says, in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, "A slight variation in circumstances vitiates the validity of a precedent: and the ground on which it vitiates it is, that we cannot tell whether this variation of circumstances, had it been contemplated by the court which first established the precedent, might not have operated so as to produce a different judgment." We are all sensible that when the mind is suspended as it were in equilibrio, by the equal prevalence of opposite reasoning, in cases of intricacy, what a little circumstance would cause it to preponderate; and this little circumstance by which any case differs from an adjudged case, lessens, if it does not annihilate, the weight of a precedent. I will presently show that special bonds in favour of particular persons cannot be used for the same corrupt purposes as general bonds, and that they differ from them more in substance than they do in form. The House, in the Bishop of London v.

Ffytche, did not go beyond the question raised by the pleadings in the cause. The question put to the judges in that case was, not whether all resignation bonds are void, but whether certain specified bonds are void! The language of the question is, whether an agreement whereby the incumbent undertakes to avoid the benefice at the request of such patron be not an agreement for a benefice to such patron? The answer of the learned Judge (L. C. J. Eyre), who was of opinion that the bonds spoken of in the question were illegal, is confined to general bonds to resign on request. [218] He says, "In this case the patron presented by reason of an agreement that the clerk should give him a general bond of resignation, which being a profit and benefit within the statute, his presentation is void." That is the general question on the plea. Again he says, "The form of these bonds facilitates to a great degree that buying and selling of benefices which Bishop Gibson says they were introduced for the purpose of effecting. The legal history of those bonds shows how generally they have been used for that purpose." Whether Lord Chief Justice Eyre's reasoning, that because the form of these bonds was calculated to facilitate the buying and selling livings, therefore (without proof that the bond in question was intended to be used for this purpose) all such bonds are to be holden to be simoniacal, be just or not, it cannot apply to the bond in the present case. Such reasoning cannot apply to bonds, the history of which does not show that they have been used to facilitate the sale of livings, and which can only be used for such a purpose in one case, namely, where the presentation is sold to a person incapable of being presented, whilst the church is void, and a bond is taken from the clerk presented to resign when the purchaser shall be in full orders. Cases of this sort can scarcely ever occur; they must be so rare, that it is impossible to make them the grounds of a general condemnation of such bonds. It is enough that the bond may be avoided when such a corrupt use of it is proved.

The reverend prelates who favoured the House with their opinions in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, although they expressed doubts of the legality of bonds in any form or under any circumstances, confined their judgments to general bonds, and all their reasoning went to prove the impolicy of [219] general bonds only. The Bishop of Bangor says, "I am inclined to think that bonds of resignation, whether the condition be special or general, are within the express letter of the statute of Elizabeth, because it is impossible to conceive how a presentee can in any instance give a bond of resignation to a patron from which the patron will not derive some benefit or reward directly or indirectly." This is but an inclination of opinion, not a decided judgment, and I would beg to observe, that if the principle of some benefit, direct or indirect, be adopted, (a principle altogether inconsistent with the legal construction of penal statutes,) many most conscientious patrons, as well ecclesiastical as lay, have committed the detestable crime of simony. The Bishop of Bangor says, "If a bond of any sort can be said to be without exception." Except these expressions of dislike of any bonds of resignation, all the observations of the reverend prelates are directed against general, and general bonds only. The Bishop of Salisbury says, "General bonds of resignation have usually been given, and from the instant they are given, the wretched presentee is taken from under the protection of that law which guards every other subject of the state: he ceases to be free, because he holds his living at the absolute will of his patron, subject to his caprice." The Bishop of Bangor speaks always of general bonds: "Suppose," says his Lordship, "that a patron presents a clerk to a benefice, without receiving any money, bond, or assurance for money, but the clerk enters into a bond to resign on six months' notice. As soon as he is in possession, the patron demands a lease of certain tithes at an under rent." His Lordship sums up his argument by saying, "the worst and most corrupt [220] practices may be carried on under general bonds of resignation." The Bishop of Landaff speaks of general bonds only. The Bishop of Gloucester says (Cunningham, p. 151), "A bond which conceals the consideration for which it was given, and which may easily be abused to the most oppressive and iniquitous purposes, affords a strong suspicion of a bad design. If the consideration was a good one, why is it not expressed, as in special bonds it always is, in plain words." Although these learned prelates, from a proper regard to the independence of the clergy, and a jealousy of what they thought interfered with the authority of their order, disliked all resignation bonds, yet it is clear that they only decidedly condemned general bonds. The Bishop of Gloucester distinctly admits not only of the legality, but the propriety of some special bonds of resignation.

The reasoning of Lord Thurlow goes only to impugn general bonds. "Nobody," he says, "contends that the practice is not wicked, destructive, and pernicious to the discipline of the church, and contrary to the spirit of the law under which it was carried on." "He could produce evidence of an offer to sell an advowson, upon which the purchase-money was calculated and put on a general bond of resignation, (no such arrangement could be made on a special bond,) and he knew that instances of it were frequent" (Id. p. 156). Lord Thurlow had recently changed his opinion. When the Bishop of London v. Ffytche came before him in the Court of Chancery, that learned Lord said, "If there were no cases, I should think it clear that a mere bond for resignation could not be criminal, unless it were a profit or benefit to the patron. Many cases have determined that these [221] bonds are good. The effect of the determination is, that they are not simoniacal, nor against the policy of the law" (1 Brown, C. C. 98). His Lordship's argument in the House of Lords, so far from proving that bonds to resign in favour of a son or brother (which no reasonable man could say are wicked and pernicious to the discipline of the church, and could be made use of to enable sales of benefices) are illegal, shows that general bonds of resignation, although under circumstances voidable in Chancery, are not void at common law. He says, "The bond is not capable of being avoided, but by averments of bad consideration and use: if you cannot aver upon it in that manner, whatever the canon law may do with it, by the common law it cannot be rescinded" (Cunningham, 158). His Lordship then compares them to marriage brokerage bonds, and says, "abundant cases may be put to show that it is impossible to avoid those bonds at law, and refers to the case of Hall v. Potter (Id. 25), decided in this House, in confirmation of his opinion. If I understand this argument, it is not that every general bond is void at law; but, that it may be avoided if a bad use be made of it. Lord Mansfield says, "The case stands singly on this proposition, whether an agreement by a general bond of resignation in consideration of a presentation was, by 31st of Elizabeth, simoniacal, corrupt, and void!"

I hope I have clearly shown, from the pleadings, the questions put to the judges, and the opinions of the judges, and members of this House, in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, that the question now submitted to us by your Lordships, is not touched by the judgment in that case. It has been stated that special bonds differ only in form from [222] general bonds: that the condition to resign may be in favour of such as are neither the children nor relations of the patron: that if the names of two persons may be introduced into such bonds, the names of any greater number of persons may be inscribed. Put into a special bond as many names as you please, you can no more make it in form or substance like a general bond, than by adding equal to unequal numbers you can make the totals equal. You cannot by a special bond reduce the incumbent to the same state of dependence on the caprice of the patron as by a general bond. You cannot render it available to accomplish the sale of a benefice as you can a general bond. If a living be vacant, it cannot be sold; but if general bonds were permitted, the patron might present to the vacant benefice; take a general bond of resignation from the presentee; and when he has got his price for the benefice, call on the incumbent to resign; and thus, as Lord Thurlow says, "he may calculate the purchase-money on a general bond of resignation." The patron cannot make this calculation on a special bond, even if he be not obliged to present on the resignation of the incumbent the person mentioned in the bond, and on whose behalf the resignation is called for. If a special bond can be made use of to evade the penalties of the statute of Elizabeth, the taking it for such a purpose, if properly pleaded and proved, would render it void, and the insertion of an unusual number of names, and those persons not connected with the patron, would be evidence of such an intent.

I am not prepared to say, that the persons in whose favour resignations are required must be relations of the patron. He may honestly think that a person who, from temporary infirmity or absence, or from [223] his not yet being in orders, is incapable of being presented to the living, will, when the disability shall be removed, be the fittest person to fill the church. But I think, my Lords, that a patron may be compelled to present the person, for the purpose of presenting whom he calls on the incumbent to resign, and that he may thus be prevented from making an improper use of the power given him by the bond, as my Brother Gaselee has said. The Bishop may refuse to accept the resignation until he has in his hands the presentation of him in whose favour the resignation is required, or the incumbent may make a conditional resignation: such conditional resignations have been made where livings have been exchanged. Sir Simon Degge gives us the form of such a resignation, in which the Bishop is expressly required not to admit the other clerk, unless the exchange be completed: but to consider that resignation as of no effect. This agrees with the common law. Lord Coke says, "If two exchange lands, and one die before the exchange is executed, it is void."

There are several instances in which courts of equity have interfered to prevent the making an ill use of these bonds. No case is to be found of an action at law: but as the loss of a benefice is the loss of a temporal advantage, (otherwise the Court of Chancery could not have interfered,) I should think that there could be no doubt that if a patron called on an incumbent to resign his benefice to the intent and for the sole and only purpose that he might present A. B., in favour of whom the patron had a right to call on the incumbent to resign, and after having obtained the resignation by such false pretence, he presented C. D., for whom the bond did not authorise the patron to require a resignation, compensation [224] for the injury the incumbent had sustained might be recovered in an action. If such an action be not maintainable, a man may through fraud sustain a temporal injury, and yet have no redress, which I apprehend would be inconsistent with the first principles of our law.

Although the validity of general bonds was supported in a great number of decided cases, there were some in which they were declared to be illegal. Lord Keeper North said he was not satisfied that such bonds were good in law. In the case of Graham v. Graham, such bonds were holden to be within the statute of Elizabeth by the Court of Common Pleas, in the 15th of James the 1st. Where authorities clash, a court of error, at the same time that it confirms some judgments, must over-rule such as are contrary to them: but where there is a long series of decisions, and no authority can be opposed to them, I think a court of law cannot overturn them. The legality of special bonds is supported by decisions both in common law courts and courts of equity from the time of Henry the Fourth to the present. In Johns v. Lawrence, it was recited on the bond that it was the intention of the obligee to preserve the presentation for his son when he should be capable of taking the living: the obligor bound himself to resign within three months after request. The King's Bench first, and afterward the Court of Exchequer Chamber, held, that a bond to resign on request if the patron will present his son thereto when he should be capable of taking the living is good. This is the decision of all the Judges in England in the 8th of James I. Lord Coke was then Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and in his reading on the statute of Elizabeth, he says, that he was in Parliament when that [225] Act passed, that he voted with the proceedings of the House, and he concurred with the other judges that such a bond was valid. Can your Lordships have so safe a guide to lead you to the true meaning of the statute as one of the most eminent lawyers that ever lived, who took a part in the making of the law, knew the evil that Parliament meant to correct, and the exact extent to which it was intended the remedy should be carried! In Hillier v. Stapleton, Michaelmas 1707, the Lord Keeper said, "Resignation bonds have been allowed since the statute only to preserve the living for the patron himself or for a child, or to restrain the incumbent from non-residence, or a vicious course of life." If the bond be general, his Lordship observes, a particular agreement must be proved to resign for the benefit of a friend that would be presented, and without such agreement, the bond ought not to be sued on.

In Peele v. Cypel, 9th George I., the bond was to resign when the patron's nephew came of age. Instead of the patron's requiring a resignation, an agreement was made that Peele should hold the living, paying the nephew £30 a year. This payment was made for several years, but was afterwards refused, and the bond put in force. The Chancellor granted an injunction, but said it was not on account of any defect in the bond, which he held good, but on account of the use that had been made of it.

In an anonymous case, in 13 William III., Powell, J. concurred with Blencow, the only other judge in Court, in supporting a general bond, because he says it may be to an honest intent, as that the patron may have a son of his own capable of taking the benefice: but, says he, if this was the real motive, why should it not be expressed in the condition? [226] This very learned judge entertained no doubt of the legality of special bonds, or of the justice or policy of allowing them. In Partridge v. Whiston, the Court of King's Bench said, they were bound by an established series of precedents to give judgment for the Plaintiff in an action on a bond on a condition to resign in favour of a son of the patron. This case might have been carried to the House of Lords, for the question was raised on the record; but the judgment was never disputed. To these decisions no judgment of any court, no dictum of any judge, can be opposed. The overruling of so many authorities, by any power but that of the legislature, will destroy entirely the certainty of the law: no man can know what are his rights or duties.

We talk much of national faith; I hope, my Lords, it will ever be kept inviolable. National faith is not, however, confined to any particular compacts; it requires the strict observance of all laws, under the sanction of which any of the subjects of this empire have acquired any rights. The reversal of these decisions would be a breach of national faith to those who have been induced by them to purchase advowsons. Immense sums of money have been expended in buying advowsons, and presentations, upon the highest assurance next to that of an express declaration by the legislature, that, in case of livings becoming vacant before those on whom the purchasers intended to bestow them are capable of taking orders, they might present to such living and take the security of a bond from the presentees for the resignation of them, when the person for whom they are intended shall be in priest's orders. Many of these purchasers have no other provision for their children but the livings so purchased. Ecclesiastics [227] as well as laymen, have dealt in these bonds of resignation. Lord Mansfield says, "a Bishop of Salisbury, before his (Lord Mansfield's) time, frequently took them." This is not said of that right reverend Prelate by way of reproach, but to show that men of the highest character did not consider that the taking such bonds was improper.

If you decide that these bonds are within the statute of Elizabeth, you make those who have given and those who have taken them criminals. Both the Plaintiff and Defendant in error, and many other persons, as well clergymen as laymen, have, while acting under the sanction of the courts of Westminster, committed the scandalous crime of simony, and subjected themselves to all the penalties of the statutes of Elizabeth. This argument was answered in the Bishop of London v. Effeche, by saying that these consequences of the judgment could be prevented by an Act of parliament. Your Lordships cannot have forgotten the answer of Lord Mansfield to this observation: "What! pass a judgment to do mischief, and then bring in a bill to cure it!" I will add, will you condemn men by a judgment that has all the vice of an ex post facto law, and after confiscating their property, save them from further punishment by a statute pardon.

But let us forget for a moment that there are any decisions on the subject. The statute of Elizabeth cannot be holden to embrace this case, without setting aside rules which, since the Revolution, have been uniformly observed by all Judges, and which temper with mercy the justice of our criminal law. The statute of Elizabeth is a penal law: the rule to which I allude, requires that all penal laws should be construed strictly; that no cases should be holden [228] to be reached by them, but such as are within both the spirit and letter of such laws. If these rules are violated, the fate of accused persons is decided by the arbitrary discretion of Judges, and not by the express authority of the laws.

If general words follow an enumeration of particular cases, such general words are, by another rule of construction, holden to apply only to cases of the same kind as those which are expressly mentioned. By the 14th George II., cap. 1, persons who should steal sheep or any other cattle, were deprived of the benefit of clergy. The stealing of any cattle, whether commonable or not commonable, seems to be embraced by these general words, "any other cattle;" but by the 15th George II., cap. 34, the legislature declared that it was doubtful to what sorts of cattle the former Act extended besides sheep, and enacted and declared that the Act was meant to extend to any bull, cow, ox, steer, bullock, heifer, calf and lamb, as well as sheep, and to no other cattle whatsoever. Until the legislature distinctly specified what cattle were meant to be included, the Judges felt that they could not apply the statute to any other cattle but sheep. The legislature, by the last Act, says, it was not to be extended to horses, pigs, or goats, although all these are cattle. Lord Chief Baron Comyn says, "a penal statute shall not be extended by equity, and the general words of a penal statute shall be restrained, for the benefit of him against whom the penalty is inflicted."

By the 31st of Elizabeth, cap. 6, sec. 4, for the avoiding of simony and corruptions in presentations, collations and donations, of and to any benefices, dignities, prebends, and other livings and promotions ecclesiastical, and in admissions, institutions, [229] and inductions to the same, it is provided, that, "If any persons or person shall, for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, directly or indirectly, or for or by reason of any promise, agreement, grant, bond, covenant, or other assurance of or for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit whatsoever, directly or indirectly, present or collate any person to any benefice, with cure of souls, dignity, preferment, or living ecclesiastical, the presentation, collation, gift, and bestowing, and every admission, institution, investiture, and induction, shall be utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect in law; and the person giving or taking the money, etc., shall forfeit double the value of one year's profit of the benefice, and the person accepting the benefice shall be for ever disabled from holding the same." The only words in this statute which can be so far stretched as to reach the bond which is the subject of the present action are "profit or benefit;" but these, according to the restrictive rules of construing penal statutes, mean only profits or benefits ejusdem generis with money, rewards or gifts, such as bills of exchange instead of money, leases of the tithes, or profits of the benefice, or loans of money, or other valuables, for a long or indefinite period of time, instead of immediate gifts of the same things. If this construction be not put on the words, no patron, either lay or ecclesiastical, can present or collate a son who is dependent on such patron, to any preferment in the church, without being guilty of simony. If a bond for the resignation of a living in favour of a son, be a benefit, the presentation of a son to a vacant benefice, must be a benefit, for the first is only a means of obtaining the second; [230] indeed there can be no doubt, that if a patron has a son, whom he maintains, it is generally a benefit for him to have a living to which he can present such son: for few persons would allow a son as much after he was in possession of a benefice, as he received before; but this was not that corrupt benefit which was contemplated by the legislature, when this statute was passed.

Whatever expressions are to be found in the Act, the object of the legislature was only to prevent simony; and such advantages as these were never thought to be simoniacal. Lord Chief Justice De Grey says (2 Blackst. 1052), "The statute has not adopted all the wild notions of the canon law, with regard to simony." But the giving or granting this bond would not amount to simony even by the canon law. The words that approach nearest to it, are those of the canon of 1229, Nullo licet ecclesiam nomine dotulitatis ad aliquem transferre. All the other canons are confined to the trafficking in presentations, and preventing the granting of leases and pensions by incumbents. One definition of simony, by a canonist, is, Studiosa voluntas emendi vel vendendi aliquod spirituale vel spirituali annuum. This definition can by no construction, be extended to special bonds of resignation, made to enable a patron to provide for his relation or friend. Another writer has defined simony to be Spiritualium acceptio vel donatio non gratuita. This word gratuita is used as the opposite to oneraria, and only applies to a corrupt bargain for money or other direct profit. In exchanges, each party proposes to himself some benefit; the one expects to get more profit, the other a more healthy or agreeable or advantageous residence. Yet exchanges are expressly [231] allowed by the statute of Elizabeth, because exchanges, though productive of temporal advantages to one or both parties, are not the vile corrupt contracts which were intended to be prohibited by the legislature.

But it has been said, by one of my learned brothers, this is a benefit and profit, because by means of it, money will be obtained: for if the judgments of the courts below should be affirmed, the Defendant in error will get £10,000. The performance of the condition of all bonds is enforced by pecuniary penalties, which may, in the event of a breach of the condition, be recovered. This is the case when bonds are given for the faithful performance of any office; yet such bonds have been enforced over and over again, and no such objection was ever made to them. If the intent of the obligee was to obtain the penalty of the bond, and not the resignation of the living, such intent would be corrupt, and the bond made to carry it into execution would be void. That would not be a resignation bond, but a money bond; all that was said about resignation, being a mere colour to cover the corrupt intent: but this corrupt intent not appearing on the face of the bond, must be pleaded. There is no such plea in the present case, nor is there the least reason to suspect that the defendant in error ever contemplated so mercenary and so base an object. He expected that the obligor would perform the condition of the bond, and then no money or other corrupt benefit could have been offered. Is it consistent with justice or common sense, that a man is to lose his right, because his opponent compels him, by a breach of his contract, to sue for a penalty which he neither expected nor desired? Mr. Justice Heath says, in Ffytche and the Bishop [232] of London, "The law construes bonds according to the intent of the parties, and in all bonds with a condition, the penalty is only considered as enforcing the condition:" so, although a patron can derive no pecuniary advantage from the presentation to a living, yet if his clerk be not admitted, the law permits him to recover damages in a quare impedit.

It has been insisted, that advowsons are pure trusts, and that patrons, in the execution of these trusts, have no right to consider their families, or adopt any means for reserving presentations for any of their children or relations. This opinion is founded on what Lord Coke says, that "a guardian in socage does not take a presentation to a living, because he cannot make money of it." This doctrine has led to the ridiculous ceremony of the guardian putting the pen into the hands of an infant in the cradle, and guiding its feeble hand while it signs a presentation. But executors and administrators of lay patrons present to livings which have become vacant in the lifetimes of their testators or intestates. Presentations are not pure spiritual trusts: if they had been so considered, the Bishops could never have allowed them to be disposed of by laymen; advowsons in gross or next presentations could never have been permitted to be sold: Archbishops could not leave options to their widows or other lay persons.

The learned Selden calls the right of lay patrons to present to church livings, "the interest of patronage which the lay founders challenged in their new erected churches." Lord Kenyon calls a right of presentation, "a trust connected with an interest." The founders of lay patronage, when they endowed the churches, reserved [233] the right of patronage, and the right of taking resignation bonds in favour of their children and descendants. The Bishops, by allowing the dedication of tithes to be made on these conditions, obtained a provision for many churches which would otherwise have remained without endowment. As the Bishops were to decide on the fitness of the persons to be presented, they wisely thought that the allowing patrons the privilege of taking such bonds could not injure the Church. On the contrary, from the exercise of this privilege, the younger members of the families of great land-owners were brought into the Church, and a connexion has been kept up between the landed interest and the Church, which greatly contributes to increase the security and influence of the latter: at the same time the members of great families are generally better educated, and from those family connexions, likely to be more respected in their parishes than any other clergymen that can be found. The practice of taking special resignation bonds, and the sanction that such bonds have uniformly received from the courts of Westminster, are the highest evidence that such bonds were allowed by the original compact made between lords of manors and the Bishops, when churches were founded. These were some of the interests which Selden says the patrons challenged in their new erected churches.

It has been said, that a clerk who has given one of these bonds, cannot subscribe the proper form of resignation, or take the oath administered on his institution. The unhappy men who have taken this oath, and resigned in consequence of bonds of resignation, have been even charged with perjury. This is a dreadful charge [234] against the thousands of worthy persons who have given such bonds, and honourably performed the conditions of them. The objection as to the form of resignation assumes, that the words spontè, parè, et simpliciter are an essential part of the instrument of resignation. There is no particular settled form of words necessary in a resignation. In Walron v. Pollard (Dyer, 293 b.), the words are animo deliberato, certâ scientiâ, et mero motu, et quibusdam causis justis et rationabilibus moventibus, ultrâ et spontè dedisse; neither these words, nor any thing of the like import, are in the form of resignation given by Degge. But if a resignation, in this precise form were required, the only import of the words spontè, parè, et simpliciter, is that the clerk was not driven by unlawful violence or threats, or seduced by any corrupt agreement, to make the resignation; but that he made it willingly, and because he thought it his duty to make it. With regard to the oath, I admit that by Archbishop Courtenay's decree, persons presented are required to swear that "obligati non sunt, nec eorum amici pro se, juratoriâ aut pecuniariâ cautione, de ipsis beneficiis resignandis." These words are not in the oath prescribed by the Council of Westminster, 1138, or that of the Council of Oxford, 1236. The insertion of them by the Archbishop into the oath required by his decree, shows that he and those who advised him, thought that the oaths previously taken, did not reach resignation bonds. The Archbishop had no authority to alter the oath, and if any Bishop was now to refuse to admit a clerk who declined taking this oath, he would render himself liable to damages and the costs of a quare impedit. [235] By altering oaths of office, you may alter the condition, duties and responsibilities of the officers. Parliament only can do this, in civil offices; and Councils of the Clergy, with the approbation of the King, in ecclesiastical. Lord Coke says, "a new oath cannot be imposed without the authority of Parliament." In 1603, a canon was made, prescribing a form of oath to be taken by persons presented to benefices, and this canon was confirmed by the King. The clergy who assisted at the convocation which made the canon, must have known of Archbishop Courtenay's decree, and yet they have omitted, in the form of oath, the words relative to bonds of resignation. How is this omission to be accounted for? Why either the clergy, or those who advised the crown, thought that bonds of resignation, if not abused, were legal and proper, and therefore they would not allow any oath to be administered to clerks, which should prevent them from giving such bonds. I have heard it said, Why will not patrons rely on the honour of clergymen? But if the clergy cannot give bonds, they cannot pledge their honour: if the one is a violation of their duty, inconsistent with the forms of resignation and their oaths, so is the other.

The last objection to the validity of these bonds is, that they convert an estate for the life of the incumbent, into an estate determinable on a particular event, during the life of the incumbent. Supposing that the clergyman's interests in his benefice be exactly the same as that of a lay tenant for life, there is nothing in the objection; for the condition to resign in the case of a benefice, forms no part of the instrument which creates the interest in it; it is made by a separate deed. Now if a tenant for [236] life were to give a bond to convey back his estate on the happening of a particular event, such a bond would not be voidable in law. The objection is to introducing into the instrument conferring the estate, a condition which is inconsistent with it, as when a deed conveys to B an absolute indefeasible estate for his life; and contains a proviso, that on a certain event, the estate shall determine in the lifetime of the party to whom it is given. There is more of technicality than reason in this distinction; but no two estates are less like each other, than that of a clerk in his benefice and a lay tenant for life; they are created with different objects. Conditions are annexed to one which are not annexed to the other; the clergyman, to preserve his estate, must perform the duties of his church; if he takes another benefice, without a dispensation, he vacates the first. These conditions arise from the original compact between the lay patrons of the Church and the clergy, which I have already referred to.

The judgment of this House, in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, does not bear upon the question now to be decided. No principle can, by any just legal reasoning, be deduced from that case, which is applicable to this. Securing a benefit for a brother or friend, is not a profit or benefit within the meaning of the statute of Elizabeth. These general terms must, according to the true and established rules for construing penal statutes, be restrained by the particular words that precede them, and holden to mean any benefits of the same sorts as those particularly specified. The taking these bonds is not an abuse of the right of patronage, as that right stands according to the common law, and they are not inconsistent with the estate which incumbents have in their benefices. These bonds appear to have been used from the earliest times, both by ecclesiastical and lay patrons, and have been uniformly supported by the judgments of the courts of Westminster.

The consequences of declaring these bonds void, will not be confined to the injury done to the long established rights of patrons; it will bring in a laxity in the mode of construing penal statutes which will deprive persons accused of crimes, of the benefit of that humane rule, which secures from punishment all whose offences are not clearly within the letter as well as the spirit of the law. The judgments of the courts of Westminster-hall are the only authorities which we have for by far the greatest part of the law of England. The overturning the long series of judgments, which declares the validity of these bonds, must introduce uncertainty and confusion into every branch of the common law. Can it be said that the law which governs these bonds is unjust? No, my Lords, the injustice is in destroying, without compensation, a vested right. Can it be said, that they are inconsistent with the policy of our laws? That policy encourages us to provide for our children, relations, and friends, and allows us to bestow on them offices for which they are duly qualified. In ecclesiastical benefices, the public have a security for the fitness of the person presented, which does not exist in other cases. The Bishops are to take care, that neither by friendship, nor natural affection, a clerk shall be put into a church, who is not duly qualified to do the duties of it. If a patron may give a living to his son, or relation, or friend, what objection is there, if it becomes vacant when the person for [238] whom it is intended is incapable of taking it, to his permitting some other person to hold it, until the incapacity of the first object of his choice be removed? It has been said, this can be done in the case of no other office. There are no other offices which have been created by patrons, and endowed out of their estates, and therefore there could be no legal origin for the right to take such bonds in any other offices. With respect to other offices, there are no judicial authorities to support such a right.

By holding these bonds to be void, you will not make patrons forget their faculties, and look out, unbiassed by affection or friendship, for the most worthy clergyman to fill the vacant benefice. Many of them will act, as some patrons have done, where a living, the presentation to which they are desirous of selling, becomes void before it is sold. They will present some old man. By which are the duties of an incumbent likely to be best performed—by a young man, in full health, under a bond of resignation, or by an old one, who has just enough of life left not to be liable to be objected to by a Bishop, on account of his imbecility? Many owners of manors, with advowsons annexed, will sell the advowsons from the manors. Those who pay large sums of money to purchase advowsons in gross, will not be the most likely persons to hold such advowsons as pure trusts, and in disposing of them to look only to the maxim—detur digniori. Such alienators of the church patronage will break the connexion between the landed interest and the clergy.

Young men of family are, from their education and habits, likely to make the best parish priests. From their connexion with the owners of lands in the parishes, all the inhabitants feel a respect for [239] them, which must add much to the effect of the instruction they give. Connexion with proprietors of the soil, gives to the clergyman the greatest interest in the happiness of his parishioners, and stimulates him to promote their spiritual welfare. Such persons will not take orders where the livings, which their ancestors founded, are severed from their families. I am aware these are rather considerations of policy than law; but, my Lords, if there be any doubts what is the law, judges solve such doubts by considering what will be the good or bad effects of their decision. I say, nearly in the words of one of the Bishops, in the Bishop of London v. Fytche, "That doctrine cannot be law, which injures the rights of individuals, and will be productive of evil to the Church and to the community."

The Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench: The question appears to me to consist of two parts. First, whether enough appears on the record to shew that the bond was given as the price or consideration of the presentation to the benefice? Secondly, supposing this to appear, then whether the bond is void by the statute or common law?

As to the first part of the question, I am of opinion, that enough does appear upon the face of the record to shew that the bond was given as the price or consideration of the presentation to the benefice. If the fact be manifest upon the face of the instrument, it is not necessary to aver it, in order to bring it to the notice of the Court, or within the meaning of the statute; and that the fact does so appear, it is only necessary to advert to the language of the condition.

In this case the statute mentions the act alone, without any epithet or qualification. The section [240] commences with this preamble, "for the avoiding of simony and corruption in presentations, collations and donations, of and to benefices, dignities, prebends, and other livings and promotions ecclesiastical, and in admissions, institutions and inductions to the same, be it enacted, that if any person shall, or do at any time" (after such a period,) "for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit or benefit, directly or indirectly, or for or by reason of any promise, agreement, etc., of or for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit or benefit whatsoever, directly or indirectly, present or collate any person, etc. to any benefice, that then such presentation shall be utterly void." It is to that section to which I would beg to call your Lordships' attention, from which it appears that the mere taking of any gift, profit or benefit, is in itself an avoidance of the presentation.

It is necessary, with respect to any question that may arise upon the statute of Elizabeth, or any question that may arise from the common law, to see what the fact is: the question being, Whether it is apparent upon the face of the instrument that the bond is given as the price of the presentation? It seems to me impossible for any person to read the condition of this bond as it appears upon the record, without taking it that it was given as the price of the presentation, and that the presentation was given as the consideration of the bond. It begins with reciting "that Lewis Richard Lord Sodes is the patron of the rectory, which rectory had become vacant by the death of the late incumbent." The next recital is, "that Lord Sodes by writing under his hand and seal, bearing equal date with the above written obligation, presented the above bounden Brice William Fletcher, to [241] supply the vacancy" from which it appears that the presentation and bond are connected together, and then it goes on, "And whereas the said Brice William Fletcher has agreed to resign the said rectory into the hands of the proper ordinary, upon such request or notice as hereinafter mentioned, so as that the said rectory may thereby again become vacant:" can any person read this and not conclude, that the presentation and the bond were concurrent acts: that they were founded upon a prior agreement to resign? This was undoubtedly the opinion of Lord Mansfield, in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche. That being so, for the reasons which I have just stated, I am of opinion, that there is enough upon the face of the record to show that this bond was given as the price of the presentation.

The second inquiry which arises is, whether such a bond, given as the price or consideration of the presentation, is void in law. Upon this question, I conceive the true inquiry to be only, whether this bond is within the rule and principle of the decision in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche. I conceive that case to have established a rule and principle binding upon all jurisdictions, except that of your Lordships' house. It is true that the question there arose directly upon the presentation, and not upon the bond, but it is treated throughout as being one and the same: as the presentation and the bond are the price and consideration of each other, it seems impossible to say, that the one can be good and valid, and the other bad and void.

That case arose upon a presentation accompanied by a bond to resign upon the request of the patron; it was what is called a general resignation bond. [242] The present case arises upon a presentation accompanied by a bond to resign upon request, "whereby, and so as that the patron may be enabled to present one of his two brothers, (in the condition named,) "when such of them as is to be presented, shall be capable of taking an ecclesiastical benefice;" the agreement having been, that the presentee shall so resign, to the intent that the patron may present one of those two persons. This therefore is one of those that have been called special resignation bonds.

The declared object of the resignation, is the presentation of one of the two persons named; but as the resignation of the incumbent must precede the presentation of another clerk, I am at a loss to know how the presentation of the particular clerk is to be secured or enforced, or the incumbent restored to the benefice, if the patron, after having declared his intention to present one of the nominees, shall afterwards think fit to present another person. This would undoubtedly be a most dishonourable act, and I beg to be understood as not even surmising that the noble Lord, who is a party to this suit, would act in this manner. But, in deciding upon a question of law, your Lordships cannot look at the rank and character of particular persons. It has been said at the bar, that a court of equity may prevent an ill use from being made of such a bond. I do not presume to say that this may not be done, if the intention to make an ill use be known and ascertained before resignation. My difficulty is to see how this can be known and ascertained, unless a patron should be weak enough to avow it, and this cannot be presumed. If a person should act in the way I have supposed, and if after resignation the [243] patron should present another person, how could the ordinary refuse institution? Suppose the presentee to die in the interval between resignation and the new presentation, or that he should obtain a better benefice, and not tenable with this, and, on that, or any other account, refuse institution, how is the incumbent to be restored, though the objects of his agreement and of his resignation have failed? If these difficulties cannot be overcome, then the bond in question will enforce a resignation, whenever one of two persons named shall be capable of taking a benefice, leaving the patron at liberty, in many, if not in all cases, to present whom he will.

But, supposing these difficulties can be overcome, or be thought not really to exist, and the bond be considered as only enabling the patron to present one of his two brothers; still I am of opinion, upon the authority of the decision so often mentioned, that this bond is void in law. That decision may be considered as founded principally upon one or other of two reasons, or perhaps upon both the reasons; being either that the bond there mentioned was within the statute of Elizabeth, and so void by that statute, or that the effect of the bond was to convert into an estate at will, an office which the law considers to be freehold, and so the bond is void at common law.

I consider the bond now in question, to differ from the general bond in degree only, and not in principle or kind. If it be a benefit to a patron to be able to call for a resignation whenever he may choose to present any other person, it must, in my opinion, be a benefit, though, perhaps, a less benefit, to be able to command a resignation, in order to present a relation or friend, and if there be any benefit, the [244] degree of benefit must be immaterial, and the case will be within the statute. If the law will not allow a benefice to be held at the will of the patron, and voidable whenever he may choose to present any other person, the law cannot allow a benefice to be so held, as to be voidable when a relation or friend of the patron may be capable of taking it, and the patron may think fit to present him: for, in each case, the estate or interest of the incumbent will be less than a freehold, whereas a benefice is spoken of as a freehold in all our books, whatever it may have been in its origin, or first constitution, which are now lost in the obscurity of antiquity.

But further, it is not only required that a benefice shall be freely given, and freely taken, but if resigned, it must be freely and voluntarily resigned; non metu coactus sed spontanea voluntate, and how can a resignation be voluntary which is made in order to avoid the penalty of a bond, whether a patron has a right to impose the penalty at his pleasure, or only for a particular purpose? Ought the law to sanction an instrument which places a clergyman in a situation, either to subject himself to a demand which he may be unable to pay, or to make a solemn declaration contrary to his conscience, and to truth? In my opinion, the law ought not to permit this.

Again, my Lords, the bond in question enables the patron to command a resignation in favor of one of his two brothers. If such a bond should be held valid, where is the line to be drawn, or what limit is to be fixed? If it be good in favour of brothers, why may it not also be good in favor of cousins or more remote kindred, or of friends? If it be allowed [245] in favor of two persons, why may it not be allowed in favor of more than two; of twelve, of twenty, or even of a greater number? I am unable to discover any rule or principle upon which it can be said,

"thus far shalt thou go, but no farther." I infer, therefore, that no step must be taken towards the accomplishment of an object, which may reserve any benefit of this nature to the patron, or make the interest of the incumbent less than that freehold or estate for life, (to be forfeited only for misconduct, or by a regular judicial proceeding,) which the law supposes him to possess, and requires that he shall be permitted to enjoy.

For these reasons I am of opinion, that enough appears upon the face of this bond, to show that it is void and illegal.

The Lord Chancellor: Upon the first question which arises in this case, I am most clearly of opinion, that enough does appear upon the record, to enable your Lordships to say, whether the bond in question is void or illegal, either by statute, or common law. I feel very great satisfaction, that this question is now in the course of determination, by the highest court of judicature in this Kingdom; because that decision, speaking for myself, will greatly tend to relieve my mind from doubts, which I have entertained when applications have been made in the Court of Chancery, with reference to these special bonds of resignation; for I could never bring my mind to that satisfactory conclusion, which perhaps it was my duty to do. Before I should have proceeded to take any step in such a case, the question, with respect to these special bonds of resignation, should have been deliberately argued and deliberately adjudged, by a court of common law: for I cannot but very much doubt whether much attention ought to be paid to those decisions which have passed without argument at the bar, and which passed without a word having been said by the Court. Such was the case with respect to this very cause, in the court where it was originally considered, as well as in the inferior court of error; for I do not understand that a word was said upon it either by counsel or judges. That being so, a writ of error was brought to this House, and the question has been most ably argued at your Lordships' bar. After having heard that argument, it has been spoken to by the learned Judges, in such a manner as well justifies me in saying it was a subject which would have borne much debate in the court below; and therefore after it has been spoken to with so much ability by the different judges, who have had the opportunity of giving a year's consideration to it, I trust that your Lordships will not think it an unreasonable request, to ask that a few days more should be permitted to elapse, before the motion is made, calling upon the House to proceed with its judgment.

On Wednesday, May the 17th, 1826, it was moved and ordered, that the further consideration be adjourned to the next Session.

The Lord Chancellor.* This is a question of very great importance, a question not to be looked at merely with respect to the parties to this appeal; but because it may perhaps be thought expedient, if the judgment, which the House shall pronounce, shall declare the bond, the validity of which is in question, to be void, that some protection should be given by a law to those who have been led by pre-[247]-vailing notions to believe that bonds of this nature were valid.

(Here the Lord Chancellor stated the facts and pleadings.)

The case was first argued before the Court of King's Bench, (in the absence of the Lord Chief Justice,) before three of the judges, who stated that this was a case which did not fall exactly within the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche; that it was therefore fit to be heard upon writ of error in the House of Lords, and that Court did no more than give it due passage to the House of Lords, by giving a judgment without argument, in favor of the Defendant in error. This course of proceeding is not very satisfactory. The case then proceeded, by writ of error, to the Exchequer chamber, where the Court, consisting of eight judges, also gave judgment without argument, in favor of the Defendant in error, merely for the purpose of giving the case a passage to this House. The question we have now to determine is, whether this is a bond upon which the obligee can be effectually sued; whether it is such, regard being had to the principles laid down in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, looking at what is the actual Condition of this bond.

Addressing your Lordships as one of the Courts of justice, and not as a legislative body, it is my duty not to argue or state this case now on any other grounds, than grounds of law. If the state of the law upon this subject is such, that your Lordships, looking at it as legislators, deem it fit that an act should be passed to relieve against the law, that consideration ought not to affect, and therefore cannot affect your Lordships decisions as judges.

Before the decision in the Bishop of London v. [248] Ffytche, this bond might have been held to be legal. But I have no difficulty in saying, that after this House has declared and decided, as it did in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, as to general bonds, I conceive myself bound to apply the principles of that decision to this case, because it appears to me perfectly impossible to say it is any thing but a general bond. According to this bond, although A. or B. shall be capable of taking the living, looking at the legal effect of the condition, there is not one single syllable from the beginning to the end of it, which, after resignation, compels the obligee of this bond to present either A. or B. Some of the judges, who gave their opinions in favor of the bond, were so distressed by this, that the best answer they could make to it was, that true it is, that when the resignation is accepted, there is no obligation whatever upon the patron to present the clerk, but the Bishop must take care that the resignation and presentation shall go together. How the Bishop is to do that, is difficult to imagine; because, if the presentation is sealed and signed, before the resignation is complete, it is in law a void presentation; if on the other hand, it is to be signed and sealed after the resignation is complete, then I wish to ask, whether there be any Court of law, or any Court of equity in this country, which, after the resignation is complete, can compel the party to present either A. or B., because the professed intention of the resignation was, that A. or B. should be presented.

If this is a bond, which can be said to be of a special nature, it must be on this ground that the resignation is to have its effect, if A. or B. is presented. It has been decided in a case which has been reported that, if the clerk in possession execute an instrument of resign-[249]-ation, and there is expressed in it the condition that if A. or B. are not presented within six months the resignation shall be void, there is no valid resignation, because the resignation must be puré, simpliciter, absoluté, et sine conditione (see Burn's Eccl. Laws, tit. Resignation, and the books there referred to). The consequence of that is, that the resignation itself is void. And if this is so, what is expressed in the condition of the bond cannot be expressed in the Condition of the instrument of Resignation. I say further, that if the bond is invalid, unless the patron can be compelled to present one of these nominees, there is no Court that can oblige the patron to present either of these nominees; and if that be so, the consequence is, that in order to fill up that vacancy, he may present any clerk he thinks proper. If that be a correct view of the case, it falls absolutely and entirely within the doctrine of that case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche. With respect to that authority, I apprehend that, whatever may have been thought of it out of this House, I may humbly state my opinion, and I have always thought that it is a sound decision. The doctrine established in that case was, I must admit, certainly never thought right by some great judges. Your Lordships, however, are bound by that decision, unless there be some special circumstances to take this case out of the principle of that case; and unless I am wrong in the representation I have made, the peculiar construction of this bond, instead of taking it out of the principle and application of that case, brings it directly within it.

If this bond be a simoniacal bond within the intent and meaning of the law, subjecting to harsh consequences the patron or parson, or both, it is our [250] business not to regard the consequences more than the law will allow us to attend to them; and we cannot pronounce against law to avoid the consequences of a decision, which is according to law.

I have looked attentively at the cases in the books on the subject. Those cases are not very well considered if the reports are correct, but stating them altogether, let us see what they amount to. One case decides, that resignation may be in favor of a son (Johns v. Lawrence, quâ supra), another authority supposes that you may have it for a kinsman or friend (see Wats. Incumb. c. 5. and Billiard v. Stopleton, Ca. Eq. Abr. 86. pl. 3). I want to know therefore, what is either the number or the character of the persons, in favour of whom such conditions can be said to be legal; if you can take it for a son, you may take it for a grandson, and for great grandsons; in short, you may take it on behalf of any body who stands within the relation that a son bears to you, and in the relation that a friend bears to you, and if you can name one son or one friend in the condition of the bond, I wish to know what is the number of sons or friends that you may not name, and where the limit is to be placed? Some cases say, we doubt whether you can provide for a resignation in favor of a cousin or relation; but we think it must do for a son, because the father is bound to provide for the son. Is that a reason which is satisfactory in a case where the policy of the law, as it regards the ecclesiastical constitution of the country, forbids such a proceeding? What is the extent of the obligation? If, because I am under an obligation to provide for a son, therefore, I may take such a bond, being also under an obligation to provide for myself, can I take a bond to resign in favor of myself? If a bond of this sort [251] can be taken, this consequence must follow, that if there be a patron of age to contract, having a living to which, if he were of an age to take priest's orders, he could collate himself, on this notion of the duty of providing for himself, he might present a clerk, taking from him a bond to resign when he, the patron, is four-and-twenty. I apprehend that is not the law. Looking at the condition of this bond, independently of all the consideration that belongs to the cases prior to the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, I say that the condition of this bond is, in the construction of the law, a condition, such as belongs to a general bond, and not to a special bond.

There are a great many other provisions in what are called special bonds, some very provident and commendable; but whether they are as clearly legal may admit of question, more especially if they give a sort of jurisdiction to a patron, which the law has vested only in the ordinary.

There was a good deal of argument, whether this bond can be considered as a benefit to the patron, within the intent and meaning of the statute of the 31st of Elizabeth. Now only consider what may be done with a bond of this kind in point of pecuniary benefit: I mean a bond with such a condition as this. If these bonds are lawful, when a living is vacant, a patron wishing to sell the next presentation, has nothing to do but to present a clerk, taking from him a bond to vacate the living whenever C. D. shall be inclined, or shall be able to take it; but yet containing nothing that could compel him to present C. D. The patron calls upon his clerk to resign the living; no, says he, I will not resign the living, because it is worth more than the penalty in the bond. The patron therefore, if resignation is refused, receives the sum mentioned in the penalty for the [252] presentation of a clerk who will not resign. He cannot sell the presentation to a living when vacant—but he may present a clerk, taking a bond of resignation in a large penalty, and the Church being full, he may then sell the next presentation, and call upon that clerk who had given the bond to resign. It must be ill managed if he does not baffle Courts of Equity. In both cases, therefore, with a little management in the shape of penalty or sale, he may secure a benefit to himself.

It must, however, be admitted, the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, and this case, if it should be classed under the same principle, may have a serious operation upon many patrons, and many clerks; and where there has been a common error, although it cannot make law against the positive words of an Act of Parliament, I should concur in any measure to indemnify persons, who have been acting on the sanction of what may be called errors of lawyers and judges. This may be effected by some law giving a power to the owners of advowsons, to discharge those obligations which are contrary to law, and substitute others which may be legalised by a statute so framed as to express the number of persons in favour of whom the condition is to operate, and making it compulsory on the patrons to present those nominees. This should be effected without trenching upon the general principles of the ecclesiastical law of the country, further than the just claims of those, who are interested, and who are likely to suffer by such errors, may make it reasonable that you should trench upon it.

It is upon these grounds that I think that this bond cannot possibly be upheld; that it is void by statute if not by common law. With regard to the obligations of the common law upon this subject, it has always appeared to me to be a very singular thing, that when [253] you are discussing a case which is to determine what is the effect of the act of a clergyman, connected with that of a layman, the layman's act is not to be considered with reference to the question, whether the clergyman bound by his canons, can or cannot legally do the act, to which the layman is a party, taking the benefit of that act. The oath which the clergyman takes when he is presented to a living, is material in the consideration of this question. I do not go so far as some judges of great authority, in saying that these are bonds which no honest clergyman would give, and no honest patron would take. We know that many very honest people have engaged in such transactions. I am content with representing that, according to my humble judgment, such bonds are illegal. Whatever may be the law with respect to bonds conditioned to do things which are but the performance of ecclesiastical duties, not being contrary to the policy of the law, but assuming in effect a jurisdiction which belongs to the ordinary and not to the patron, it is unnecessary on this occasion to call your attention to such cases. It is only to be observed, that such bonds are said to be in furtherance of the law, and not in violation of law. I have no hesitation, however, in stating, that it would not be impolitic by legislative enactment, to declare the law, and what it is as to such cases. I abstain from entering upon considerations of policy—as to such, referring only to the arguments of counsel, and the opinions of the judges in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche.

Upon the grounds I have mentioned, it is my intention to move your Lordships to reverse this judgment.

9th April, 1827. Judgment reversed.

[254] After the judgment, the Archbishop of Canterbury, having observed that, according to the existing laws, a great number of patrons and incumbents, acting under an erroneous impression, had exposed themselves to severe penalties, brought in, and moved the first reading of a bill, the substance of which, was afterwards passed into a law, by the statute 7 and 8 Geo. 4. c. 25; which, reciting the statute 31st Elizabeth, c. 6, and that a practice had generally prevailed, of giving and taking special bonds or contracts for resignation of spiritual offices, and reciting the judgment of the House of Lords, that such bonds are within the meaning of the statute of Elizabeth, and that the parties to such contracts would suffer great hardship by the operation of the law; it is enacted, (see. 1.) that no presentation to any spiritual office made before the 9th April, 1827, should be void on account of any agreement to resign, when another person specially named should become qualified to take the office, and that the parties to the agreement should not be subject to any penalties, etc. on account of the agreement; and that (sec. 2.) engagements made before 9th April, 1827, for resignation in favour of one person named, or of two persons named, shall be valid, notwithstanding the statute. But (sec. 3.) the protection is not to extend to engagements not made bonâ fide for the purpose expressed in the preceding sections; and the statute is not to be construed as compulsory on the ordinary, to accept the resignation, and by (sec. 4.) it is provided, that if the person specially named in the engagement, be not presented within six months after resignation, that the person having resigned, shall be deemed to be in possession of the spirituality, and the resignation shall be void.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

WILLIAM LOPDELL, Administrator of CHRISTOPHER LOPDELL, Deceased,— Appellant; ROBERT CREAGH, a Lunatic, by his Committee,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. i. 351, vi. 1032.]

After an appeal against a decree of a Court of Equity had been presented to the House of Lords, and the cases printed, with an Appendix of evidence as entered in the Register's notes, of the proofs read on the hearing; an order was made upon motion in the Court below, expunging part of that evidence as entered by mistake. This order was reversed as irregular. In such case the proper course is to apply to the House, by petition, for leave to proceed in the Court below to rectify the mistake.

By the decree made on the hearing of this cause, on the 30th of June, 1823, it was ordered that the Appellant's Bill should be dismissed, with costs.

On the 16th day of February, 1824, the Appellant presented an appeal from the decree; and printed copies of the case of the Appellant were prepared and delivered during the session. To the printed case of the Appellant was annexed an appendix of the Register's notes, containing the proofs made at the hearing of the cause, among which was an entry as follows:—"Order 23d July, etc. Creagh, a Lunatic, read: like 9th Nov. 1802, and 19th Nov. 1803 in same, read; affidavit, R. Creagh, sworn 14th Jan. 1812 in same, read, etc. Abstract receipts of R. Creagh, No. 16, read."

[256] The appeal was set down for hearing ex parte against the Respondent.

The Respondent did not prepare or deliver any case until the 16th of March, 1825, when, upon his petition he was permitted to lay the prints of his case upon the table. The printed cases were shortly afterwards exchanged between the Appellant and Respondent.

After the exchange of the printed cases, on the 16th of May, 1825, an application was made to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, by way of motion, on behalf of the Respondent, that the notes made by the Register at the hearing of the cause, might be rectified by the Register, by striking out the words, "and on the 19th December, 1803 in same, read;" the words, "Affidavit of R. Creagh, sworn 14th January, 1812 in same, read," and also the words, "Abstract receipts of Richard Creagh, sixteen, read;" it being alleged that none of the documents alluded to were read at the hearing of the cause; whereupon, and on reading the pleadings and attested copy of the Register's notes on the hearing; the printed case of the Appellant, with the appendix thereto, as furnished for the hearing of the appeal in this cause;—an affidavit made by Barry Collins, Gent.;—an affidavit made by the Appellant;—and the three documents therein-before specified, as being read on the hearing of the cause, and hearing what was offered on the part of the Appellant, the Lord Chancellor was pleased to order that the notes be varied by the Register, by striking out the words, "and of the 19th December, 1803 in same, read;" the words, "affidavit of R. Creagh, sworn 14th January, 1812 in same, read;" and also the words, "abstract receipts of [257] Richard Creagh, No. 16, read," as was desired by the Respondent.

Against this order the Plaintiff appealed.

For the Appellant: Mr. Brougham, Mr. Merivale.

The documents were read and received as evidence at the hearing of the cause, and were then marked and entered by the officer of the Court, as having been read and entered. It was not competent to the Court to order the proofs so entered to be expunged, except upon a re-hearing of the cause.

If it was competent to the Court, upon any ground alleged subsequently to the decree, to order the documents to be expunged without a re-hearing, no such ground existed in this case, inasmuch as the documents were good evidence, and were fit and proper to be received as such by the Court at the hearing of the cause. After an appeal is presented, no alteration of the decree or entry of proofs as read in the cause, can be made without the permission of the Court of appeal.

For the Respondents: Mr. Sugden, Mr. Pepys.

The order appealed from, is not a judgment of the court below, from which an appeal ought to be entertained, but merely directions to the officer of the court below, respecting the manner in which the judgment of the court, on hearing the cause, ought to have been drawn up.

If the order had not been pronounced, it would have appeared as if the several documents had been read on the hearing of the cause, unobjected to on the part of the Respondent; and the cause would consequently have been heard on appeal upon evidence, not admissible in point of law against the [258] Respondent, and different in point of fact from that upon which the cause had been originally heard and decided by the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

The propriety of the order appealed from, depends upon the fact, whether the documents in question were or were not, read at the hearing of the cause; and that they were not read, is proved beyond all question, by the affidavit of Barry Collins, and by the attested copy of the notes on the hearing, and above all, by the recollection of the learned judge, by whom the cause was heard and decided.

The Lord Chancellor * (June 29, 1827): In the case of Lopdell v. Creagh, there was an appeal from a decree of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, which was heard upon the merits some time back, and upon which your Lordships were of opinion, that the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, should be affirmed. After that appeal was lodged in this House, and the printed cases were laid upon the table, an application was made to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to vary the notes which the Registrar had taken of the evidence which had been read upon the hearing, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, made an order expunging from the notes of the Registrar a part of the evidence which was supposed to have been read upon the hearing. From that order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, there was an appeal to the House of Lords, which came on to be heard at the same time when the appeal upon the merits was heard.

It was not necessary to decide this point of form previous to deciding the general question upon the [259] merits, but your Lordships were of opinion, that it would be convenient and desirable to consider what was the practice in cases of this description. I should submit to your Lordships, that after the appeal was lodged here, and while it was waiting to be heard, it was not competent for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to make such an order, but that the regular course would have been, to have applied to the House, and your Lordships would, in all probability, on such application, have given leave to the party to apply to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and then the alteration would have been made by the Lord Chancellor, under the direction of this House. That not having been done, I conceive that that which was done is irregular, and that the appeal should be allowed: it is not at all material in its bearing upon the other case, but the proceeding was irregular, and the appeal should be allowed without costs.

Judgment reversed.

WILLIAM LOPDELL, Administrator of CHRISTOPHER LOPDELL,—Appellant;

ROBERT CREAGH, a Lunatic, by RODERICK CONNOR, his Committee,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. i. 52.]

A. having granted to B. a lease, with a covenant for payment of the rent of £90, and a clause giving a right of surrender to the tenant, dies, leaving C. his heir at law, who becomes seized of the lands subject to the lease. D. a near relative of C. having by some means acquired or assumed a title by indentures, dated in 1791, demises the lands to L. In 1793, C. is by inquisition, found to have been a lunatic from 1786. In 1797, upon a rental and account filed by the Committee of the lunatic, L. is returned as the tenant, and a sum of money is stated to have been received, and a sum of money to be due from him as rent. In 1802, D. is returned as tenant of the lands, by the receiver appointed in the lunacy. In 1811 an order is made in the lunacy, that £720 being due from D. as tenant, a distress should be levied on the lands. In 1817, the receiver died indebted to the estate, and his sureties were discharged from their recognisance on payment of part of their debt, by way of compromise.

In 1820, an ejectment was brought against D. to recover the lands for non-payment of rent, and a verdict and judgment obtained. In 1821, an action is brought upon the covenant in the original lease against the Appellant as personal representative of B. to recover £2340, being 26 years arrears of rent, to which action the Defendant pleaded a surrender, eviction, etc. upon which a verdict is found for the Plaintiff, and judgment entered. In 1822 a bill is filed by the Defendant in the action, stating a case of laches, and of fraud and collusion between D. the relative of the lunatic, and his committees and receivers, and praying an account against the committees and receivers, (not being parties to the suit,) or if, from lapse of time, such account could not be taken, then a perpetual injunction against proceeding on the judgment. The bill was dismissed with costs upon the hearing in the Court below, and that decree upon appeal affirmed with costs.

[261] Peirse Creagh the Respondent's father, in 1762, demised lands to Christopher Lopdell, his heirs and assigns, for three lives, at the yearly rent of £90; the deed of release contained a covenant for the payment of the rent during the term, and also contained an annual clause of surrender after the expiration of the first three years.

Christopher Lopdell entered into, and continued in possession of the premises until the year 1790.

Peirse Creagh died in 1779, leaving the Respondent his eldest son and heir at law, who thereupon became seised in fee of the reversion of the premises, subject to the lease.

Richard Creagh, the brother by the half blood of the Respondent, having by some means acquired or usurped a right, or as the agent * of the Respondent, by an indenture dated in April 1791, demised the premises to James and Andrew Lysaght, for three lives, reserving a yearly rent of £100.

James and Andrew Lysaght were in possession of the premises from the date of the indentures, until eviction for non-payment of rent in the year 1821.

By an inquisition, bearing date the 21st day of August 1793, the Respondent was found to be a lunatic, and to have become so in the month of March 1786. In December 1793, Stephen Darcy was appointed committee of the estate of the Respondent.

In 1797, Stephen Darcy filed a rental and account of the Respondent's estate, in which James and Andrew Lysaght are named as tenants of the lands, at the yearly rent of £90; and in the account, rent is [262] stated to have been received, and rent also to be due from them.

Stephen Darcy died in 1801, and Stuart King, then one of the masters of chancery, was appointed committee of the estate of the Respondent, and continued to act as such until the year 1820, when he resigned his office of master, and Roderick Connor, who succeeded him as master, was appointed committee in his room.

In 1802, William Croker was appointed receiver of the estate of the lunatic, and continued to act until his death, in 1817, when George O'Callaghan was appointed in his room.

William Croker, in the accounts filed by him, returned Richard Creagh as tenant, and died indebted to the estate of the Respondent in respect of his receipts.

On the 23d of July, 1811, an order was made in the lunacy of the Respondent, that £720 being due from Richard Creagh, as tenant, a distress should be levied on the lands, for non-payment of the rent.

In 1812, Richard Creagh made an affidavit in the lunacy, that he never had been tenant, or in possession of the lands; and the order was not enforced.

William Croker, shortly after his appointment as receiver, entered into a recognizance with sureties, (who are since dead,) duly to account for his receipts, and to pay in the balances.

In 1817 Croker died indebted to the estate of the Respondent for rents received, but whether from the estates in question did not distinctly appear. In 1820, on the petition of the committee, an order was made, under which proceedings were taken against the sureties of the receiver; and in 1821, under [263] another order, a sum of money having been paid upon a compromise proposed by the sureties and approved by the master, the recognizance was vacated as to those sureties.

* An attested copy of the registered memorial of this lease was in evidence in the cause. It does not appear in the memorial that the lease was executed by Richard Creagh as attorney or agent.

In 1820, an ejectment was brought against Richard Creagh, for non-payment of rent, and possession of the lands was recovered.

In 1821 an action was brought in the name of the Respondent, against the Appellant, as administrator of the original lessee, C. Lopdell, to recover a sum of £2340, the amount of twenty-six years' rent of the lands. To the declaration in this action, the Defendant among other things put in pleas of surrender, eviction and plene administravit, on which issue being joined, the cause was tried in 1822, when a verdict was found for the Plaintiff on all the issues. Upon the trial, the counsel for the Respondent relied upon the conveyance to Christopher Lopdell, as having been a subsisting and binding instrument, until the eviction under the ejectment for nonpayment of rent, and gave evidence of his having obtained possession of the lands under the conveyance, and that he continued in such possession until the year 1790; and the Appellant having proved on the trial, a warrant of attorney to enter judgment on a bond dated the 12th of April 1790, executed by the Respondent and Richard Creagh, for a principal sum of £309 payable to Christopher Lopdell, as evidence that the Respondent had lucid intervals after the month of March 1786, the time at which he was found to have become a lunatic; the Respondent gave in evidence a judgment entered in pursuance of the warrant of attorney against Richard only, for the penal sum of £618, the principal sum of £309 being alleged to be the consideration agreed to be [264] paid by Richard Creagh to Christopher Lopdell, for the assignment of his interest in the lands. On the trial it was further proved on behalf of the Appellant, that Richard Creagh executed the indenture of 9th April 1791, to James and Andrew Lysaght, thereby reserving to himself and his heirs the yearly rent of £100; and it was further proved, that James and Andrew Lysaght paid to Richard Creagh a sum of £200 as a consideration for the conveyance.

The Appellant having made an application to the Court of King's Bench, to set aside the verdict, which the Court refused, in Trinity term 1822, judgment was entered.
